The first and most indispensable measure was to arrange and methodize the national debt, and to reduce it to some uniformity, so that it should no longer consist of loan contracts of every species and date, which also, by reason of their differences of origin and nature, maintained a dangerous and counter-revolutionary kind of stock-jobbing. The very knowledge of these old titles, their identification, and their classification, required a peculiar information, and introduced a most frightful complication in their statement. It was only at Paris that the dividends were payable, and not unfrequently the sub-division of the share into numerous parts compelled the public creditor to apply to twenty different pay-clerks. There was the constitutional debt, the debt redeemable at a fixed period, and the debt redeemable by instalments; and in this manner the public treasury was daily exposed to the calls for these redemptions, and compelled to negotiate for fresh capital to pay off the loans thus falling due. "We must reduce this debt to one system of uniformity, and republicanism it," said Cambon; his proposal was the consolidation of all the claims of the public creditors into one stock, to be as one inscription in one book, which should be called "The Great Book of the Public Debt." This inscription, and the note from it which was to be delivered to the stock-holders, was to constitute from that period their only title. To obviate any anxiety as to the custody of this book, it was to be deposited in duplicate in the archives of the treasury; so far it was not more liable to exposure or accidents than the notarial registers. The stock-holders, therefore, were required within a specified period, to transmit their titles, that they might be then duly entered and then subsequently burnt. The notaries were ordered to bring thither all the titles of which they were the depositaries, and they were to be punishable by ten years' imprisonment if before they transmitted them they either preserved or delivered copies. If the stock-holder permitted six months to elapse without making his inscription, he lost the interest; if he suffered a year to pass, he was absolutely excluded and lost his capital. "In this manner," said Cambon, "the debt contracted by despotism can no longer be distinguished from that contracted since the revolution, and I defy Monseigneur le despotisme, if he were to revive again, to recognise his old debt, since it is blended with the new. This operation accomplished, you will see the capitalist who desires a king, because he has a king for his debtor, and who also is fearful of losing his stock if his debtor be not restored, become a wellwisher for the republic who will have become his debtor, for this simple reason, he will be fearful that if the republic is lost, his capital will also be lost."

This was not the only advantage derivable from this institution; others quite as important resulted from it, and laid the foundation of a system of public credit. The capital of each credit was converted into a perpetual rent at the rate of five per cent. Thus the creditor of a sum of one thousand francs was inscribed in the Great Book for an annual payment of fifty francs. In this manner the former debts, some of which bore enormous interest, while others were liable to unjust deductions, or were saddled with certain taxes, were restored to one uniform and equitable rate of interest. The state commuting its debt into a perpetual annuity, became no longer exposed to calls for redemption, and never could be compelled to repay the capital so long as it paid up the interest. Moreover, an easy and advantageous expedient of redemption was discovered, and that was to repurchase the annuity the moment that it fell below par; thus, when an annuity of fifty livres of income derivable from one thousand francs capital was worth no more than nine or eight hundred livres, the state, according to Cambon, would gain a tenth or a fifth of the capital in repurchasing it at once. This mode of redemption was not yet fully matured by means of a sinking fund; but this scheme had partially suggested itself, and the knowledge of public finance was fast improving.

Thus the inscription upon the Great Book would simplify the form of titles, would identify the existence of the debt with that of the republic, and would commute the loans into a perpetual annuity, whereof the capital would never be redeemable, and whereof the interest was uniform howsoever the inscription was divided. This was a very simple idea, and partly borrowed from the English; but it required great nerve to apply this system to France: it also possessed the merit of being introduced at that particular juncture. Without doubt this was somewhat an arbitrary proceeding, but the effect was in this rough manner to change the nature of titles and credits, and bring back the interest to a single and uniform rate, and to inflict the penalty of forfeiture upon those stock-holders who dissented from this commutation; but in respect of the state it was effecting an act of justice of the most elevated character, and this great and energetic uniformity of the debt was perfectly consistent with a boldly carried out and perfect revolution, the great object of which was to render all considerations subservient to the rights of the community.

The scheme of Cambon associated with this bold act a scrupulous regard for all engagements made with foreigners, who had been promised repayment at fixed periods. This scheme provided that as the assignats possessed no currency out of France, foreign stock-holders should be paid in money and at determinate dates. Besides all this, the communes having contracted particular debts, thereby occasioning inconvenience to their unpaid creditors, the state was to take upon itself the discharge of their debts, and were only to take possession of their property as a security to the extent of the sums expended in their repayment. This plan was entirely adopted*, and was as well executed as it had been conceived. The capital of the debt, thus made uniform, was consolidated into annuties of two hundred millions per annum. It was thought necessary to make a substitution of the different kinds of old duties with which it had been encumbered, and thus to make it liable to a general duty of one fifth, which would reduce the payment of the interest to one hundred and sixty millions. It was thus that every thing was simplified and rendered intelligible. A grand source of stock-jobbing was put an end to, and confidence was restored, inasmuch as a partial bankruptcy with respect to this or that species of stock could no longer take place, and as to the entirety of the debt, a general bankruptcy was not so much as thought of.

From this period it became more easy to have recourse to a loan. We shall soon see how that measure was made subservient to the purpose of keeping up the price of the assignats.

The available property of which the revolution had the disposal in order to meet its extraordinary expenses, never consisted of any thing else than the national property. This available property as represented by the assignats floated in the circulating currency. It was therefore expedient to encourage sales for the purpose of calling in the assignats, and raising their price, by making them less common. Victories afforded a better, but not the most ready means to expedite the sales. To supply this deficiency of purchasers several expedients were devised. For instance: the purchasers had been allowed to distribute their payments over several years. But this measure, devised for the mere purpose of giving a preference to the peasants and making them freeholders, was rather a means of encouraging purchasers than of calling in the assignats. At last, in order to diminish more effectually the quantity in circulation, it was decided that the compensation-money for offices should be paid, partly in assignats and partly in receipts of payment (reconnaisances de liquidation). The compensations, amounting to less than three thousand francs, were to be paid off in assignats; the remainder were to be made in receipts of payment, which had no currency as money, and could not be divided in sums less than ten thousand livres, and, being transferable as other effects to bearer, were received in payment on the purchase of national property. By this means that portion of national property converted into forced currency would be diminished; for all that which had been transmuted into receipts of payment consisted of large sums, not easily transferable, fixed in the hands of the wealthy, and withdrawn from circulation and from being the subject of brokerage.

In order to still further promote the sale of the national property, it was declared, on the creation of the Great Book, that the inscriptions of annuities should be taken in half-payment for this property. This facility was expected to bring fresh purchasers and a further return of assignats.

But all these clever schemes were insufficient, and the bulk of the paper money was still too great. The constituent assembly, the legislative assembly, and the convention, had each in their turn decreed the creation of five thousand one hundred millions of assignats; four hundred and eighty-four millions had not yet been issued but remained in the treasury; therefore, there had not been circulated more than four thousand six hundred and sixteen millions. Part had been called in by means of sales; and as the purchasers were enabled to take different terms for the payment, there still remained due, in respect of the purchases made, from twelve to fifteen millions. There had been returned, in all, eight hundred and forty millions of assignats, which had been burnt; consequently there remained in circulation in the month of August, 1793, three thousand seven hundred and seventy-six millions.

The first thing to be attended to was to strip those assignats which bore the king's head of their legal value; these had been bought up, and were very prejudicial to the republican assignats, by reason of the superior credit which attached upon them. Although they were thus deprived of their legal value, they did not cease to have a price; they were transmuted into bills payable to bearer, and could be taken in payment either of taxes, or in part of the purchase-money of the national domains up to the first of January ensuing. After that period, they were not to be considered as possessing any value whatever. These assignats amounted to five hundred and fifty-eight millions. This measure, consequently, caused their disappearance from circulation within four months; and as the fact was well known, that these were all in the hands of counter-revolutionary speculators, an act of justice was exhibited in not annulling them, but simply calling them into the treasury.

It will be recollected that, in the month of May, when it was a declared principle that revolutionary armies should be established, it was at the same time decreed, that there should be a compulsory loan of one thousand millions from the wealthy, for the purpose of defraying the charges of a war, of which they, as well as the aristocrats, were considered the originators, and to which they would neither devote their persons nor their fortunes. This loan, apportioned as we shall soon see, was applied, in furtherance of Cambon's scheme, to cause the withdrawal of one thousand million of assignats from circulation. To afford an option to the better-disposed citizens, and to present them some advantages, a benevolence (emprunt volontaire) was opened; those who presented themselves to fill it up, received in return an inscription of annuity at the rate already decreed of five per cent. and thus obtained an interest upon their capital. They were enabled, by virtue of this inscription, to exempt themselves from contributing to the compulsory loan, or, at least, to the extent of the amount they invested in the benevolence. Those wealthy individuals who were not favourably disposed towards the revolution, who waited for the forced loan, received a title which bore no interest, and, in point of fact, was nothing else than an inscription for an annuity, a republican title without the five per cent. Lastly, inasmuch as, after the new law, the inscriptions were available as a half-payment for national property, the voluntary lenders received in return an inscription for an annuity, with the power of obtaining immediate repayment in national property, while, on the other hand, the certificates of the compulsory loan were not to be taken in payment of the domains acquired until two years after the peace. It became necessary, so said the words of the bill, to make the wealthy feel an interest in the speedy termination of the war and the pacification of Europe.

The forced loan or benevolence ought to have called in one thousand millions of assignats, in order to be burnt. Moreover, there ought to have been returned, by payment of the taxes in arrear seven hundred millions, whereof five hundred and fifty-eight millions were in royal assignats already denuded of their value, and received solely in payment of duties. There was a certainty, therefore, in the first place, that in two or three months there would be withdrawn from circulation the thousand millions loan, and subsequently seven hundred millions of taxes. Thus the floating capital of three thousand seven hundred and seventy-six millions would be reduced to two thousand and seventy-six millions. Assuming, as was very probable, that the power of giving these inscriptions upon the national debt in exchange for national property would induce new purchases, it might fairly be presumed that in this way from five to six hundred millions would be cancelled. The sum total, therefore, would perhaps be still further reduced by fifteen or sixteen hundred millions. Thus, by reducing, at the present juncture, the whole of the floating capital of assignats to less than half, the assignats would regain their primitive value; the four hundred and eighty-four millions remaining in the treasury becoming capable of being turned to some account. The seven hundred millions cancelled by duties, and whereof five hundred and fifty-eight were to bear the symbol of the republic, and to be re-issued, would also, by this means, be restored to their original value, and could be employed for the service of the ensuing year. The assignats would, for the present, be raised, and that was the point to be gained. If the republic should get clear of her difficulties, a victory would at once bring them up to their standard value, and would thus afford an opportunity of making fresh issues, and realizing the national property yet undisposed of, which yet was of no small amount, and was daily increasing as a consequence of emigration.

The mode in which this compulsory loan was effected was, in its very nature, prompt, and of necessity arbitrary. How difficult is it to pass a correct and fair estimate upon property even in times of public tranquillity, taking also into consideration the concurrences of the period, and consulting all the ordinary contingencies! Therefore, how impracticable is it to do that in a time of violence and hurry, which it is difficult to perform even under the most favourable circumstances! But so long as there existed a necessity to disquiet the circumstances of so many persons, and to attack so many individuals, can it be wondered at if the republic were incurious as to the exact estimation of property, or nicely considered any inequalities of apportionment? For the purpose, therefore, of carrying out this scheme of a forced loan, a species of dictatorship had been established, as had been done in respect of the forced levies, and this dictatorship was vested in the communes. Every person was compellable to declare the exact amount of his income. The general council appointed examiners for each commune; these examiners made their assessments from their own local intelligence, if the declarations were consistent; and if there was reason to presume them false, they had the power to make a double assessment upon the party. In estimating the income of each family, the sum of one thousand francs was allowed in advance for each individual, husband, wife, and family; all above that was considered surplus income, and, as such, subject to taxation. In respect of a taxable income, from one thousand to ten thousand francs of taxable income, the tax was one-tenth. One thousand francs of superfluous income paid one hundred francs; two thousand francs of superfluous income, two hundred francs; and so of the like. All superfluous income exceeding ten thousand francs was charged with a sum equal in amount. So that every family who, possessing an income beyond the one thousand francs allowed for each individual, and the ten thousand francs superfluous income subjected to the payment of the tenth, yet enjoyed an income beyond these sums, was compelled to pay the entire excess to this loan. Thus a family composed of five individuals, and worth fifty thousand livres income, had five thousand francs as deemed necessary for its subsistence, ten thousand francs chargeable with a tenth, reducing it to nine,—making, in the whole, fourteen thousand; and was, moreover, compelled, for that year, to give up the remaining thirty-six thousand francs either to the forced loan or the benevolence. It was not, after all, such a very hard measure, to take from the opulent classes the superfluous excess of a year's income, while so many individuals were going forth to perish upon the field of battle; and this sum, which, after all, could have been unconditionally seized as an indispensable war-tax, could be exchanged for a republican debenture, convertible either into government annuities or into portions of the national property*.

This gigantic operation consisted, therefore, in withdrawing from circulation a thousand millions of assignats, by abstracting so much from the opulent, by divesting this thousand million of its monetary quality and circulating value, and in constituting it a charge upon the national property, which the wealthy classes might, as they pleased, exchange for a corresponding portion of this property. So it was that they were compelled to become purchasers, or, at least, to furnish the same amount of assignats as they would have had to procure, had they been purchasers. In short, it was a compulsory investment to the extent of one thousand million of assignats.

In addition to these measures, all of them calculated to uphold the paper currency, others were superadded. After having annihilated the conflicting differences between the former state-loans and the assignats stamped with the king's head, it was quite as necessary to put an end to the competition of the shares in the stock-creating companies. An act was therefore passed for the abolition of the life insurance company, the discount and banking company, and, in short, of all those companies whose stock consisted of shares transferable without indorsement, in negotiable securities, in inscriptions or entries in a book, and passing from hand to hand. It was settled that they should close their accounts within a short period, and that, for the future, none other than the government should found those institutions. A prompt report was called for in respect of the East India Company, which, on account of the magnitude of its transactions, called for special inquiry. There was no putting a stop to the negotiation of outland bills, but those were declared traitors to the country of the French who invested their capital upon the banks or counting-houses of those countries with whom the republic was at war. Lastly, new severities were devised against money, and the gain derivable from its traffic. A penalty of six years' imprisonment had already been awarded against whosoever should sell or purchase money, that is to say, who should either receive or pay it in exchange for other than the same sum in assignats; the same punishment had been enacted against every seller or purchaser of articles of consumption, who should stipulate for the price, having regard whether the payment was to be made in hard money or in assignats. As such transactions could hardly be reached, the legislature avenged itself by increasing the measure of punishment. Every individual convicted of having refused a payment tendered in assignats, or of having paid or received them at a rate below their nominal value, was liable to be fined three thousand livres, and to suffer imprisonment for six months, for the first offence, and for every subsequent offence, to double fine and twenty years' imprisonment. Lastly, as a metallic currency was indispensable in places of public sale and could not be readily supplied, it was ordered that the church-bells should be used for the coining of decimes, demi-decimes, &c. equivalent to two sous, one sou, &c. But whatever means might be employed for causing a rise in the value of assignats, and destroying those competitions which affected them so seriously, there was no reason to expect that they ever would be placed upon the same level with the price of commodities; therefore it became necessary to depress the latter by arbitrary means. Added to this, the people still believed that a spirit of malevolence was rife among the dealers in commodities; they believed that articles of consumption were engrossed, and whatever might be the notion entertained by legislators on this subject, they were unable to restrain, in this particular respect, a populace that, upon other occasions, they suffered to run wild at will. It therefore became a point of necessity to place commodities on the same footing as corn. An act was passed which made every species of monopoly a capital offence and punishable with death. The definition of an offender of this description was, he who withdrawn from circulation the necessities of life, without first offering them to sale. Those articles that were declared as necessaries of life were, bread, meat, corn, meal, vegetable productions, fruits, coal, wood, butter, tallow, hemp, flax, salt, leather, liquors, salted meats, cloth, wool, and all woven stuffs, save silks. The mode of putting such an act as this in execution was necessarily inquisitorial and vexatious. Preliminary declarations were to be made by every trader as to the bulk of his stores. These declarations were to be tested by domiciliary visits. Every fraud upon the act, or connivance at deception was, like the major offence, punishable with death. Commissaries, appointed by the communes, were authorized to certify the bills of parcels, and from the bills of parcels to fix a price which, by affording a moderate profit to the trader, should not exceed the sufficiency of the customer. If, however, added the act, the high price at which the goods were sold to the trader should render it impossible for him to realise a profit, the sale shall nevertheless take place at such price as the purchaser can best afford. Thus, according to this act, as in that which decreed the declaration of corn and its maximum price, it was left to the communes to assess the price according to the state of things in each locality. This soon led to a further generalization of these measures, and to render them more arbitrary as they proceeded.

The military, administrative, and financial operations of this period were conceived with as much accuracy as the state of affairs would permit, and certainly their vigour was commensurate with the peril. The entire population was at the disposal of the representatives, and were liable to be called out either to fight, to manufacture weapons, or to dress the wounded. All the former government debts, now transmuted into one republican debt, were exposed to the same fate, and were of no more value than the assignats. The multiplied competitions of the old loan contracts, royal assignats, shares of companies, were all done away with. Capital could no longer be invested in these privileged funds, as all were reduced to uniformity; as the assignats were cancelled, a thousand million was thus abstracted from the wealthy, which was transmuted from being a state currency to a mere charge upon the national property. Lastly, in order to establish a compulsory relation between money and the necessities of life, the government burdened the communes with the charge of providing all necessary commodities and goods of every description, and of selling them again at a reasonable price in each district. Never did any government at once adopt measures so gigantic or so boldly devised; and before we ought to accuse their originators of violence, we must put out of the question the danger of an universal invasion that then threatened, and the necessity cast upon them of living upon the unpurchased national property. The entire system of compulsory measures owed its origin to these two causes. At the present day, a superficial and ungrateful age is inclined to judge harshly of these operations, considers some too arbitrary, deems others contrary to sound principles of political economy, and joins the folly of ingratitude to that of utter ignorance of the period we are now relating, and the real state of affairs at that time. Let us abide by the facts, and thus render justice to those men who underwent such labours and perils to ensure our salvation.

Consequent upon these general administrative and financial measures, others were adopted more particularly appropriated for each theatre of war. The extraordinary measures which had for a long time been resolved upon with regard to La Vendée were at last decreed. The character of such measures was in the mean time well understood. The forces of the rebellion did not consist of disciplined troops, which could be annihilated by repeated victories over them, but consisted of a people who, apparently of a peaceable character and simple agriculturists, rose up as one man upon a given signal, and then overwhelmed by sheer numerical force, and took by surprise the republican armies by its unforeseen mode of attack this people also, in case of defeat, concealed themselves in the woods and in the country round about and resumed those occupations which prevented the soldier being distinguished from the peasant. An obstinate struggle lasting for upwards of six months, risings of the people, sometimes amounting to a hundred thousand men, exploits of the greatest hardness, a formidable reputation, and a confirmed notion that this civil and destructive war was the greatest peril the revolution had to encounter,—all these things called loudly for the government to turn its attention to La Vendée, and to suggest in that behalf the execution of the most energetic and exasperated measures. An opinion had long been expressed that the only method of bringing this unhappy country back to its obedience, was not to contend with it, but to ensure its utter destruction, since its armies were never to be found and yet existed every where. These views were evidently the groundwork of a fundamental decree, wherein La Vendée, the last of the Bourbons, and all foreigners, were at one stroke of the pen doomed to extermination. As a consequence of this decree the minister of war was required to send into the revolted countries, combustibles in order to set fire to the woods, the copses, and the bushes. "The forests," so said this decree, "shall be laid open, the haunts of the rebels shall be destroyed, the crops shall be cut down by gangs of labourers, the cattle shall be seized and every thing carried out of the country. The old men, women, and children, shall be removed from the country, and then shall be provided for as humanity requires." It was furthermore enjoined the general and the representatives in commission, to take the necessary steps for provisioning a great body of people, and immediately after that had been done, to call out from the neighbouring departments, not a mere graduated levy as in other parts of France, but a sudden and general levy, and thus pour forth one population against another. The men chosen for this purpose were well adapted for carrying out these measures. We have seen how Biron, Berthier, Menou, and Westermann, were compromised and displaced, merely for having enforced good order and discipline, and how Rossignol, the man who promoted insubordination, was released from prison by ministerial agency. The triumph of the Jacobinical system was complete. Rossignol, from being a mere commander of a battalion, was all of a sudden appointed a commander-in-chief of the army on the coast of Rochelle. Ronsin, the principal of those ministerial agents who introduced into La Vendée all the bad feelings of the Jacobins, and who maintained the notion that there was no necessity for experienced generals, but that pure republicans were all that were wanted, and that a war conducted upon regular principles was not necessary, but solely a war of extermination, that every new enlisted man became a soldier, and that every soldier was qualified to become a general; Ronsin, the principal of these ministerial creatures, was in four days made a captain, commander of a company of artillery, and a general of brigade, and was associated with Rossignol with all the powers of the minister himself, in order to preside over the execution of this new systematic feature in war. It was also ordered that the garrison of Mentz should be conveyed post-haste from the Rhine to La Vendée. So great had been the universal jealousy, that the commanders of this brave garrison had been put under arrest, for having entered into a capitulation. Fortunately for them, the brave Merlin, who always commanded the attention due to his heroic character, offered his testimony to their self-devotion and courage. Kieher and Aubert-Dubayet were restored to their soldiers, who were about to rescue them by main force, and they repaired to La Vendée, where there was ample need of their talents to retrieve the misfortunes caused by the ministerial agents. It is a truth which cannot be too often repeated, that strongly excited feeling acts without judgment or foresight, but yet nothing short of this excitement can save nations in urgent extremities. The appointment of Rossignol was an act of foolhardiness, but yet it indicated a course firmly resolved upon; it no longer allowed half measures in this disastrous war with La Vendée, and it compelled all those local administrations who had not yet declared themselves, to choose at once the side they intended to take. Those fiery Jacobins that were distributed throughout the armies caused great confusion, but they imparted that resolute energy, without which they would never have had either equipment, victualling, or necessaries of any description. So far as concerned the generals, their conduct was perversely unjust, but they never suffered any one to falter or waver. We shall soon see that their hot-headed intemperance, when combined with the discretion of men of greater sedateness than themselves, produced the greatest and most fortunate results.

Kilmaine, who had conducted that admirable retreat which had saved the army of the North, was forthwith replaced by Houchard the late general of the army of the Moselle, and possessed of high reputation for his courage and devotion to the cause. Some alteration had taken place in the committee of public welfare. Thuriot and Gasparin resigned on account of ill health. One of them was replaced by Robespierre, who thus pushed his way into the government, and whose enormous influence was thus acknowledged and submitted to by the convention, who, up to this period, had never placed him in any committee. The successor of the other was the celebrated Carnot, who already, as a commissary sent to the army of the North, had acquired the character of an able and intelligent military officer.

To all these administrative and military designs were added measures having revenge for their object, according to the old plan of following up energetic exploits by acts of cruelty. We have already seen that, on the requisition of the commissaries of the primary assemblies, a law against suspected characters had been resolved upon. The draught bill had only to be brought in. It was every day called for, inasmuch as the decree of the 27th of March, so they said, which outlawed all aristocrats, did not go far enough. That decree required a trial of the party suspected, but now an act was called for which should allow the imprisonment, without trial, of citizens whose opinions had rendered them suspected, merely for the purpose of securing their persons. While this act was being passed, it was decided that the property of all those who were outlawed should belong to the republic. Subsequently, still more severe enactments were called for against foreigners. Already had they been placed under the superintendence of those committees who styled themselves revolutionary, but yet more than that was required. The notion of a foreign combination, supposed to have originated with Pitt, absorbed more than ever the public mind. A letter case found upon the ramparts of one of our frontier towns, contained some letters written in English, and which English spies in France had addressed to each other. Enquiries were made in these letters as to considerable sums remitted from spies dispersed in our camps, our fortified towns, and our principal cities. Some were commissioned to obtain an intimacy with the generals for the purpose of seducing them, to obtain precise information as to the state of our armies, our fortresses, and the state of our victualling department; others were instructed to obtain access to our arsenals and our stores, and set them on fire with phosphoric matches. "Get up the exchange," said these letters, "to two hundred livres for one pound sterling. The assignats must be depreciated in every practicable manner, and refuse all those which do not bear the king's head. Get up the price of all sorts of provisions, employ your merchants to buy up all articles constituting the necessaries of life. If you can, persuade Cott... to purchase tallow and candles at any price, and charge them to the public as high as five francs the pound. My lord is highly satisfied in the way B. t. z. has acted. We hope that the assassins will conduct themselves with prudence. Priests in disguise and women are more fit to carry out this plan of operation."

All that these letters demonstrated, came to no more than that England had some military spies in our armies, and some agents in our commercial towns, for the purpose of aggravating the distress occasioned by the dearth, and that perhaps some of them might have taken money under the pretence of committing some convenient assassinations. But all these things were far from being in themselves alarming, and certainly were extremely magnified by the common boasting of the agents employed in this description of intrigue. True it certainly was, that fires had burst out at Douay, at Valenciennes, at the sail-cloth-manufactories of Lorient, at Bayonne, and at the parks of artillery near Chemillé and Saumur. It may be possible that these agents had been the originators of these fires, but certain it is, they had not pointed the dagger of the life-guardsmen Paris against Lepelletier, or that of Charlotte Corday against Marat, and if they did speculate as stock-jobbers upon foreign paper and assignats, and even if they did make some purchases of commodities upon a credit opened at London by Pitt, their influence upon our commercial and financial situation, which depended upon more general and important causes than these contemptible intrigues, was very slight indeed. However, the discovery of these letters taking place at the same time with these fires, two assassinations, and the speculation in foreign bills, excited a general indignation. The convention issued a decree, condemnatory of the English government, and declaring Pitt to be the enemy of the human race. At the same time it was ordered that all foreigners domiciliated in France since the 14th of July 1789, should be forthwith put under arrest*.

At last it was decreed, that the proceedings against Custine should be brought to a conclusion. Biron and Lamarche were also put upon their trial. The impeachment of the Girondists was again urged forward, and orders were given to the revolutionary tribunal to institute the process against them with the least possible delay. Lastly, the wrath of the assembly was directed against the remaining Bourbons, as also against that unfortunate family who mourned in the tower of the Temple the death of the late king. It was decreed that all those Bourbons then remaining in France, should be banished, save those who were under the sword of the law†; that the Duke of Orleans, who had been transferred in the month of May to Marseilles, and whom the Federalists had shewn a reluctance to try, should be brought back to Paris, to appear before the revolutionary tribunal. His death should serve for a reply to those who would accuse the Mountain of desiring to make him king. The unhappy Marie-Antoinette, notwithstanding her sex, was like her husband devoted to the scaffold. She was supposed to have been the promoter of the intrigues of the old court, and was deemed as much more to blame than Louis XVI. Above all, she had the misfortune of being the daughter of Austria, at this moment the enemy most to be feared of all the foreign powers. Following the usual course of most boldly defying their most powerful enemy, a strong desire existed in the people, that the head of Marie Antoinette should fall the very instant the imperialist armies should set foot upon our territories. She was therefore transferred to the Conciergerie to be tried as an ordinary culprit by the revolutionary tribunal. Madame Elizabeth, who was to be banished, was detained to appear as a witness against her sister. The two children were to be brought up and educated by the republic, who was to settle when peace should have been established what was then to be done with them. Hitherto the establishment of the Temple had been conducted upon a certain scale which corresponded with the rank of the imprisoned family. It was now decreed that no more than what was actually necessary should be allowed. In short, to crown all these acts of revolutionary vengeance, it was decreed that the royal tombs at Saint-Denis should be destroyed.

Such were the measures which the imminent dangers of the month of August 1793, called forth in aid of the defence and for wreaking the vengeance of the revolution.

AFTER the retreat of the French from Caesar's camp to the camp of Gavrelle, the allies should have followed up an irregular army, which from the opening of the campaign had been constantly unsuccessful. In fact, from the month of March, after having been beaten at Aix-la-Chapelle and at Neerwinden, it had lost Dutch Flanders, Belgium, Caesar's camp, the camp at Famars, and the fortresses of Condé and Valenciennes. One of its generals had gone over to the enemy, and another had been slain. Thus ever since the battle of Jemappes there had been nothing but a succession of retreats, certainly well-managed, but by no means likely to impart confidence in the army. Without even taking into consideration the question of marching to Paris, in itself a fool-hardy design, the allies could well have destroyed this nucleus of an army, and then they would have experienced no obstruction whatever, in taking all those strong places which it suited their selfish policy to occupy. But immediately after the taking of Valenciennes, the English, by virtue of the treaties made at Antwerp, now required that siege should be laid to Dunkirk. Then it was, while the prince of Cobourg, remaining in the neighbourhood of his camp of Hérin, between the rivers Scarpe and Scheldt, intended to engage the French, and was considering how to effect the recapture of Quesnoy, that the duke of York, on his march with the English and Hanoverian army by Orchies, Menin, Dixmude, and Furnes, sat down before Dunkirk between the Langmoor and the sea. The carrying on of two sieges, therefore, gave us a little breathing time. Houchard, who had been despatched to Gavrelle, mustered thither every disposable force, so as to enable him to fly to the relief of Dunkirk. To deprive the English of a seaport on the continent, to beat single-handed our most powerful enemies, to prevent their acquiring the slightest advantage from this war, and at the same time to strengthen the English opposition against Pitt, were the reasons which induced them to consider Dunkirk as the most important point of the entire theatre of the war. "The welfare of the republic is identified with the place," wrote Houchard to the committee of public welfare; and Carnot feeling perfectly convinced that the troops collected between the frontier of the north and that of the Rhine, that is to say, on the Moselle, were ineffective there, decided that a reinforcement should be drawn from them to be dispatched into Flanders. Twenty or twenty-five days thus passed away in making preparations, a delay that well might be accounted for on the part of the French, who had to collect together their troops at great distances from each other, but utterly unaccountable on the part of the English, who had only four or five days' march to make in order to bring them under the walls of Dunkirk.

We left our two armies of the Moselle and Rhine doing their best to advance, but too late, towards Mentz, and not coming up in time to prevent the capture of that fortress. Subsequently, they had fallen back upon Saarbrück, Hornbach and Weissenburg. We must give the reader some notion of the theatre of war that he may better comprehend these various movements. The French frontier presents a singular delineation of boundary on the north and east. The Scheldt, the Meuse, the Moselle, the chain of the Vosges and the Rhine converge towards the north, forming nearly parallel lines. The Rhine when it arrives at the termination of the Vosges makes a sudden bend, no longer running in a parallel with these lines, and terminates them by flowing round the base of the Vosges, receiving the Moselle and the Meuse in its course. The allies upon the northern frontiers had advanced between the Scheldt and the Meuse, but had made no progress between the Meuse and the Moselle, because the inefficient corps left by them between Luxembourg and Trèves had been unable to attempt any thing, but they possessed more strength between the Moselle, the Vosges, and the Rhine. We have already observed that they were posted a cheval upon the Vosges, partly on the eastern slope and partly upon the western. The plan that should have been followed as we formerly intimated was simple enough. In considering the ridge of the Vosges as a river whereof all the passages were to be occupied, the entire masses could be brought to bear upon one slope so as to overpower the enemy on one side, and then return so as to overwhelm him on the other. Neither the French or the allies ever once thought of this, and ever since the capture of Mentz, the Prussians placed upon the western slope, were directly opposite to the army of the Rhine. We had retired within the famous lines of Weissenburg. The army of the Moselle, amounting to twenty thousand men, was posted at Saarbrück upon the Sarre, the division of the Vosges amounting to twelve thousand was stationed at Hornbach and Kettrick, and communicated by the mountains with the left extremity of the army of the Rhine. The army of the Rhine, forty thousand strong, protected the river Lauter all the way from Weissenburg to Lauterburg. These form the lines of Weissenburg; the Savre runs from the Vosges to the Moselle, the Lauter from the Vosges to the Rhine, and these two rivers both form a single line, which almost perpendicularly bisects the Moselle, the Vosges, and the Rhine. The mastery of this line could be obtained by occupying Saarbrück, Hornbach, Kettrick, Weissenburg, and Lauterburg, and it was this that we had accomplished. We had scarcely sixty thousand men upon the whole of this frontier, because we had been obliged to send assistance to Houchard. The Prussians had been two months in coming up towards us, and at last brought up at Pirmsens. Reinforced as they were by forty thousand men who had just brought the siege of Mentz to an end, and joined by the Austrians, they might have completely overwhelmed us on either of the two slopes, but there was an absence of cordiality between Prussia and Austria by reason of the partition of Poland. Frederic William, who still remained in the camp of the Vosges, by no means responded to the fervid impatience of Wurmser; this man, who despite of his age retained his natural impetuosity, was every day making some fresh attack upon the lines of Weissenburg, but his attacks confined to a single point were unsuccessful, and only caused a useless slaughter of our soldiers. Such therefore was the state of things upon the Rhine in the early part of September.

In the south, events were demonstrating their effects. The protracted uncertainty of the Lyonnese had at last ended in an open defiance, and the siege of their city had been determined upon. We have already remarked upon the offer they made of submitting themselves and recognizing the constitution, but reserving their intentions as to the decrees which required them to send the imprisoned patriots to Paris, as well as to dissolve the newly constituted authority of the sections. They had indeed displayed their disobedience to these decrees in the most striking manner, by sending Chalior and Riard to the scaffold, by making daily preparations for war, by appropriating the public money, and in detaining the supplies despatched for the armies. Numerous partisans of the emigration party had gained admittance among them, and inspired them with a horror of the former Mountaineer municipal authorities. Moreover, they held out strong hopes of the arrival of the Marseillais, who, as they said, were coming up the Rhône, as well as of the advance of the Piedmontese, who were about to debouch from the Alps with sixty thousand men. Although the Lyonnese, who were staunch federalists, hated both foreign powers and emigrants, yet the Mountain and the old municipal authorities had caused such terror that they were rather desirous of exposing themselves to the hazard and infamy of a foreign alliance than to the vengeance of the convention.

The Saône, which runs between the Jura and the Côte-d'Or and the Rhône, taking its course from the Valais between the Jura and the Alps, both unite at Lyons. This wealthy city is therefore placed upon the confluence of these two rivers. Following the course of the Saône in the neighbourhood of Mâcon, the country was entirely republican, and the deputies La Porte and Reverchon having got together some thousand of the requisitionaries, cut off all communication with the Jura.

Dubois-Crancé with his reserve of the army of the Savoy was on his way from the quarter of the Alps, and protected the upper course of the Rhine, but the Lyonnese made themselves entirely masters of the lower course of the river, and of its right bank up to the mountains of the Auvergne. They also had the entire control of the Forez, making frequent incursions therein, and had recently obtained a supply of arms from St. Etienne. An eminent engineer had erected some good fortifications, and a foreigner had cast some pieces of ordnance for their batteries. The population consisted of two divisions: the young men accompanied the commandant Prêcy in his excursive attacks; the married men and fathers of families protected the city and its fortifications.

At length on the 8th of August, Dubois-Crancé, who had quelled the revolt of the federalists of Grenoble, put himself in marching condition against Lyons, in pursuance of the decree which commanded him to reduce this rebellious city to obedience. The army of the Alps amounted altogether to not more than twenty-five thousand men, and was soon about to have to deal with the Piedmontese, who, taking advantage of the month of August, prepared for their debouche by the grand chain of the Alps. This army, we have just observed, had just been reduced by the two detachments despatched for the reinforcement of the army of Italy, and the suppression of the Marseillais.

The Puy-de-Dôme, who was to furnish its quota of recruits, had retained them for the purpose of suppressing the revolt of the Lozère, a subject we have already noticed. Houchard had kept back the legion of the Rhine which had been appointed for the Alps; and the ministry were constantly holding out promises of a reinforcement of a thousand horse, which after all never came. However, Dubois-Crancé formed a company of five thousand regular troops, and added to them seven or eight thousand young requisitionaries. With this force he managed to station himself between the Saône and the Rhône so as to occupy the upper course of these rivers and intercept the supplies coming to Lyons by water, to maintain his line of communication with the army of the Alps, and to cut off the communication the besieged possessed with Switzerland and the Savoy. By these arrangements he constantly left the Forez open to the Lyonnese, and what was more, the important heights of Fourvières; but his situation hardly permitted him to act otherwise than as he did. The most material point was to gain possession of the two streams, and thus cut off all communication between Lyons and Switzerland and Piedmont. Dubois-Crancé had to wait some time before he could effectuate the blockade, for the new forces which had been promised him, as well as the siege-ordnance which had to be drawn from our fortresses in the Alps. The conveyance of this ordnance required five thousand horses.

On the 8th of August he summoned the town to surrender; the conditions he named were the absolute submission of all the citizens, their shutting themselves up in their houses, the surrender of the arsenal, and the formation of a provisional municipality. But at this juncture the concealed emigrants who were in the commission and the staff, renewed their deception upon the Lyon-nese, by frightening them with the idea of the restoration of the Mountaineer municipality, and by informing them that sixty thousand Piedmontese were about to debouche upon their city. An engagement which took place between two advanced posts, and terminated in favour of the Lyonnese, animated them to the greatest excess, and induced them to defend the place and thus decide their fate. Dubois-Crancé began his cannonade upon the quarter of the Croix-Rousse, between the two rivers, where he had taken up his position, and from the day that he began his fire committed the greatest devastation. Thus one of the most important of our manufacturing towns was reduced to the horrors of a bombardment, and we had to carry this bombardment into execution in sight of the Piedmontese, who were coming down from the Alps.

While these things were taking place, Carteaux had marched against Marseilles, and had crossed the Durance in the month of August. The Marseillais had retreated from Aix to their own city, and had made up their minds to defend the passes of Septèmes, crossed by the road from Aix to Marseilles. On the 24th General Doppet attacked them with the advanced guard of Carteaux; the action was very hot, but one section who had always been opposed to the other, passed over to the side of the republicans and decided the combat in their favour. The passes were carried by storm, and on the 25th Carteaux entered Marseilles with his small army.

This event decided another, the most disastrous of any that had yet oppressed the republic. The town of Toulon, which had always appeared actuated by the most violent republican feeling, so long as the municipality had been maintained there, had changed its political opinions under the newly constituted authority of the sections, and was about to undergo a change in its dominant party feeling. The Jacobins joining with the municipality, expressed themselves with the utmost violence against the aristocratic officers of the navy; they never ceased their complaints of the negligences and delay in repairing the squadron, of its being thus detained in port, and made a grand outcry for the punishment of those officers to whose misconduct they imputed the adverse issue of the Sardinian expedition. The moderate republicans of that place replied, as indeed they did on every other occasion, that none but senior officers were capable of undertaking the command of the squadrons, that the vessels could not be put in a state of reparation sooner than they were, that it would be extremely hazardous to send them out against the allied English and Spanish fleets, and that in short the officers against whom such an outcry was made were not traitors, but merely unsuccessful commanders. The moderate party carried the majority in the sections. The consequence of this was, that a swarm of underhanded agents intriguing for the emigrants as well as the English, immediately insinuated themselves into Toulon, and induced the inhabitants to go much further than they had at first intended. These agents put themselves in communication with admiral Hood, and were assured that the squadrons of the allied fleet who were hovering on the coasts, would be in readiness to show themselves on the first signal. The first thing they did was to follow the example of the Lyonnese, by trying and executing one Sevestre, the president of the Jacobin club. The next thing they did was to restore the refractory priests to the exercise of their sacred functions, and cause to be disinterred and borne in triumph, the bones of some unfortunate persons who in the previous troubles had perished in the royalist cause. The committee of public welfare having ordered the squadron to intercept the vessels bound to Marseilles, so as to be better able to reduce that city, the Toulonnais prevented the execution of this order, and made a merit of it with the sections of Marseilles. They next began to speak of the dangers to which they were exposed in resisting the convention, of the necessity there was for protecting themselves against its vindictiveness, and as to the possibility of obtaining the assistance of England to proclaim Louis XVII. The paymaster of the navy was, so far as it could be made appear, the principal promoter of this conspiracy; he possessed himself of the public money, sent coastwise to obtain additional funds even so far as the department of the Herault, and wrote to Genoa requiring them to withhold the supplies, thus rendering the situation of Toulon still more critical. The staff officers had been changed; a naval officer involved in some accusation arising out of the Sardinian expedition, was released from prison, in order that he might assume the chief command of the town, an old life-guardsmen had been placed at the head of the national guard, and the fortifications were entrusted to some returned emigrants, and lastly, they managed to secure admiral Trogoff, a foreigner on whom France had heaped favours. Under the pretence of negotiating an exchange of prisoners a communication was opened with admiral Hood, and at the very moment when Carteaux was about to enter Marseilles, when the general consternation was at its height in Toulon, and when eight or ten thousand provençals, the most anti-revolutionary of the country, had just taken refuge thither, then it was that they dared to make to the sections the shameful proposal of receiving the English, who were to occupy the place for the use, and in the name of Louis XVII. The navy, who were highly indignant, sent a deputation to the sections to remonstrate against the shameful act about to be committed. But the anti-revolutionists, as well Toulonnais as Marseillais, now more audacious than ever, turned a deaf ear to the expostulations of the navy, and ratified the proposition of the 25th of August, and thereupon immediately the signal agreed upon was given to the English. Admiral Trogoff putting himself at the head of those who were for giving up the port, signalled his squadron to near him by hoisting the white flag. The brave rear-admiral Saint-Julien at the same time declaring Trogoff a traitor, hoisted on board his own ship the signal of his assuming the chief command, and made an effort to rally round him such part of the navy as remained faithful to their service. But at this very moment the traitors, who were already in possession of the forts, threatened to burn Saint-Julien with his ships, he was therefore compelled to sheer off with a few officers and sailors; every one else was hurried away without being made acquainted what was to be done with them. Admiral Hood, who had for a long time seemed uncertain how he should act, at length appeared, and under the pretence of taking the port of Toulon for the use in trust for Louis XVII. received possession for no other purpose, in fact, than to burn and destroy the town.

In the meantime, no movement whatever had demonstrated itself in the Pyrenees; in the West, measures were on foot to ensure the execution of the decrees of the convention.

We left the columns of Upper Vendée putting themselves in order at Angers, Saumur, and Niort. The Vendéans had during this interval seized upon the bridges of Cé, and such was the terror they inspired, that Saumur was placed in a state of siege. There was only the column of Luçon and Sables capable of acting on the offensive, and that column was commanded by one Tuncq, one of those generals reputed to belong to the military aristocracy, and whose dismissal Ronsin required at the hands of the ministry. There were with him the two representatives, Bourdon of the Oise, and Goupilleau of Fontenay, men whose political feelings were the same as his own, and entirely opposed to Ronsin and Rossignol. Goupilleau especially, from his being a native of the country, and by reason of his family connections, was induced to treat the inhabitants with indulgence, and to mitigate those severities which Ronsin and those about him were bent upon inflicting.

The Vendéans, who felt some anxiety at seeing the column of Luçon, resolved to put their forces, hitherto always successful, in array against it. They were particularly desirous of affording relief to the division of M. de Rôtrand, which stationed before Luçon, and standing detached between the two great armies of the Upper and Lower Vendée, was solely dependent upon its own resources and required support. In point of fact, during the early part of August, a few companies had been conveyed in the direction of Luçon, but they were effectually driven back by General Tuncq. They then resolved upon making a more decisive effort. MM. d'Elbée, de Lescure, de La Rochejaquelein, and Charette mustered forty thousand strong, and on the 14th August, again made their appearance in the environs of Luçon. Tuncq had scarcely six thousand men. M. de Lescure, confident in his numerical superiority, gave the fatal counsel that the republican army should be attacked on the plain; MM. de Lescure and Charette took the command of the left wing, M. d'Elbée the centre, and M. de La Rochejaquelein that of the right wing. MM. de Lescure and Charette pushed forward with great energy with the right wing, but on the centre the soldiers who had to measure their strength against regular troops did not well stand their ground; M. de La Rochejaquelein, who had missed his road, did not come up in good time to support the left wing. Then it was general Tuncq, bringing seasonably his light artillery to bear upon the centre, already prepared to turn their backs, spread utter confusion among them, and in a few minutes sent the whole body of Vendéans, amounting to forty thousand, to the right about. Nothing could have been worse for the Vendéans than the consequences of this action, for they lost the whole of their artillery, and retreated into the country in the utmost consternation.

At this very period the dismissal of General Tuncq, which had been sent down at the suggestion of Ronsin, came to hand. Bourdon and Goupilleau, who were highly indignant at this proceeding, still held themselves in command, and wrote to the convention in order to obtain a revocation of the minister's order, and made fresh complaints against the disorganizing party at Saumur, who, as they said, only caused general confusion, and were seeking to substitute ignorant demagogues for experienced generals. At this same time also it was, that Rossignol, who was reviewing several columns under his command, came to Luçon. The interview he there had with Tuncq, Goupilleau, and Bourdon consisted of nothing else but mutual reproach; notwithstanding two victories, he was dissatisfied, because they had engaged without first consulting him; for his opinion was, and so far he was right, that no engagement ought to have taken place before the armies had been entirely formed and put in order. They parted in the same mood, and immediately afterwards Bourdon and Goupilleau, being informed of some acts of extreme severity inflicted by Rossignol in the country, had the hardihood to issue an order for his removal from office. Upon this, those representatives who were at Saumur, being Merlin, Bourbotte, Choudieu, and Rewbell, quashed the order of Goupilleau and Bourdon, and restored Rossignol. The matter was taken before the convention, and Rossignol, who was confirmed anew, defeated his adversaries. Bourdon and Goupilleau were recalled, and Tuncq was suspended.

Such was the situation of affairs when the garrison of Mentz arrived in La Vendée. It now had to be settled what plan should be adopted, and on what quarter this efficient garrison should be brought to bear, that is to say, whether it should be attached to the army of La Rochelle, and placed under the orders of Rossignol, or should it go to the army of Brest, and be committed to Canclaux? This became a question. Either was for having the command of this garrison, as success was supposed to attend it wherever it was ordered. They came to the conclusion that the country should be overwhelmed by simultaneous attacks, which being directed upon every point of its circumference, would necessarily converge to the centre. But inasmuch as that column which would have the Mayençais would have to take a decidedly offensive part, and drive back the Vendéans upon the other columns, it became a matter for consideration to ascertain upon what point a repulse of the enemy would be most effectual for the object intended. Rossignol and his party maintained that the best course would be, to march the Mayençais to Saumur, so as to drive the Vendéans back upon the sea and upon the Lower Loire, where they would be utterly destroyed; that the columns of Angers and Saumur, too inefficient by themselves, would require the support of the Mayençais in action; that standing by themselves, they would be totally incapable of marching into the field, so as to co-operate with the other columns of Niort and Luçon; that they would not even be able to stop the Vendéans when driven back upon them, or prevent them from being dispersed over the interior; and that in short, by marching the Mayençais by Saumur, no time would be lost, while if they went by Nantes, they would be compelled to make a considerable circuit, and lose ten or fifteen days. Canclaux, on the other hand, was impressed with the dangerous consequences of leaving the sea open to the Vendéans. An English squadron had been just discovered in the offing of the west, and there was no doubt but that the English intended making a descent upon the Marais. Such was the general opinion; and although it turned out to be erroneous, it yet formed the general topic of conversation. However, the English had been recently sending a spy into Vendée. He had arrived thither in disguise, and enquired as to the names of the leaders, their available force, their intentions, and their ultimate object. So little was then known in Europe of the events that were then taking place in the interior of France! The Vendéans had replied by a request for money and ammunition, and by promising that they would bring fifty thousand men upon the point where it was resolved a descent should take place. Every design of this nature was still very remote; but yet in every quarter it was looked upon as immediately to take place. We must, therefore, said Canclaux, set the Mayençais in motion by Nantes, so as to cut off the sea from the Vendéans, and throw them back upon the upper country. Assuming that they would disperse themselves throughout the interior, added Canclaux, they would soon be destroyed; and as for losing time, that is not worth thinking about; for the army of Saumur could not be in an effective state for ten or twelve days, even if they had the Mayençais with them. One reason which was not openly avowed was, that the army of Mentz, regularly trained, and in good discipline, would much rather serve with experienced men, and would prefer Canclaux an experienced general to Rossignol who was inexperienced, as well as the army of Brest, known by the fame of its glorious achievements, to the army of Saumur, already notorious from its defeats. The representatives who were attached to the disciplinarian party were of the same opinion, and were fearful of compromising the character of the army of Mentz, by placing them in the midst of the jacobinical and disorderly soldiers of Saumur.

Philippeaux, who among the representatives was the most zealous opponent of Ronsin's party, repaired to Paris, and there obtained an order of the committee of public welfare in favour of Canclaux. Ronsin procured the revocation of this order, and it was finally settled that a council of war to be holden at Saumur should finally arrange the application of the forces. The council was holden on the 2nd of September, at which many representatives were present. There existed a great disagreement of opinions; Rossignol, who was very candid in his views, offered Canclaux to resign the command in his favour, if he was desirous of permitting the Mayençais to commence their operations by Saumur. However, the opinion of Canclaux had greatest weight; the Mayençais were attached to the army of Brest, and the principal attack was to be carried from the Upper to the Lower Vendée. The minutes of the plan were signed, and it was settled that upon a given day, they should start from Saumur, Nantes, the Sables, and Niort.

The Saumur party were extremely chagrined at this arrangement. Rossignol was energetic and sincere in his professions, but was inexperienced and weak in body; and although he might be a staunch partisan, he could never render any effective service. He himself did not feel so affronted as did his satellites, Ronsin, Momoro, and all the agents of the ministry. These latter wrote without delay to Paris, to make complaint of the injudicious step that had been taken, of the slanderous reports against the sans-culotte generals, and of the prejudices which had been instilled into the garrison of Mentz; they thereby demonstrating that there was no great reason to hope on their part that they would concur in the plan of the campaign arranged at Samur. Ronsin suffered his ill-temper to get the better of him so far as to interrupt the delivery of stores to the Mentz troops, under the pretence that as this corps was passing over from the army of Rochelle to the army of Brest, it was the duty of the latter to furnish the provisions. The Mayençais set off without loss of time for Nantes, and Canclaux put every thing in order for carrying out the plan agreed upon in the early part of September.

Such had been the general course of things upon the various theatres of war during the months of August and September. We must now pursue the narrative of those great operations which were the consequences of these preparatives.

The duke of York had arrived before Dunkirk, with twenty-one thousand English and Hanoverians, and twelve thousand Austrians. Marshal Freytag was at Ost-Capelle, with sixteen thousand men, and the prince of Orange at Menin, with fifteen thousand Dutchmen; these two latter divisions were stationed at that place as an army of observation. The remainder of the allies dispersed in the neighbourhood of Quesnoy, and up to the Moselle, amounted to about one hundred thousand men. Thus one hundred and sixty, or one hundred and seventy thousand men were distributed over that immense line, their occupation consisting in laying siege to, and protecting all the passes upon that line. Carnot, who had begun to direct the operations of the French, had already settled in his own mind that this was not a case where every point was to be made the subject of a battle; but where an overwhelming mass should be opportunely brought to bear upon a decisive point. His advice had therefore been to convey thirty-five thousand men from the Moselle and the Rhine to the North. His counsel had been adopted, but no more than twelve thousand were able to reach Flanders. Nevertheless with this reinforcement and the various camps stationed at Gavrelle, Lisle, and Cassel, the French could have formed a mass of sixty thousand men, and in the scattered state in which the enemy then was discovered to be, they might have struck some severe blows. To be convinced of this, the reader has only to cast his eyes over the theatre of the war. In following the coast of Flanders towards France, you first find Furnes, and then Dunkirk. These two towns, bordered on one side by the sea, and on the other by the extended marshes of the Grande-Mêr, have no communication with each other, save by a narrow strip of land. The Duke of York, who got thither by Furnes, which first presents itself to the party coming from Flanders, had placed himself upon this strip of land, between the Grande-Mêr and the ocean, in order to lay siege to Dunkirk. Freytag's corps of observation was not situated at Furnes, so as to afford a protection to the rear of the besieging army; on the contrary, it was at a considerable distance, in the front of the marshes of Dunkirk, so as to cut off that assistance which might proceed from the interior of France. The Dutchmen under the command of the prince of Orange, stationed at Menin, three days' march from this point, were become of no use whatever. A mass of sixty thousand men, making a forced march between the Dutchmen and Freytag, might bear down upon Furnes in the rear of the duke of York, and thus, by a series of manœuvres between the three hostile divisions, might successively overwhelm Freytag, the duke of York, and the prince of Orange: for this manœuvre a single mass and forced marches were all that was requisite. But at that time, all that was thought of was to push forwards in front, by opposing to one detachment another detachment of equal calibre. However, the committee of public welfare had almost conceived the same plan. It had ordered the formation of a single division to march against Furnes. Houchard comprehended this idea at the moment it was given, but he did not retain it, and only thought of marching against Freytag, driving the latter upon the rear of the duke of York's army, and then doing his best to harass the operations of the besiegers.

While Houchard was hastening his preparations, Dunkirk was making a vigorous defence. General Souham, assisted by young Hoche, who conducted himself at this siege in an heroic manner, had already repelled numerous attacks. The besiegers experienced considerable difficulty in opening a trench in a sandy soil, at the bottom of which they came to water when they dug to three feet. The flotilla which was to have come down from the Thames to bombard the place never came, but, on the contrary, a French flotilla came out of Dunkirk, and laying broadside to the sea-shore, harassed the besiegers, who were pent up on their narrow strip of land, in want of water, and exposed to every possible danger. This was a case for hasty and decisive action, and it was the end of August. According to the old system of tactics, Houchard began his operations by making a movement against Menin, which only brought about a bloody and unprofitable battle. After having given this preliminary alarm, he advanced by various routes towards the course of the Yser, a small stream which lay between him and Freytag's corps of observation. Instead of getting between the corps of observation and the besiegers, he desired Hédouville to march against Rousbrughe, merely for the purpose of harassing the retreat of Freytag to Furnes, while he himself went to meet Freytag in his van, by marching with his entire army by Houtkerke, Hèresele, and Bambeke. Freytag had stationed his division upon a rather extended line, and he had but one portion of it about him when he received the first charge of Houchard. He made a stand at Hèresele, but after sharp fighting, he was compelled to recross the Yser, and to fall back upon Bambeke, and from thence to retreat to Rexpède and Killeem. In thus retreating beyond the Yser, he left the wings of his army much exposed in front. Walmoden's division got detached from him on his right, and his own retreat in the direction of Ronsbrughe was exposed to an attack from Hédouville.

Freytag then endeavoured, on the same day, to advance and recapture Rexpæde, in order to make it serve as a rallying point for Walmoden's division. He got to Rexpæde at the very instant the French were entering that village. A very sharp engagement ensued, and Freytag was wounded and made prisoner. In the meantime, towards evening, Houchard, who apprehended a night attack, got out of the village, and left behind him no more than three battalions. Walmoden, who was on his retreat with his shattered division, came up at the same time, and decided on vigorously attacking Rexpæde, to clear a passage for himself. A bloody contest took place in the middle of the night, the passage was cleared, Freytag rescued, and the enemy retired in a body to the village of Hondschote. This village, situated opposite the Grand-Moër, and on the road to Furnes, was one of the points by which he must needs pass in his retreat to the latter place. Houchard had abandoned the principal intention of manœuvring in the direction of Furnes, between the besieging army and the army of observation: all that he could now do was constantly to keep pushing against the front of Marshal Freytag's army, and to throw himself impetuously upon the village of Hondschote. The whole of the 7th was spent in observing the enemy's posts, which were protected by a strong range of artillery; and on the 8th, a decisive attack was resolved upon. Since the dawn, the French army were advancing towards the whole line, so as to attack the front. The right wing, under the command of Hédouville, was extended between Killem and Béveren; the centre, commanded by Jourdan, marched direct from Killem upon Hondschote; the left wing made the assault between Killem and the Furnes canal. The engagement commenced among the copse which covered the centre, and on both sides the principal forces were brought to bear upon this point. The French returned several times to the assault of the enemy's posts, and at last made themselves masters of them. While they were victorious in the centre, the entrenchments were carried on the right, and the enemy made up his mind to retire upon Furnes by the roads of Houthem and Hoghestade.

While these events were taking place at Hondschote, the garrison of Dunkirk made a vigorous sally, commanded by Hoche, and placed the besiegers in a very critical position. The next day after this battle, the latter held a council of war, and finding themselves too much exposed on their rear, and some delay taking place with respect to the naval force that was to have assisted in bombarding the town, they resolved upon raising the siege, and to retire to Furnes, whither Freytag had just arrived. They joined each other at that place on the evening of the 9th of September.

Such were those three battles, which had for their object and result the compulsory retreat of the army of observation upon the rear of the army of the besiegers, by advancing straightforwards. The last battle has imparted its name to this military achievement, and the battle of Hondschote was considered as having saved Dunkirk. This achievement was a new incident, entirely at variance with the series of our reverses in the north, and personally subjected the English to a check, disappointed them of their dearest hopes, delivered the republic from a misfortune she must have severely felt, and imparted a feeling of self-confidence to France.

The victory of Hondschote was the cause of great rejoicings at Paris, animated the aspirations of our youth, and gave us reason to entertain hopes that our energetic mode of action would produce the desired effects. The reverses we suffer are of small importance, provided that they are not entirely unmixed with that success which imparts hope and self-confidence to the dejected. The alternative only increases the energy and raises the enthusiasm of self-defence.

While the duke of York was before Dunkirk, Cobourg had resolved upon the assault of Quesnoy. This fortress was entirely destitute of the means of defence, and Cobourg had invested it very closely. The committee of public welfare, far from neglecting this part of the frontier, had immediately thereupon issued orders that some detachments should be despatched from Landreies, Cambrai, and Maubeuge. Unfortunately these detachments could not at once be rendered effective for this service; one of them lay besieged in Landreies, and the other surrounded by the enemy in the plain of Avesnes, and forming in square, was broken after making a most gallant defence. At length on the 11th of September, Le Quesnoy was obliged to capitulate. This loss was of little importance when put in comparison with the relief of Dunkirk; but it detracted considerably from the public satisfaction produced by the latter event.

Houchard, after having compelled the duke of York to concentrate his forces at Furnes with Freytag, could hope for no further success in that direction. All that was left for him was to throw himself impetuously with equal forces upon soldiers of a more warlike character than his own, and that without any of those favourable opportunities or pressing urgencies which form an adequate motive for hazarding a battle dubious in its event. Circumstanced as he was, the best he could do was to fall upon the Dutch, who were in dispersed detachments in the neighbourhood of Menin, Halluin, Roncq, Werwick, and Ypres. Houchard, who took his measures very cautiously, ordered the camp at Lille to make a sally upon Menin, while he should be doing the same at Ypres. For several days the advanced posts of Werwick, Roncq, and Halluin, were the subject of obstinate contest, and on both sides there was a great display of personal bravery, with a very slight knowledge of military tactics. The prince of Orange, although pressed on all sides and having lost his outposts, made a most resolute defence, because he had been apprised of the surrender of Quesnoy, and that Beaulieu was on his road to relieve him. At length on the 13th of September he was compelled to evacuate Menin, after having lost upon these different occasions two or three thousand men and forty pieces of cannon. Although our army did not make the most of its position, and although in default of orders from the committee of public welfare it had performed its operations by masses too much detached, yet it managed to occupy Menin. Upon the 15th our army left Menin and marched to Courtray. At Bissegem it fell in with Beaulieu. The battle began favourably enough on our side, but the unlooked for appearance of a division of cavalry bearing upon the wings of our army, caused a panic fear which the circumstances did not justify; every thing was lost and the army fled to Menin. But even this unaccountable rout did not end there; the alarm spread to all the encampments and posts, and the entire army sought refuge under the cannon of Lisle. This panic terror, which we had experienced upon other occasions and as the consequence of the youth and inexperience of our troops, might also have been the effect of a traitorous cry of saute qui peut, deprived us of numerous advantages, and brought us back to Lisle. The receipt of the news of this event at Paris created the most gloomy sensation, caused Houehard the loss of the fruits of his victory, raised against him the most violent prejudices, which partly recoiled against the committee of public welfare itself. A new series of repulses immediately ensued, and threw us back to the same situation of peril from whence we had just for a short time emerged by the victory of Hondschoote.

The Prussians and the Austrians stationed upon the two slopes of the Vosges facing our armies of the Moselle and Rhine, at last commenced making some movements of a serious nature. Old Wurmser, more animated than the Prussians, and perceiving the advantages derivable from the passes of the Vosges, resolved to occupy the important post of Bodenthal in the direction of the Upper-Lauter. In short, he put a division of four thousand men in the greatest jeopardy, who had to pass over most frightful crags before they could occupy Bodenthal. The representatives of the army of the Rhine, who on their part assented to the general impulse which in every quarter had resolved upon calling increased energy into action, now ordered that a general sally should be made from the encampments of Weissenburg on the 11th of September. The three generals, Desaix, Dubois, and Michaud, simultaneously charged the Austrians, but exerted themselves ineffectually and were brought back within the lines. The movements directed particularly against the Austrian division posted at Bodenthal were totally unsuccessful. Nevertheless, they prepared for a fresh attack on the 14th. While General Ferrette should march upon Bodenthal, the army of the Moselle putting itself in motion upon the opposite slope was to attack Pirmasens, situated on the side corresponding to Bodenthal, and where Brunswick was posted with a part of the Prussian army. This attack of General Ferrette was perfectly successful, our soldiers assaulted the posts of the Austrians with a most heroic disregard of the danger, carried them, and recovered the important pass of Bodenthal. But it was far otherwise on the reverse of the slope. Brunswick had been fully aware of the importance of Pirmasens, which closed the passes, he had a considerable force and had taken up most excellent positions. While the army of the Moselle was turning itself on the Sarre so as to face the rest of the Prussian army, twelve thousand men were detached from Hornbach upon Pirmasens. The only chance the French had was to carry Pirmasens by surprise, but being perceived and smartly received with grape-shot on their earliest movement in that direction, they could but retreat. This was what the general judged best, but the representatives thought otherwise, and they ordered an assault to be made by the three columns, and by the three ravines which terminated at the height on which Pirmasens is situated. Already our soldiers, thanks to their intrepidity, were far advanced, the column on the right was even ready to clear the ravine in which it marched, and to fall round upon Pirmasens, when a cross fire pointed against both flanks unexpectedly overwhelmed it. Our soldiers at first stood their ground, but the firing increased, and, in short, they were brought back along the ravine in which they had been fighting. The other columns fell back much in the same manner, and they all fled along the valleys in the utmost confusion. The army was obliged to get back to the position from whence it had started. Fortunately for us, the Prussians did not care to pursue the fugitives, and did not take possession of the camp at Hornbach, which the army had quitted in order to march upon Pirmasens. This affair caused us a loss of twenty-two pieces of cannon, four thousand killed, wounded, or prisoners. This repulse of the 14th of September might have produced important results. The allies encouraged by this success began to put all their forces in motion, they prepared to march in the direction of the Sarre and the Lauter, and thus to dispossess us of the encampments of Weissenburg.

The siege of Lyons was not prosecuted very vigorously. The Piedmontese in debouching by the upper Alps into the valleys of Savoy had effected a diversion, and compelled Dubois-Cranec and Kellermann to divide their forces. Kellermann had conveyed himself into Savoy. Dubois-Cranec, who remained before Lyons, insufficiently supplied as he was, was showering to no purpose iron and fire upon that unhappy city, which having made up its mind to undergo every extremity, was no longer to be reduced by the terrors of blockade and bombardment, but only by an assault.

At the Pyrenees we had recently experienced a bloody defeat. Our troops had been remaining during the late events in the environs of Perpignan, the Spaniards kept within their camp at Mas-d'Eu. As they mustered strong, were of a warlike temperament, and under efficient command, they were animated and confident. We have already given a description of this theatre of war. The two valleys of the Tech and the Tet forming nearly parallel lines with each other, diverge from the great chain and spread out towards the sea; Perpignan lies in the latter of these valleys. Ricardos had crossed the first line of the Tech, inasmuch as he had got to Mas-d'Eu, and he had resolved to pass the Tet considerably above Perpignan, so as to be able to get behind that place and compel our army to abandon it. In order to effect this, he first considered as to possessing himself of Villefranche. This small fortified town, situated high on the course of the Tet, would protect his left wing from the intrepid Dagobert, who with three thousand men was making progress in Cerdagne. Consequently towards the commencement of August he detached general Crespo with some battalions. This man had only to present himself before

Ville-franche, for the cowardly commandant opened the gates to receive him. Crespo left a garrison in charge of the place and went to rejoin Ricardos. In the mean time, Dagobert with a very small body of men overrun all Cerdagne, drove back the Spanish up to the Sen-d'Urgel, and even had it in contemplation to make them retreat to Campredon. Nevertheless, the weakness of Dagobert's detachment and the fortress of Ville-franche made Ricardos dismiss all apprehensions as to the advantages obtained by the French over the left wing of his army, and therefore Ricardos continued to act upon the offensive. On the 31st of August he made threatening movements against our camp at Perpignan, crossed the Tet above Soler, and then drove before him the right wing of our army, which made its retreat to Salces, some leagues behind Perpignan, and very near the sea. In this position, the French army, one part shut up in Perpignan, and another part pent up at Salces, having the sea at their backs, found themselves in a most perilous situation. Dagobert certainly was gaining fresh advantages in Cerdagne, but these were not of sufficient importance to alarm Ricardos. The representatives Fabre and Cassigne, who had retired with the army to Salces, resolved to call Dagobert on the dismissal of Barbantane, with a view to restore the influence of fortune over our flags. While they were awaiting the arrival of the new general they planned a combined movement, to be executed between Salces and Perpignan, to extricate ourselves from this perilous situation. They gave orders that one column should advance to Perpignan and attack the Spaniards in the rear, while themselves, shifting their position, should charge the enemy in front. In point of fact, on the 15th of September general Davoust issued from Perpignan, with six or seven thousand men, while Perpignan advanced in the direction of Salces upon the Spaniards. Upon a given signal they throw themselves forward upon both sides of the enemy's camp; the Spaniards pressed on all sides were obliged to take refuge the other side of the Tet, leaving behind them in their flight twenty-six pieces of cannon. They immediately re-stationed themselves at the camp of the Mas-d'Eu, from whence they had started upon this bold but ill-starred expedition.

While these events were taking place Dagobert arrived, and this warrior, who at the age of seventy-five combined the spirit of a young man with the consummate experience of an old general, lost no time in making his arrival known by an attempt upon the camp at Mas-d'Eu. He divided his attack into three columns. The first was to set out from our right, and marching by Thuir upon Sainte-Colombe was to get in the rear of the Spaniards; the second moving from the centre was to attack the enemy in front and overthrow them; and lastly, the third, directing its operations towards the left, was to station itself in a wood and cut off the enemy's retreat. This latter, under the command of Davoust, made a lame attack and fled in confusion. The Spaniards were then enabled to bring all their forces to bear upon the two other columns of the centre and the right. Ricardos assuming that all the danger was to the right, brought thither his most effective forces and contrived to defeat the French. In the centre, by himself, Dagobert encouraging every one by his presence, carried the entrenchments which were before him, and was himself nearly deciding the victory, when Ricardos returning with his troops flushed with success both on the right and left, overwhelmed his enemy by his combined forces. Nevertheless, the intrepid Dagobert still held out, until a battalion threw down its arms, shouting forth, God save the king! (Vive le roi.) Dagobert indignant, turned two pieces of artillery upon the traitors, and while he thundered these against them, he rallied round him a handful of the brave men who yet remained true to the cause, and got off with some hundred men, for the enemy, who were intimidated by his daring behaviour, did not venture to pursue him.

Certain it was that this brave general deserved nothing but a laurel wreath for his manly bearing under such reverses, and if the left column had behaved better, and if his battalions of the centre had not dispersed themselves, his arrangements would have been followed by the most absolute success. Nevertheless, the gloomy distrust of the representatives imputed this misfortune to him. Stung to the quick by this injustice, he returned to take the subordinate command of the Cerdagne. Our army, therefore, was once more driven back upon Perpignan, and placed in danger of losing the important line of the Tet.

The plan of the campaign of the 2nd of September had been executed in La Vendée. The division of Mentz was, as we have seen, to commence operations by Nantes. The committee of public welfare, who had received intelligence of an alarming nature as to the designs the English entertained upon the west, in every respect approved of the idea of bringing the most effective forces to bear upon the coasts. Rossignol and his party took great umbrage at this, and wrote letters to the ministry which did not lead them to expect a very fervid co-operation in the arrangements as settled. The division of Mentz therefore marched to Nantes, where it was received with great demonstrations of satisfaction and welcomed by fêtes. A banquet was prepared for them, and before they partook of it they prepared themselves for the festive occasion by a sharp skirmish with the enemy's parties scattered on the banks of the Loire. If the column of Nantes had congratulated themselves on being joined with the famous army of Mentz, the latter was not less satisfied in serving under the brave Canclaux and with his division, who had already earned a high reputation by the defence of Nantes and by a multitude of brave exploits. In accordance with the arranged plan, several columns starting from every point of the theatre of war were to join at the centre and there crush the enemy. Canclaux, general of the army of Brest, starting from Nantes was to go down by the left bank of the Loire, wheel round the wide lake of Grand-Lieu, sweep the Lower Vendée, then go up towards Maellecoul and arrive at Leger on the 11th or the 12th. His arrival at this latter point was the signal of departure for the columns of the army of La-Rochelle, who were commissioned to make war on the country by the south and the east. It will be recollected that the army of La-Rochelle under the orders of Rossignol the commander-in-chief was composed of several divisions; the division of Sables was commanded by Mieszkowski, that of Luçon by Belfroy, that of Niort by Chalbos, that of Saumur by Santerre, that of Angers by Duhouse. At the instant that Canclaux should arrive at Léger, the column of Sables was to be ordered to put itself in motion, to be at Saint-Fulgent on the 13th, at Herbiers on the 14th, and finally on the 16th to be with Canclaux at Mortagne. The columns of Luçon and of Niort were by supporting each other to advance towards Bressuire and Argenton, and to have reached that height on the 14th; lastly, the columns of Saumur and Angers, starting from the Loire ought also to arrive on the 14th in the neighbourhood of Vihiers and Chomillé. Thus according to this plan the whole country would be completely scoured from the 14th to the 16th, and the rebels would shortly be enclosed by the republican columns between Mortagne, Bressuire, Argenton, Vihiers, and Chomillé. Their destruction would then be inevitable.

It has been already observed that the Vendéans, having been twice driven back from Luçon with considerable loss, had a strong desire to have their revenge. They mustered all their strength before the republicans had executed their plans, and while Charette laid siege to the camp of Naudières in the neighbourhood of Nantes, they attacked the division of Luçon, which had marched so far as Chantonay. These two assaults took place on the 5th of September. The assault of Charette upon the camp of Naudières was repelled, but the attack upon Chantonay being unforeseen and also well managed, threw the republicans into the greatest confusion. The youthful and brave Mareau performed prodigies of valour in order to avert a defeat, but his division, after having lost its baggage and artillery, retreated pêle mêle to Luçon. This repulse was calculated to operate prejudicially against the settled plan, because the disorganization of one of the columns left an empty space between the division of Sables and that of Niort; but the representatives used the most active exertions to form this column anew, and couriers were despatched to Rossignol to apprise him of the circumstance.

All the Vendéans were at this time collected together at Herbiers under the command of Elbée their generalissimo. Like their opponents, they had their mutual bickerings, for the heart of man is every where the same, and nature does not exclusively appropriate purity of motive and every species of virtue to one party, and leave nothing but pride, selfishness, and the practice of vice to the other. The Vendémiaire leaders had their jealousies of each other in precisely the same manner as the republicans. The generals exhibited but little respect for the superior council, which affected a character of sovereignty. Being in possession of substantive power, they were by no means disposed to implicitly obey a power which owed its factitious existence to their own act. In particular, they were envious of d'Elbée the commander-in-chief, and asserted that Bonchamps was far better qualified to have the absolute command. For his part, Charette desired to remain the sole master of Lower Vendée. They were therefore little disposed to freely communicate their opinions with each other, and to concert the means of defending themselves from the republicans. An intercepted dispatch had just made them acquainted with the designs of their enemies. Bonchamps was the only one amongst their generals who proposed a bold line of conduct, and distinguished himself by enlarged views. He was of opinion that it would not long be practicable for them to defend themselves from the republican forces collected together in La Vendée; that it now became a matter of urgent necessity for them to tear themselves from these forests and ravines, wherein they would be buried to all eternity, without knowing who their allies were, or being even known to them; consequently his advice was, that instead of exposing themselves to certain destruction, they had much better march forth in close column from La Vendée and proceed to Brittany, where their presence would be desirable, and where the republic did not expect an attack would be made. His counsel also was, that they should march even to the sea side, seize upon a seaport, put themselves into communication with the English, there receive an emigrant prince, and from thence convey themselves to Paris, and thus carry on the war both offensively and defensively. This advice, which is said to have emanated from Bonchamps, was not adopted by the Vendéans, whose views were always contracted, and who on all occasions evinced the strongest repugnance to quit their native country. All that their leaders seemed to think about was how to divide the country into four districts, that they might singly exercise unlimited power within the same. Charette was to have had the Lower Vendée, M. de Bonchamps the banks of the Loire in the environs of Angers, M. de La Rochejaquelein the remaining portion of Upper Anjou, and M. de Lescaur the whole of the district of Poitou at that time in actual rebellion. M. d'Elbée was to retain his empty title of generalissimo, and the superior council its factitious authority.

Upon the 9th, Canclaux put himself in motion, but left a strong reserve under the command of Grouchy and Haxo at the camp of Naudières, in order to protect Nantes, and conducted the column of Mentz in the direction of Léger. In the meantime, the former army of Brest, under the command of Beyer, making the circuit of Lower Vendée by Pornic, Bourneuf, and Machecoul, was to fall in at Léger with the column of Mentz.

These movements, emanating from Canclaux, were carried into effect without any difficulty. The Mentz column, whose advanced guard was commanded by Kléber, and the main body by Aubert-Dubayet, drove all its antagonists out of the field. Kléber with his advanced guard, in a spirit of loyalty and heroism, compelled all his soldiers to encamp themselves anywhere but in the villages, in order to prevent acts of plunder. "As we passed," said he, "in front of the delightful lake of Grand-Lieu, we observed the most beautiful landscapes, and also bursts of scenery equally charming and diversified. Upon an immense open pasturage appeared innumerable flocks and herds without even a shepherd. I could not repress the bitterness of soul I experienced when I contemplated the fate of these unfortunate inhabitants, who, led astray and deluded by their priests, rejected the blessings held out to them under the new order of things, in order to rush upon inevitable destruction." Kléber did his utmost to protect the country from the soldiery, and in most cases he was successful. A commission of civilians had been attached to the staff to carry into execution that decree of the 1st of August, which gave order for laying waste the country and removing the population to some other place. The soldiers were forbidden to set fire to any thing, and the work of destruction was to be effected solely under the direction of the generals and the civil commission.

On the 14th they arrived at Leger, and the column of Mentz at that place fell in with that of Brest commanded by Beysser. Meanwhile the column of Sables under the orders of Mieszkowski had advanced to Saint-Fulgent, according to the prescribed plan, and had already communicated with the army of Canclaux. The column of Luçon, momentarily retarded by the defeat it experienced at Chantonay, had been lagging in the rear, but by the zealous exertions of the representatives who had appointed a new general, Bessroy, it was again advancing. The column of Niort had got so far as Châteauneuf. Thus although the general movement had been delayed one or two days upon every point, and although Canclaux had not reached Leger till the 14th, where he ought to have arrived on the 12th, the same delay occurred with respect to every one of the columns, the unity of action was not disturbed, and they were enabled to pursue the execution of the plan of the campaign. But in this interval, the news of the defeat experienced by the division of Luçon reached Saumur; Rossignol, Ronsin, and the whole staff, had conceived the greatest alarm, and being apprehensive that similar mischances might befall the two other columns of Niort and Sables, of whose strength they felt themselves by no means assured, they decided upon bringing them back to their former posts. This was one of the most misadvised orders possible, yet it by no means emanated from a traitorous imagination, or with the intention of exposing Canclaux or the wing of his army, but they entertained no confidence in his plan, and were but too ready upon the appearance of the slightest obstacle to declare it impracticable and throw it up. It was doubtless the same motive which actuated the staff of Saumur in issuing orders for the retrograde movement of the columns of Niort, Luçon, and Sables.

Canclaux in following his march had obtained fresh advantages, he had made an attack upon Montaigu on three points: Kléber by the Nantes road, Aubert-Dubayer by the Roche-Servière road, and Beysser by the road of Saint-Fulgent, all three fell upon it at one and the same time, and soon effected a dislodgment of the enemy. Upon the 17th Canclaux took Clisson, and not hearing of Rossignol, he resolved to halt, and to confine himself to reporting what had been done, and to await further instructions.

Canclaux therefore established himself in the environs of Clisson, left Beysser at Montaigu, and expedited Kléber with the advanced guard to Torfou, whither he arrived on the 18th. The counter order issued from Saumur reached the division of Niort, and had been communicated to the other divisions of Luçon and Sables; they had immediately retreated, and by their retrograde movement had amazed the Vendéans and grievously embarrassed Canclaux. The Vendéans were about one hundred thousand strong. An immense number of them had collected in the direction of Vihiers and Chemillé, facing the columns of Saumur and Angers; a still greater number in the neighbourhood of Clisson and Mortagne were on Canclaux's hands. When the columns of Angers and Saumur saw how numerous they were, they said that it was the Mentz army that threw them upon their hands, and complained bitterly against that plan of operations which exposed them to the onset of so formidable an enemy. This complaint was without foundation, and the Vendéans had from all quarters turned out in such numbers that the republicans had quite enough to do to keep their ground. On the same day, so far from falling upon the columns of Rossignol, they bent their course against Canclaux; and d'Elbée and Lescaur quitted the Upper Vendée to meet the Mentz army.

By a remarkable complexity of events, Rossignol when he heard of the successes of Canclaux, who had advanced into the heart of La Vendée, countermanded his first orders to retreat, and ordered his columns to bring themselves forward to the point they had left. The columns of Saumur and Angers stationed at his side were the first to engage the enemy, with whom they had some skirmishing, one column at Doué, and the other at the bridges of Cé. The advantage on each side was nearly equal. On the 18th, the column of Saumur, under the command of Santerre, were about to advance from Vihiers to a small village named Coron. By some mismanagement, artillery, cavalry, and infantry were confusedly jammed together in the streets of this village, which lay low. Santerre endeavoured to remedy this blunder, and ordered the troops to fall back, in order to put them in order for fighting upon a neighbouring eminence; but Ronsin, who in Rossignol's absence arrogated to himself the supreme command, found fault with Santerre for ordering a retreat, and opposed it. At this very time, the Vendéans poured down on the republicans, and a most awful confusion in the entire division was the consequence. This division contained many men of the recent enlistments raised at the sound of the tocsin, and these retreating in disorder, it became nothing else than a confused flight from Coron to Vihiers, Doué, and Saumur. On the next day, the 19th, the Vendéans marched against the division of Angers, commanded by Duhoux. With the same good fortune that had favoured them the preceding day, they drove back the republicans beyond Erigné, and again possessed themselves of the bridges of Cé.

Upon the quarter where Canclaux remained there was the same hard fighting. The same day twenty thousand Vendéans stationed at the environs of Torfou fell upon Kléber's advance guard, which did not consist of more than two thousand men. Kléber placed himself in the midst of his soldiers, and supported them against this rush of assailants. The ground where he had taken his stand was a road commanded by heights, but notwithstanding the disadvantageous nature of the position, he managed to effect a well-conducted and orderly retreat. However, a piece of artillery having fallen from its carriage, a slight confusion was the consequence, and his brave fellows were for the first time about to give ground. Kléber seeing this, stationed an officer with a few soldiers near a bridge, and said to them: My friends, you must defend this even to death. This command was obeyed with the most heroic intrepidity. In the meantime the main body came up and renewed the fight, the Vendéans at last were driven back a great distance, and gained nothing by their transitory advantages.

All these events took place on the 19th; the order to advance, which had been of so little service to the two divisions of Saumur and Angers, had not yet, by reason of the distance, been transmitted to the columns of Luçon and Niort. Beysser was constantly at Montaigu, forming the right wing of Canclaux's army and remaining exposed. Canclaux, who desired to make use of Beysser as a shelter for himself, sent him orders to quit Montaigu and draw nearer to the main body. He directed Kléber to advance in the direction of Beysser, in order to cover his movement. Beysser, who was too careless, had left his column badly protected at Montaigu. MM. de Lescauro and Charette came on him by surprise, and but for the intrepidity of two battalions, who by their steadiness interrupted the rapidity of the pursuit and the retreat, this column would have been utterly annihilated. The artillery and baggage were lost, and the wreck of this column made the best of their way to Nantes, where they were welcomed by the brave reserved force stationed there to protect the town. Canclaux then made up his mind to retrograde, so that he should no longer remain en flèche in the country and exposed to every attack of the Vendéans. He managed to effect his retreat to Nantes with his brave Mayençais, who had not suffered, owing to their commanding appearance, as well as to the refusal of M. Charette, who would not join with MM. d'Elbée and de Bonchamps in pursuing the republicans.

The cause which marred the success of this fresh expedition against La Vendée is plain enough. The staff of Saumur had expressed dissatisfaction with the arrangement which allotted the column of Mentz to Canclaux; the defeat of the 5th of September afforded the staff a sufficient pretext to distrust and countermand this arrangement. A counter order was immediately given to the columns of Sables, Luçon, and La Rochelle. Canclaux, who had so far advanced without being attacked, thus found himself exposed, and the defeat of Torfou rendered his position still more critical. In the meantime, the army of Saumur, on gaining advices of his progress, marched from Saumur and Angers to Vihiers and Chemillé, and if this army had not been so utterly in disorder, it is very probable that the retreat of the wings would not have marred the complete success of the enterprise. Thus the extreme readiness to countermand a settled arrangement, the faulty organization of the new levies, together with the strength of the Vendéans, who were more than one hundred thousand strong, were the main causes of these fresh disasters. Indeed, there was neither treason on the part of the staff of Saumur, or defect in the arrangement of Canclaux. The effect of these reverses was to us most fatal, for the renewed defence made by La Vendée revived all the hopes of the counter-revolutionists, and peculiarly augmented the dangers to which the republic was subject. In short, if no impression had been made upon the armies of Brest and Mentz, the army of Rochelle would have found itself once more disorganised, and all the recruits accruing from the levy en masse, would have gone back to their friends under a deep sense of failure.

The two parties in the army seemed anxious to lose no time in reproaching each other. Philippeaux, always very intemperate, wrote to the committee of public safety a letter couched in the most indignant terms, wherein he imputed treason to the countermand sent to the columns of the army of Rochelle. Choudieu and Richard the commissaries for Saumur, answered in quite as injurious language, and Ronsin hurried to the ministry and the committee of public welfare, to expose the defects in the arrangements for the campaign. Canclaux, said he, having brought greater masses than necessary into action, in Lower Vendée, had thrown back upon Upper Vendée the entire bulk of the rebellious population, and thus had induced the defeat of the columns of Saumur and of Angers. Lastly, repelling aspersions by aspersions, Ronsin answered the imputation of treason by that of aristocracy, and at once denounced the two armies of Brest and Mentz, as being filled with suspected persons and evil disposed characters. Thus it was that the animosity of the Jacobin party was becoming more and more embittered against that party, who was resolved upon maintaining discipline and the regular conduct of war.

The news of the unaccountable rout at Menin, the ineffective and sanguinary attack upon Pirmasens, the defeats experienced at the Eastern-Pyrenees, the disastrous termination of the renewed expedition against La Vendée, all came to Paris about the same time, and produced the most gloomy sensation in that quarter. The intelligence successively came to hand from the 18th to the 25th of September, and according to what had been already experienced, fear provoked violence. We have already observed, that the most fervid agitators assembled at the Cordeliers, where there was even less occasion for reserve than at the Jacobins, and these agitators governed the war department under the weak-minded Bouchotte. Vincent was their leader at Paris, just as Ronsin was in La Vendée, and they seized upon this opportunity to renew their oft-repeated grievances. Being rendered independent of the convention, they would willingly have got rid of its inconvenient authority, an authority which crossed their measures when with the armies in the persons of the representatives, and at Paris in the committee of public welfare. The representatives in commission did not permit them to carry out the revolutionary measures with all the violence they desired; the committee of public welfare, directing with sovereign authority every operation according to the most elevated and just views, was constantly thwarting them, and this was the obstacle that of all others fretted them the most; therefore they not unfrequently entertained the idea of establishing a new executive power in accordance with the mode adopted by the constitution.

To have enforced the constitution in all its rigour, a course repeatedly and mischievously called for by the aristocrats, would have been a very dangerous measure. It would necessarily have required new elections, substituted another assembly for the convention; this assembly must, as a self-evident proposition, have been deficient in experience, not commanded the respect of the country, and would have at once comprehended within itself every one of the factions. The revolutionary enthusiasts clearly apprehending this danger, abstained from pressing for a renewal of the national representation, but yet demanded that the constitution should be put in force so far as it accorded with their views. As nearly all of them held office in the bureaux, all they wanted was the formation of a constitutional ministry, which should be independent of the legislative authority, and consequently be independent of the committee of public welfare. Vincent therefore had the audacity to frame a petition addressed to the Cordeliers, thereby demanding the organization of a constitutional ministry and the recall of the deputies in commission. The excitement this caused was one of the most animated scenes ever witnessed. It was in vain that Legendre, the friend of Danton, and already classed with those whose energy appeared to be getting lukewarm, opposed this petition, and indeed it was adopted, with the exception of that article that required the recall of the representatives on commission. The benefit derived from these representatives was so great, and there was in this article something so personal against the members of the convention, that they did not venture to persist in retaining it. This Petition caused considerable disturbance in Paris, and seriously diminished the rising authority of the committee of public welfare.

Besides these intemperate opponents, this Committee had still many more among the new moderatists, who were accused of reviving the system of the Girondists and of thwarting the energy of the revolution. This party, who openly condemned the Cordeliers, the Jacobins, and the disorganizers of the armies, never ceased to urge their complaints to the committee, nay, even reproached it for not being sufficiently severe in condemning the anarchists.

The committee therefore had opposed to it the new parties who now began to form themselves. As usual, these parties took advantage of adverse events in order to found an accusation against the committee, and both of them having agreed in condemning its acts, passed their opinions thereupon after their own fashion.

The total defeat of the 15th at Menin had already been made known; and the late events in La Vendée began to be confusedly so. There was a vague intelligence of a defeat at Coron, Torfou, and at Montaigu. Thuriot, who had declined being a member of the committee of public welfare, and who was accused of being one of the new moderatists, spoke in strong terms at the opening of the sitting against the intriguers and the disorganizers who had been very recently making some novel and very arbitrary proposals upon the subject of articles of consumption. "Our committee and the executive council," said he, "are harassed and surrounded by a nest of intriguers, who only profess patriotism as a matter of private gain to themselves. Yes, the time has come, when we must drive away these men of

rapine and incendiarism, who only consider the revolution as created for them, while the good man and the upright uphold it solely for the good of the human race." The propositions, which were opposed by Henriot, were rejected. Briez, one of the commissaries despatched to Valenciennes, next read a critical essay upon the military operations. He maintained that no other than a dilatory war, and in fact a war totally inconsistent with the French character, had been carried on; that the war had been carried on bit by bit, by insignificant masses, and that it was to this system that the reverses we had suffered were to be imputed. Then, without openly attacking the committee of public welfare, he appeared to insinuate that this committee had not let the convention know every thing; and that, for example, there had been near Douay a corps of six thousand Austrians, who might have been every one taken, but this had not been done. The convention after having heard Briez added him to the committee of public welfare. At this instant there came particular intelligence from La Vendée, contained in a letter from Montaigu. These alarming details occasioned a general burst of feeling. "Instead of being daunted," cries one of the members, "let us swear to save the republic." At these words the whole assembly rose and swore once more to save the republic, whatever might be the perils that environed it. The members of the committee of public welfare, who had not yet come, at that very moment entered. Barrère, the reporter in ordinary, addressed the assembly. "Every suspicion levelled against the committee of public welfare will be a victory gained by Pitt. We ought not to give our enemies the greatest of all advantages, that of ourselves vilifying the power commissioned for our special protection." Barrère next made the assembly acquainted with the measures taken by the committee. "For some days past," he continued, "the committee has had reason to believe that great miscarriages were committed at Dunkirk, where we could have cut off the English to the last man, as well as at Menin, where no exertion was made to counteract the extraordinary effects of the panic terror. The committee has dismissed Houchard, as well as the brigadier-general Hédouville, who did not do at Menin what he ought to have done, and therefore it will without loss of time investigate the conduct of these two generals; the committee will next institute a purifying of every one of the staffs and army administrations; the committee has established the fleet upon a footing that will enable it to measure its strength with our enemies; the committee has just now raised eighteen thousand men, it has recently systematised the attack en masse; lastly, it is at Rome itself that Rome is to be assailed, and a hundred thousand men landing on the coasts of England will march to London to strangle the machinations of Pitt. It is unjust then to accuse the committee of public welfare; it has never ceased to deserve that confidence which the convention has always manifested towards it even until now."

Robespierre next spoke. "For a long time," said he, "a desire has manifested itself of scandalizing the convention and that committee which is the depository of her power. Briez, who ought to have died at Valenciennes, left it like a poltroon to go to Paris, and serve Pitt and the allies in vilifying the government. It is not enough," added he, "that the convention still continues to repose confidence in us, she ought to solemnly proclaim it, and communicate her decision to Briez, whom she has just now added to our number." This demand was received with applause, it was ultimately arranged that Briez should not be added to the committee of public welfare, and it was declared by acclamation that this committee still possessed the entire confidence of the national convention.

The moderatists were in the convention, and they had just been defeated, but the most dreaded adversaries of the committee, that is to say, the fervid revolutionists, were to be met with at the Jacobins and at the Cordeliers. It was against the latter that it had to defend itself. Robespierre repaired to the Jacobins and exercised his ascendancy over them; he explained the conduct of the committee, he defended it from the combined attacks of the moderatists and exaggeratists, and demonstrated the dangerous tendency of petitions which demanded the formation of a constitutional ministry. "There must be," said he, "some kind of government to succeed to that which we have destroyed; the system of organising at this very time the constitutional ministry is in fact nothing short of ousting the convention herself, and crumbling her power in the face of the hostile armies. No one else than Pitt could have originated this idea. His agents have propagated it, those agents have seduced sincere patriots; and the credulous and oppressed people, always ready to complain against government, who cannot afford a remedy for every evil, have become the ready echo of their calumnious representations and proposals. Ye Jacobins," exclaimed Robespierre, "too staunch to be gained over, too enlightened to be seduced, you will defend the Mountain that is now assailed; you will uphold the committee of public welfare whom they are desirous of scandalizing in order to ensure your destruction, and in like manner with yourselves will it triumph over all the devices of the enemies of the people."

Robespierre was applauded, and so was the whole committee in his person. The Cordeliers were brought back to order, their petition was no more thought of, and Vincent's attack, victoriously repelled, produced no result whatever.

However, it became a matter of urgency that some course should be adopted in respect of the new constitution. To abandon the government to the new-fangled revolutionists, equivocal and unknown as they were, and in all probability divided against themselves, as being the offspring of all those factions deriving their existence from the convention, would have been a perilous affair. It therefore became necessary to inform all parties that the government would possess itself of the supreme power; and before the republic would be left entirely to her own guidance, and to the operation of those laws which had been laid down for her governance, she would be governed revolutionarily until she should be saved. Numerous petitions had already exhorted the convention to continue at her post. On the 10th of October, Saint-Just, speaking in the name of the committee of public welfare, proposed a new form of government. He drew a very mournful picture of France; he made the gloomy colours of his morbid imagination predominate in this picture; and by the aid of his rare talent, and by the assistance of facts in other respects perfectly true, he produced a species of terror in the minds of those he addressed. He therefore presented, and caused to be adopted, a decree which involved the following propositions. By the first article, the government of France was declared to be revolutionary until peace, signifying thereby that the constitution was temporarily suspended; and that an extraordinary dictatorship was constituted to endure till all danger was over. The convention and the committee of public welfare were invested with this dictatorship. "The executive council," said the decree, "the ministers, the generals, and the constituted bodies, are all of them placed under the immediate superintendence of the committee of public welfare, who is to make its report concerning them every eight days. We have already explained how superintendence was converted into supreme authority, because the ministers, generals, and every description of functionaries, finding themselves compelled to submit all their acts to the committee for its approbation, were at last afraid to act upon their own responsibility, and obeyed the orders of the committee itself. It was then said, "Revolutionary laws ought to be executed with dispatch. The indolence of the government having been the cause of the late defeats, the delays in the execution of these laws shall be specifically defined. The commission of any of these delays shall be punished as a crime against liberty." Regulations in respect of articles of consumption were appended to these government measures, for bread is the people's right, as Saint-Just observed. The tabular statement of articles of consumption, when finally settled, was to be transmitted to the authorities. The victualling stock of the departments was to be estimated, and secured as closely as possible; as to the superfluous quantity that might remain in any department, it was made subject to be called into requisition, either for the armies, or for those provinces where there happened to be a deficiency. These requisitions were regulated by a commission for victualling. Paris, as a fortified town, was to be victualled for one year, to take effect upon the 1st of March next ensuing. Lastly, it was enacted, that a tribunal should be instituted, where the conduct and property of those who had the administration of the public money should be made amenable.

By this grand and important declaration the government, thus composed of the committee of public welfare, the committee of general safety, and of the extraordinary tribunal, found itself perfect and maintainable so long as the danger lasted. It was, in point of fact, to declare that the revolution was in a state of siege, and to apply thereto the extraordinary rules of such a state of things, so long as it should last. To this extraordinary government were added several institutions which had long been called for, and had now become a matter of necessary consequence. A call was made for a revolutionary army, that is to say, a force specially employed to execute the orders of government in the interior. It had, in fact, been decreed long since, and was at length constituted by a new decree*. This army was to be composed of six thousand men, and twelve hundred cannoneers. It was not to be stationary, and was to repair from Paris to any town where its presence might be required, and there to remain as a garrison at the expense of the wealthier inhabitants. The Cordeliers wanted one for every department; but this was not agreed to, upon the ground that to accord to each department an army specially appropriated for itself, would be nothing else than a return to federalism. The same Cordeliers further required, that each detachment of the revolutionary army should have in its train a guillotine mounted on wheels. Every species of extravagance gains ascendancy in the public mind when once it becomes unrestrained. The convention refused to listen to these demands, and abided by what she had already decreed. Bouchotte, who was entrusted with the formation of this army, enlisted for its service the greatest vagabonds in Paris, and who were ready to do whatever the ruling power required of them. He composed the staff entirely of Jacobins, especially the Cordeliers; he hurried Ronsin away from La Vendée and from Rossignol, in order to put him at the head of this revolutionary army. He submitted the list of this staff to the Jacobins, and subjected each officer to the test of the ballot. In point of fact, not one of them had his appointment confirmed by the minister, until he had been approved of by this club.

To the institution of the revolutionary army was lastly added the act against suspected persons, so frequently called for, and the principle whereof was allowed, the same day that the levy en masse was enacted. Although the revolutionary tribunal was in a manner calculated to provide against ordinary probabilities, yet it was by no means satisfactory to the revolutionary imagination. There yet lingered the desire of imprisoning those whom they could not put to death, and there was also a call for regulations which should permit their persons to be secured. That decree, which put the aristocrats out of the pale of the law was too vague, and moreover, it required a trial of the party. Now what was required was, that upon the mere denunciation of the revolutionary committee, a suspected individual should at once be cast into prison. In fact, there was passed a decree for the provisional arrest until the peace, of every suspected individual*. Those who were deemed such were, 1. Those who by their conduct, or by their connexions, or by their language or writings, were declared partisans of tyranny, federalism, and opposed to liberty; 2. Those who were unable to give an account, in the form proscribed by the act of the 20th of March previous, of their means of livelihood, and their performance of their civic duties; 3. Those who had declined to take out certificates of civism; 4. Public functionaries, either suspended or dismissed from their functions by the national convention, and by its commissaries; 5. The ci-devant nobles, the husbands, wives, fathers, mothers, sons, or daughters, and the agents of the emigrants, who had not continually manifested their adherence to the revolution; 6. Those who had emigrated in the interval of the 1st of July, 1789, to the proclamation of the act of the 8th of April, 1792, although they might have returned to France within the time allowed.

The prisoners were to be detained in the national buildings, and kept at their own charges, and they were permitted to move to these places of custody such furniture as they required. The committees authorized to order the arrest could only act by a majority, and were bound to transmit to the committee of general safety the list of suspected persons and the cause assigned for each arrest. Their functions becoming from this period of a very onerous nature, and almost incessant, occupied the whole time of the members just as a profession would have done, consequently it was but right they should be paid. Thenceforward they received a salary as an indemnification.

To these regulations, upon the urgent requirement of the commune of Paris, was yet added one more, and the last, which rendered this act against suspected persons more formidable than ever, and that was, the revocation of that decree which prohibited domiciliary visits being made during the night. From that moment every citizen who had become obnoxious was constantly kept in dread, and had no longer a momentary repose. Suspected persons, by concealing themselves in ingeniously constructed and narrow places of retreat, of which their necessity had suggested the contrivance, had hitherto possessed the liberty of breathing the fresh air at night; however, they could do so no longer, and the arrests, now multiplied both by day and night, soon filled every prison throughout France.

The sectional assemblies were held every day, but the common people could not find time to attend them, and as they were absent, revolutionary motions were no longer carried. It was therefore arranged at the express instance of the Jacobins and of the commune, that these assemblies should be held but twice a week, and that each citizen who assisted therein by his presence should be paid forty sous for each sitting. This certainly was the most effectual mode of gaining over the people, the not calling them too frequently together, and paying them for their attendance. The fervid revolutionists were irritated because some limits were set to their political fanaticism, by restricting the sittings of the sections to two a week. They therefore prepared a very inflammatory petition, complaining that the rights of the sovereign [people] were infringed, in restricting them from meeting together so often as they chose. It was young Varlet who was the originator of this petition; it was rejected, and no more attention was paid to it than to numerous other requirements emanating from the revolutionary ferment that prevailed.

Thus the machine was perfect in respect of two considerations of the greatest importance in a jeopardized state, war and police. In the convention, a committee took charge of all military operations, selected the generals and delegates of every description, and was empowered by the decree authorising the permanent requisition, to dispose alike of men and things; and this committee did all this either by its own order or through the medium of representatives sent out upon commission. Under this committee the committee of general safety had the direction of the high police, and made use of it as a means of exercising a superin-tendance of the revolutionary committee appointed in each commune. Individuals who were suspected of hostility or even of indifference to government, were imprisoned upon the slightest grounds; others who were more deeply implicated were stricken by the extraordinary tribunal, but happily these latter were as yet by no means numerous, for this tribunal previous to this period had passed but few condemnations. An army specially appropriated for this purpose, and in every sense of the word a moveable column of gendarmes attached to this system, carried into execution the orders of government, and lastly, the people who were paid for meeting in the sections were always ready to support it. Thus war and police both centred in the committee of public welfare, who being absolute master, having the means of putting into requisition the entire wealth of France, and possessing the power of sending the citizens either to the field of battle or to the scaffold, or into dungeons, became invested, as a means of protecting the revolution, with a supreme and terrible dictatorship. It certainly was obliged to render an account to the convention of its labours every eight days, but this statement was approved of as a matter of course, for condemnatory opinion was the peculiar privilege of the Jacobins, and this committee was master of that club ever since Robespierre's appointment. There was nobody to oppose this power, except it were the modernists who did not go so far, and the new exagerratedists who went much further, but there was little to apprehend from either the one or the other.

We have already seen that Robespierre and Carnot had been appointed to the committee of public welfare in the room of Gasparin and of Thuriot, who were both ill. Robespierre had carried thither his powerful influence, and Carnot his military science. The convention was desirous of joining Danton with his colleague and rival in renown, Robespierre, but Danton, harassed with his labours, and little qualified to enter into the minutiae of administration, and moreover disgusted by the calumnies in which each party indulged, declined an appointment to any committee whatever. He had already done quite enough for the revolution; he had imparted resolution in all time of danger, it was he who had conceived the idea of the revolutionary tribunal, the revolutionary army, the permanent requisition, the tax on wealth, and the allowance of the forty sous a sitting to the members of the sectional committees; in short, every one of those measures, which although practically cruel in their execution, yet imparted to the revolution that energy which effected its salvation, had originated with Danton. It was at this period that Danton began to be considered as no longer so servicable as he had been, for ever since the first invasion by the Prussians, the public had become reconciled to a sense of danger. The vengeance that was in preparation against the Girondists was repugnant to his notions; he had very recently married a young wife to whom he was exceedingly attached, and whom he had endowed with Belgic gold, to use the phrase adopted by his enemies, but according to the testimony of his friends, the compensation money for his abolished office of advocate of the council; he was attacked much in the same way as Mirabeau and Marat with an inflammatory disorder; in short he required rest, and he requested leave of absence to spend some time at Arcis-sur-Aube, there to enjoy the beauties of nature, of which he was passionately fond. He had been recommended to make this temporary retirement as an expedient of putting a stop to the calumnious reports against him. The victory of the revolution would henceforth be accomplished without him; two months of war and energy would suffice for that purpose, and he proposed to himself to return after victory had been attained, to make his mighty voice heard in favour of the vanquished and of a better state of things. Vain illusion, the fruit of indolence and loss of spirits. To abandon for two months, nay for one month, a revolution so rapid in its events, was to become, so far as the revolution was concerned, indifferent and powerless.

Danton, therefore, declined to become a member of the committee of public welfare, and obtained his leave of absence; Billaud-Varennes and Collot-d'Herbois were added to the committee, and carried with him thither, the one his frigid and implacable character, and the other his fiery temper and his influence with the turbulent Cordeliers. The committee of general safety was formed anew, from eighteen members it was reduced to nine, and those known as the most uncompromising.

While the government was thus organizing itself in the most strenuous manner, an increased energy was indicated by all its resolves. The grand measures adopted in the month of August had not yet produced their results. La Vendée, although assailed in a systematic manner, had made a defence. The repulse at Mowin had nearly neutralized the advantage gained by the victory at Hondschote; fresh exertions were still requisite. The revolutionary enthusiasm suggested this idea, that in war as in every thing else, where there is a will there is a way, and for the first time an army was ordered to gain a victory within a limited period.

All the dangers to which the republic was exposed in La Vendée were duly considered. "Destroy La Vendée," Barrère had already said, "and then Valenciennes and Condé will no longer be in the power of the Austrians. Destroy La Vendée, and the English will not trouble themselves further about Dunkirk. Destroy La Vendée, and the Rhine will be freed from the Prussians. Destroy La Vendée, and Spain will find herself harassed and conquered by the southern departments, when acting in unison with the victorious soldiers of Mortagne and Cholet. Destroy La Vendée, and one portion of that army of the interior will go to reinforce that intrepid army of the north, so often betrayed, so frequently disorganized. Destroy La Vendée, and then Lyons will make no further defence, Toulon will rise against the Spanish and the English, and the spirit of Marseilles will again rise to the full height of the republican revolution. Lastly, every blow that you strike against La Vendée will cause a corresponding shock in the rebellious cities, the federalist departments, and on the invaded frontiers. La Vendée, ay La Vendée. It is there that we must strike the blow, between this time and the 20th of October, before the winter, before the roads shall have become impassable, and before the brigands shall be protected by the climate and inclemency of the season.

"The committee in one comprehensive and hasty glance has noted in the few following words all the faults of La Vendée :

"Too many representatives.

"Too much moral disagreement.

"Too many military dissensions.

"Too little discipline when flushed with success.

"Too many mis-statements in the relation of events.

"Too much greediness, and too great avarice in one party of the chief officers and administrative authorities."

In consequence of these observations the convention reduced the number of representatives in commission, consolidated the two armies of Brest and Rochelle under one, styled the army of the west, and gave the command of this army, not to Rosignol or to Caneaux, but to Lecelle, brigadier-general in the division of Luçon. Lastly, the convention settled the day by which the war against La Vendée was to be concluded, and this day was the 20th of October. The following is the proclamation which accompanied the decree*.

"THE NATIONAL CONVENTION TO THE ARMY OF THE WEST.

"Soldiers of Liberty, the brigands of La Vendée must be exterminated before the end of the month of October; the welfare of the country demands it; the nervous irritation of the French people commands it, and their courage ought to accomplish it. The gratitude of the nation will at that period be manifested to those whose valour and patriotism shall have irrevocably established liberty and the republic."

No less prompt and energetic measures were adopted with respect to the army of the north, to efface the recollection of the defeat at Menin, and to ensure future success. Houchard, who had been removed from his command, was put under arrest. General Jourdan, who had commanded the centre at Hondschoote was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the north with that of Ardennes. His orders were to collect at Guise considerable masses, in order to make an irruption upon the enemy. There was but one unvarying clamour against partial attacks. Without taking into consideration either the plan or the operations of Houchard at Dunkirk, they said he was never beaten when he attacked en masse, and this mode of warfare was exclusively insisted upon as being the more suited to the impetuosity of the French character, as the saying was. Carnot had set out for Guise so as to be at the side of Jourdan, and thus carry into execution a new system of warfare entirely revolutionary in its character. Three new commissaries had very recently been added to Dubois-Cranef, who were to make levies en masse, and then make a rush upon Lyons. The generals were ordered to abandon the system of attacking according to the rules of art, but were to assault the rebellious city out of hand. Thus in every quarter increased efforts were made to ensure a victorious termination to the campaign.

But measures of severity always go hand in hand with energy. The process against Custine, too long delayed in the opinion of the Jacobins, was at length commenced, and was conducted with all the violence and barbarity of the new judicial forms of procedure. As yet no commander-in-chief had made his appearance on the scaffold; an eagerness to strike some exalted victim, as well as to make the commanders of the armies quail before the authority of the people, was now manifested; above all, it was looked for that some one of the generals should in his person expiate the defection of Dumouriez, and Custine was fixed upon, as his opinions and sentiments had caused him to be considered as another Dumouriez. The very moment that had been settled to make his arrest, was when, holding the command of the army of the north, he temporarily visited Paris, in order to arrange the plan of his operations with the ministry. He was at first simply thrown into prison, but shortly a decree for transferring him to the revolutionary tribunal was required and granted.

Let us review Custine's campaign on the Rhine. When entrusted with a division of the army, he had found Spire and Worms inefficiently protected, because the allies who were pressing to march against Champagne, had left the wings and the rear of their army exposed. The German patriots flocking from all quarters had offered him their cities: he advanced, took Spire and Worms, which they surrendered to him, passed by Mannheim, which lay on his road, out of consideration for the neutrality of the Elector palatine, and also because he thought he should not easily obtain an entrance there. At length he came to Mentz, made himself master of the place, rejoiced France by his unlooked for conquests, and thus obtained an appointment which rendered him independent of Biron. At this time, Dumouriez had just defeated the Prussians, and made them fall back upon the Rhine. Kellermann was near Trèves. It was Custine's duty then to proceed down the course of the Rhine to Coblenz, to fall in with Kellermann, and thus to make himself master of the whole side of the river. Every reason concurred in favour of this plan. The inhabitants of Coblenz invited Custine, those of Saint-Guard and Rheinfelds also invited him; there is no knowing how far he might have proceeded had he confined himself to the course of the Rhine. It was by no means impossible for him to have gone as low down as Holland. But from the interior of Germany there were other patriots who also invited him, every one imagined from the boldness of his march that he had a hundred thousand men. To advance into the heart of the enemy's country and beyond the Rhine, was more flattering to the imagination and the vanity of Custine. He hurried on to Frankfurt, there to levy forced contributions, and carry his misadvised extortions into effect. There he was again pressed with solicitations. Some hairbrained advisers urged him to proceed as far as Cassel in the heart of the electorate of Hesse, and there seize upon the elector's treasures. The more prudent recommendation of the French government called upon him to return to the Rhine, and to march to Coblenz. But he was deaf to these suggestions, and indulged his dream of exciting a revolution in Germany.

However, Custine was sensible of his dangerous position; he saw plain enough that if the elector broke the neutrality, his rear would be exposed to Mannheim, indeed he would have taken possession of that place which offered itself to him, but he dared not. When upon the point of being attacked at Frankfort, where he was unable to keep his position, he yet was unwilling to leave that city and return to the course of the Rhine; in fact, he could not bring himself to throw up his delusive acquisitions, and concur with the other commanders in marching downwards in the direction of Coblenz. In this situation he was surprised by the Prussians, lost Frankfort, was driven back upon Mentz, hesitated whether he should or should not keep possession of that place, threw into it some of the artillery taken at Strasburg, gave no orders for its being victualled till it was too late, was in the midst of his doubts and fears again taken by surprise by the Prussians, retired from Mentz, and seized with a panic, fancying himself pursued by a hundred and fifty thousand men, retired into Upper Alsacia, almost under the cannon of Strasburg. Posted as he was upon the Upper Rhine with a considerable army, he was well able to have marched against Mentz, and placed them between cross fires, but he durst not do this; at length, becoming ashamed of his inertness, he made the unfortunate attack of the 15th of May, was beaten, and repaid with visible disappointment to the army of the North, where he sealed his own destruction by moderate measures, and by advising very prudently that the army should be left in Caesar's camp, instead of making an unsuccessful assault for the relief of Valenciennes.

Such had been the career of Custine. It exhibited many faults, but proved no treason. His trial was proceeded with, and there were called as witnesses against him the representatives sent upon commission, the agents of the executive power, both of them obstinate opponents of the generals, discontented subalterns, members of the clubs at Strasburg, Mentz, and Cambray, and last of all, the terrible Vincent, that tyrant of the war department under Bouchotte. His trial was nothing else but a clamorous crowd of witnesses, who heaped false and inconsistent charges, charges perfectly inconsistent with true military criticism, but resting solely upon accidental mishaps, for which a general was not to be deemed answerable, and which could never be laid to his charge. Custine replied with a certain tone of military vehemence to all these charges, but he was overwhelmed. The Jacobins of Strasburg told him that he refused to make himself master of the passes of Porentruy, when Lukner had issued orders to that effect; he proved, but to no purpose, that the thing was impracticable. A German reproached him with not having taken Mannheim since he had been invited thither. Custine's excuse was, the neutrality of the Elector, and the extreme difficulty of the thing. The inhabitants of Coblenz, Rheinfels, Darmstadt, Hanau, and all the towns who had invited him to come to them, and whose territories he declined to occupy, generally accused him. As to his refusal to march to Coblenz, his answer was irrelevant, and threw an imputation upon Kellerman, who, as he said, refused to assist him; as to his declining to take the other places, he replied reasonably enough, that every one of the German enthusiasts invited him, and that in order to have satisfied them all, he must have had to occupy a hundred leagues of open country. By a singular inconsistency, while he was blamed for not having taken this town, or for not levying forced contributions from that, it was laid to his charge as a crime, that he had taken Frankfort, pillaged the inhabitants, had not made the necessary arrangements for defending himself against the Prussians, and had thus exposed the French garrison to the chance of being massacred. The brave Merlin of Thionville, who gave evidence against him, justified him in this respect with equal candour and reason. Even had he left, said Merlin, twenty thousand men at Frankfort, he would not have been able to retain possession of it; it was his duty to have withdrawn himself from Mentz, and all that could be laid to his charge in that respect was, that he had not done so sooner. But at Mentz, rejoined a crowd of other witnesses, he had not made the necessary arrangements, he had neither provided victuals nor ammunition, but had only packed the artillery of which he had plundered Strasburg, in order that the Prussians might get it, together with twenty thousand men and two of our deputies. Custine proved that he had issued orders for victualling the place, that the artillery was scarcely sufficient, and that it had not been uselessly accumulated for the purpose of its falling into the hands of the enemy. Merlin supported all the assertions of Custine, but what he would not forgive in him was, his pusillanimous retreat, and his inertness on the Upper Rhine, while the garrison of Mentz were performing prodigies of valour. Custine to this made no reply. He was next charged with having burned the stores of Spire on his retreat; a frivolous charge, for having once been compelled to retreat, it were much better to have burnt the stores than have left them for the enemy. A charge was made against him of having caused some volunteers at Spire to be shot for committing acts of spoliation; to this his answer was, that the convention had approved of the course he had pursued. He was furthermore accused of having spared the Prussians in a marked manner, of having exposed his army to defeat on the 15th of May, of having improperly delayed his return to his command in the North, of having attempted to deprive Lille of its artillery for the purposes of Caesar's camp, of having interposed obstacles to the relief of Valenciennes, of not having made preparations to prevent the landing of the English, charges which vied with each other in absurdity. "Lastly," said his accusers, "you have shown respect to the memory of Louis XVI., you were out of spirits on the 31st of May, you wanted to hang Dr. Hoffman, the president of the Jacobins at Mentz, you have prohibited the circulation in your army of the Père Duchesne and the Mountain Journal newspapers; you have said that Murat and Robespierre were disturbers of the peace, you have surrounded yourself with aristocratic officers, you have never had good republicans at your table." These were deadly accusations, and contained the real grievances for which he was hunted down.

The procedure was extremely protracted; all the charges were of so indefinite a character that the tribunal paused. The daughter of Custine, and a great number of persons who felt deeply for him, had interested themselves very strongly in his behalf; for at this period, great as was the influence of terror, some interest might still be manifested on the behalf of doomed victims. Immediately upon this the revolutionary tribunal itself was denounced to the Jacobins. "It is a most painful task," said Hébert at the Jacobins, "for me to have to denounce an authority of which the patriots had conceived such hopes, which at first merited their confidence, but soon will become their scourge. The revolutionary tribunal is on the point of exculpating a guilty wretch, in whose behalf, it is true, some of the handsomest women in Paris have been stirring heaven and earth. The daughter of Custine, quite as clever an actress as her father was at the head of the armies, is calling upon every body, and promises every thing so that she can but get him off." Robespierre on his part denounced the chicanery and the hankering after the forms of law which had possessed this tribunal, and maintained that were it only for his attempt to strip Lisle of her means of defence Custine deserved to die.

Vincent, one of the witnesses, had ransacked the portfolios of the ministry, and had brought thither the letters and the orders with which Custine was charged as having indited them, and which certainly did not constitute crimes. Fouquier-Tinville concluded by comparing Custine with Dumouriez, and thus sealed the doom of the unfortunate general. "Dumouriez," said he, "had made a rapid march into Belgium in order to abandon it with the like rapidity, and thus deliver it into the hands of the enemy, soldiers, magazines, representatives and all. In the very same manner did Custine march with similar celerity into Germany, left our soldiers to shift for themselves at Frankfort and at Mentz, and would have abandoned to the enemy, together with this latter town, twenty thousand men and two representatives, together with all our artillery, which he had wickedly withdrawn from Strasburg. In the same manner as Dumouriez has he slandered the convention and the Jacobins, and under the pretence of maintaining discipline and good order, he has caused some of our brave volunteers to be shot." This parallel had full weight with the tribunal. Custine for two hours defended his military operations. Tronçon-Ducoudray defended his conduct in his civil as well as in his administrative character, but he made no impression. The tribunal declared the general guilty, to the great joy of the Jacobins and Cordeliers, who filled the hall, and who uttered loud demonstrations of satisfaction. Custine, however, was not unanimously condemned. Upon the three questions put, he had successively against him ten, nine, and eight voices out of eleven. The president having asked him if he had any thing further to say, he looked around him, and not seeing his counsel, he answered, "I have no longer any one to defend me, I die at peace, and am not guilty."

He was executed the next morning. This warrior, whose courage was unquestionable, betrayed great emotion on seeing the scaffold. However, he knelt at the foot of the scaffold, uttered a short prayer, recovered himself, and met his death with firmness. Such was the end of this unfortunate general, who was not deficient either in intelligence or character, but who was inconsistent as well as presumptuous, and committed three grand faults: the first, in departing from his correct line of operation, in betaking himself to Frankfort; the second, in not returning thither, since he was exhorted so to do; and the third was, his timid inactivity during the siege of Mentz. However, none of these faults deserved the punishment of death; but he underwent the punishment which could not be inflicted upon Dumouriez, but which like Dumouriez, he had not called upon himself by vast and guilty projects. His death was a terrible example for every one of the generals, and operated as a signal for their absolute obedience to the orders of the revolutionary government.

After this act of severity, executions were by no means to be the less frequent. The order of the day for expediting the trial of Marie-Antoinette was revived. The impeachment of the Girondists so often called for and never prepared, was laid before the convention. Saint-Just was the person who prepared the impeachment, and the petitions in support of this impeachment, which emanated from the Jacobins, compelled the convention to allow it. It not only included the twenty-two and the members of the commission of twelve, but also seventy-three members of the right side who, since the Mountain had obtained the complete ascendancy, had maintained an absolute silence, and had drawn up a well-known protest against the events of the 31st of May, and the 2nd of June. Some extravagant Mountainers wanted the accusation, in other words, the sentence of death, to include the twenty-two, the twelve, and the seventy-three; but Robespierre dissented from this, and proposed a middle course, and that was to send the twenty-two and the twelve before the revolutionary tribunal, and to put the seventy-three under arrest. It was done as he wished; the doors of the hall were immediately secured, the seventy-three were arrested, and Fouquier-Tinville commanded to take charge of the unfortunate Girondists. Thus it was that the convention, getting more and more tractable, permitted the order for sending to their death a portion of her members to be thus extorted from her. In good sooth, she could no longer parley, for the Jacobins had sent no less than five most imperious applications, one after the other, in order to procure these latter impeachments.

CHAPTER XIV.

CONTINUATION OF THE SIEGE OF LYONS. CAPTURE OF THIS CITY. TERRIBLE DECREE AGAINST THE REBEL LYONNESE—PROGRESS OF THE ART OF WAR; INFLUENCE OF CARNOT.—THE VICTORY OF WAJONGNES. OPENING OF THE BLOCKADE OF MAUREGUE.—THE MILITARY OPERATIONS IN LA VENDEE RESUMED.—THE VICTORY OF CHOLET. FLIGHT AND DISPERSION OF THE VENDEANS BEYOND THE LOIRE.—DEATH OF THEIR PRINCIPAL LEADERS.—DEFEATS ON THE LUINE—LOSS OF THE LINES OF WEISENBURG.

EVERY reverse that we suffered only served to rouse more effectually the revolutionary energy, and this energy it was that produced success. This had always been the case throughout this memorable campaign. Ever since the defeat of Neerwinden up to the month of August a continuous series of disasters had at length called the most desperate exertions into action. The extinguishment of federalism, the defence of Nantes, the victory of Hondschoote, the raising of the siege of Dunkirk, had been the result of these exertions. Fresh reverses at Menin, at Pirinasens, at the Pyrenees, at Torfon and Coron in La Vendée, had begun to stir up an increased energy, which was sure to produce the most decisive successes upon every one of the theatres of war.

The siege of Lyons was, of all the military operations, that of which the result was awaited with the greatest anxiety. We left Dubois-Crancé encamped before this town with five thousand regular troops, and from seven to eight thousand requisitionary recruits. He had every reason to expect that the Sardinians, whom the ill-appointed army of the Great Alps could no longer keep in check, would shortly fall upon his rear. As we have already said, he had stationed himself northward between the Saône and the Rhône, in front of the redoubts of La Croix-Rousse, and not upon the heights of Saint-Foy and Fourvières, situate westward, from which the assault ought in all propriety to have been made. The cause of this preference was founded upon more than one reason. It was above all a matter of importance that he should continue in communication with the Alpine frontier, where the greatest part of the republican army was stationed, and from which quarter the Piedmontese would be enabled to come to the relief of the Lyonnese. In this position, he possessed the further advantage of occupying the upper part of the two rivers, and thus could intercept the supplies which would come down the Saône and the Rhône. True it is, that the west thus continued open to the Lyonnese, and gave them the opportunity of making frequent excursions in the direction of Saint-Etienne and Montbrison; but every day intelligence was received of the forthcoming contingents from the Puy-de-Dôme, and when once he had been joined by these reinforcements, Dubois-Crancé could well complete the blockade on the western side, and then select the most fit point whereon to make his attack. In the meantime, he contented himself by hemming in the enemy, cannonading La Croix-Rousse on the north, and opening his trenches on the east, in front of the bridge of la Guillotière. The conveyance of ammunition was difficult and tardy; in fact, they had to be brought from Grenoble, Fort Barraux, Briançon, and Embrun, and thus traverse sixty leagues of mountainous country. These extraordinary baggage convoys could never indeed have been effected without the assistance of pressing every one into the service, and by putting five thousand horses in motion, for there had to be conveyed to the siege of Lyons fourteen thousand bombs, thirty-four thousand cannon-balls, three hundred thousand pounds of gunpowder, eight hundred thousand cartridges, and one hundred and thirty pieces of artillery.

In the earlier part of the siege intelligence arrived of the march of the Piedmontese, who debouched from the Little Saint-Bernard and from Mount Cenis. Kellermann upon the urgent solicitation of the department of the Isère immediately set out, and left general Dumuy to take his place at Lyons. In point of fact, Dumuy was only his substitute in appearance, for Dubois-Crancé, a representative as also a skilful engineer, directed alone all the operations of the siege. In order to expedite the levy of the supplies from the Puy-de-Dôme, Dubois-Crancé sent off general Nicholas with a small detachment of cavalry, but the latter was taken in the Forez and fell into the hands of the Lyonnese. Dubois-Crancé next despatched in the same direction a thousand disciplined troops, under the command of the representative Javoques. The expedition of the latter was more successful, he repressed the aristocrats of Mont-Brison and Saint-Etienne, and raised from seven to eight thousand peasants, whom he brought back with him to the siege of Lyons. Dubois-Crancé stationed them at the bridge of Oullins, situate to the north-west of Lyons, so as to annoy the communications of that place with the Forez. He caused the deputy Reverchon, who had raised some thousand requisitionaries at Maçon, to draw nearer to him, and stationed him high up the Saône quite to the north. By this the blockade began to be somewhat closer, but the operations were tardy, and assaults were quite out of the question. The fortifications of La Croix-Rousse between the Rhône and the Saône could not be carried by storm. On the eastern side, and upon the left bank of the Rhône, the bridge of Morand was defended by a horse-shoe redoubt, very skilfully constructed. On the west, the important heights of Saint-Foy and Fourvières could not be taken without the assistance of a competent army, and for the present all that was considered necessary was to intercept the supplies, hem in the town and then burn it. From the early part of August to the middle of September, Dubois-Crancé had not been able to make greater progress, and complaints began to be made of his tardiness, without making him every proper allowance. Nevertheless, he had committed great devastations on that ill-fated city. The magnificent palace of Bellecour, the Arsenal, the quarter of St. Clair, the gate of the Temple, had fallen a prey to the flames, which had in particular caused great injury to that fine building the hospital, which towers so majestically above the Rhône. The Lyonnese on their part made the most determined defence. A report had obtained among them, that fifty thousand Piedmontese were about to debouch upon their city, the emigration party made great promises, but by no means identified themselves with the citizens, and these brave characters, sincere republicans as they were, were by their inconsistent position compelled to call for the disastrous and disgraceful aid of the foreign ally. These feelings manifested themselves very strongly on more than one occasion, so as not to be misunderstood. Précy, who had been desirous of hoisting the white flag, soon perceived that course to be impracticable. An obsidional paper currency having been created for the purposes of the siege, and flours-de-lis appearing upon the water-mark of the paper, they were obliged to destroy it, and make another description of paper. Therefore, although the Lyonnese were republicans, yet the terror excited by the vengeance of the convention, the false hopes held out to them by Marseilles, Bordeaux, Caen, and above all by the emigration party, had involved them in a vortex of errors and calamities.

While they were sustaining themselves by the hope of the arrival of fifty thousand Sardinians, the convention had issued orders to the representatives, Couthon, Maignet, and Châteauneuf-Randon, to repair to Auvergne and the neighbouring departments, to effect a levy en masse in that quarter, and Kellermann was losing no time in marching to the valleys of the Alps to meet the Piedmontese.

On this occasion, a fine opportunity presented itself to the Piedmontese for effectuating a bold and masterly attempt, which could not have failed of success: it was to concentrate their principal forces upon the little Saint-Bernard, and from thence to debouch upon Lyons with fifty thousand men. It is well known that the three valleys of Salenche, the Tarentaise, and La Maurienne, lying close to one another, wind in a sort of spiral form, and that commencing from the little Saint-Bernard, they open upon Geneva, Chambéry, Lyons, and Grenoble. A few French divisions were dispersedly posted along these valleys. To make a rapid descent by one of these valleys, and to station themselves at their entrance, would have been a sure method, and in accordance with all scientific principles, of cutting off the detachments engaged in the mountains, and making them lay down their arms. There was little to have apprehended from the attachment of the Savoyards for the French; for the assignments and the requisitions had made them associate the idea of liberty with its charges and severities. The duke of Montferrat, who had the command of this expedition, did not take with him more than twenty to twenty-five thousand men, stationed a division on his right in the valley of Salenche, descended with the main body to the valley of the Tarentaise, and left general Gordon to traverse the valley of La Maurienne with the left wing of his army. So tardy was he in this movement, that it occupied him from the 14th of August into the month of September. The French, although much inferior to him in numerical force, made a vigorous defence, and protracted the retreat for eighteen days. On his arrival at Moutier, the duke of Montferrat was desirous of joining Gordon on the chain of the Grand-Loup, which divides the two valleys of Tarentaise and La Maurienne, for it never occurred to him to make a quick march upon Conflans, the point where the three valleys meet. This slothful march, and his twenty-five thousand men, are quite sufficient to testify whether he was desirous of proceeding to Lyons.

In the meanwhile, Kellermann, who had hurried from Grenoble, had raised the national guard from the Isère and the adjacent departments. He had infused confidence in the Savoyards, who had begun to exhibit apprehensions of the Piedmontese government, and he had managed to get together not much less than twelve thousand men. He next reinforced the division in the valley of Salenche, and bent his steps in the direction of Conflans, to the outlet of the two valleys of the Tarentaise and La Maurienne. This took place about the tenth of September. At this period the duke of Montferrat received orders to advance. But Kellermann, who forestalled the Piedmontese, did not hesitate to attack them in their station at Espierre, which they had taken upon the chains of the Grand-Loup, so as to secure a communication between the two valleys. As he could not approach this station in front, he caused it to be attacked in the rear by a single detachment. This detachment, composed of half naked soldiers, nevertheless made the most heroic exertions, and by mere manual labour lifted the cannon upon almost inaccessible heights. All at once the French artillery unexpectedly thundered upon the advanced guard of the Piedmontese, who were exceedingly alarmed. Gordon immediately retreated into the valley of La Maurienne on Saint-Michel; and the duke of Montferrat conveyed himself back to the centre of the valley of the Tarentaise. Kellermann having harassed the duke of Montferrat on the flanks of his army, shortly compelled him to fall back as far as Saint-Maurice and Saint-Germain, and at length drove him on the 4th of October beyond the Alps. Thus the short and successful campaign which the Piedmontese might have accomplished by defiling into the valleys with an increased mass, and then descending through only one of the valleys upon Chambéry and Lyons, failed in this instance for the same reasons that had operated against every attempt the allies had made, and which had saved France.

While the Sardinians were thus driven back beyond the Alps, the three deputies despatched into the Puy-de-Dôme to effect a levy en masse in that quarter, raised the country people, by preaching up a kind of crusade, and by persuading them that Lyons, so far from being a defender of the republican cause, was rather the strong-hold of the foreign and emigration factions. Couthon, although paralytic, exerted an activity that his infirmities could not affect, and excited a general enthusiasm. He first despatched Maignet and Châteauneuf with a first column of twelve thousand men, and remained behind to bring up with him an additional one of twenty-five thousand men, and to procure the necessary supplies of provision. Dubois-Crancé stationed the new recruits on the west side in the direction of Saint-Foy, and thus made the blockade complete. At the same time he was joined by a detachment from the garrison of Valenciennes, who, according to the conventions already made, were, like the garrison of Metz, prohibited from serving except in the interior; he placed detachments of regular troops in advance of the requisitionary levies, so as to form effective advanced guards to the columns. His army might then be said to consist of twenty-five thousand requisitionaries, and from eight to ten thousand soldiers who had seen service.

On the 24th, at midnight, he carried by assault the redoubt of the bridge of Oullins, which led to the base of the heights of Saint-Foy. The next day general Doppet, a Savoyard, who had distinguished himself under Carteaux in the war against the Marseillais, arrived to supersede Kellermann. The reason why Kellermann came to be discharged was the lukewarmness of his zeal in the cause, indeed he had only been permitted to retain his command some few days, to give him time to bring his expedition against the Piedmontese to a conclusion. General Doppet immediately settled with Dubois-Crancé for his attack upon the heights of Saint-Foy. All the preparations had been made for the night between the 28th and the 29th of September. Simultaneous assaults were directed, on the north in the direction of La Croix-Rousse, on the east in front of the bridge of Morand, on the south by the bridge Moutière which is situated above the town at the confluence of the Saône and the Rhône. The main assault was to be made by the bridge of Oullins on Saint-Foy. This, however, did not begin until five o'clock in the morning of the 29th, one or two hours after the others. Doppet encouraging his soldiers, made a rush with them upon a first redoubt, and then engaged them upon a second in a most spirited manner. The great and little Saint-Foy were carried. In the mean time the column appointed to make the attack upon the bridge Moutière gained it, and got as far as the isthmus at the point where the two rivers meet. The column was on its way to gain an entrance into Lyons, when Précy hurrying thither with his cavalry, managed to repel it and thus saved the place; on his part, Vaubois, who took the command of the artillery, and had conducted a very fierce attack upon the bridge of Morand, got into the horse-shoe redoubt, but was obliged to leave it.

Of all these attacks one only could be said to have been completely successful, but then that was the main attack, that of Saint-Foy. What remained to be done was to pass from the heights of Saint-Foy to those of Fourvières, far more regularly fortified, and much more difficult to carry. The course Dubois-Crancé, who acted upon acknowledged principles and as a skilful tactician, took, was to act so as not to expose himself to the chances of a renewed assault, and these were his reasons: he was well aware that the Lyonnese, who were now reduced to eat pea-flour, had no more provisions than would last them for a few days, and that then they would be obliged to surrender. He had experienced the effect of their bravery in their defence of the bridge of La Moutière and the bridge of Morand; he was fearful, therefore, lest an assault upon the heights might fail, and that in such case a check might disorganize his army and compel him to raise the siege. "It would be," said he, "the best thing I could do for the brave and desperate besieged, to give them the opportunity of saving themselves by a battle. Let us leave them to perish from the effect of a few days' famine."

It was at this time that Couthon, on the 2nd of October, came up with a new levy of twenty-five thousand peasants of Auvergne. "I am coming," wrote he, "with my rocks of Auvergne, and I shall hurl them upon the Faubourg of Vaise." He found Dubois-Crancé in the midst of an army of which he had absolute command, where he had established the orders and regulations of military discipline, and where he more frequently exhibited the uniform of a superior officer than the appearance of a representative of the people. Couthon was irritated in witnessing a representative displacing equality by means of a military hierarchy, and above all, would not hearken to him when he spoke of the rules of warfare. "I know nothing," said he, "of tactics, I come here with the people, their enthusiastic fury will bear all before them. We must inundate Lyons with our masses, and carry it by storm. Moreover, I have promised my peasants leave of absence next Monday, and they must go and look to their vineyards." It was then Friday, Dubois-Crancé, an experienced man in his profession, and accustomed to regular soldiers, testified some contempt for these peasants, confusedly got together, and insufficiently armed; he proposed that the youngest of them should be picked out and incorporated with the battalions already disciplined, and to send the others home. Couthon would not hearken to any one of these prudential suggestions, and settled that Lyons should be assaulted by storm at every point with the sixty thousand men, of which they had now the command, for such was now the numerical force of the army in consequence of the recent levy. At the same time he sent despatches to the committee of public welfare to procure the recall of Dubois-Crancé. In the council of war it was settled that the assault should be made on the 8th of October.

In the interval the recall of Dubois-Crancé, as well as his colleague Gauthier, came to hand. The Lyonnese had conceived the utmost terror of Dubois-Crancé, whom they had observed for two months so inveterate against their city, and they declared that they would not surrender to him. On the 7th, Couthon summoned them for the last time, and wrote to them that it was himself and the representatives Maignet and Laporte to whom the convention had confided the conduct of the siege. The firing ceased until four o'clock in the afternoon, and then opened again extremely heavy. They were about to make ready for the assault, when a deputation came to offer terms on the behalf of the Lyonnese. It appeared that the object of this negotiation was to afford to Précy and to two thousand of those inhabitants who were deeply implicated, the opportunity of saving themselves in close column. They therefore took advantage of this pause, and issued from the town by the Faubourg of Vaise, in order to retreat in the direction of Switzerland.

The parley had scarcely begun, when a republican column made its way to the Faubourg Saint-Just. It was too late to make terms, and what was more, the convention would allow of none. On the 9th, the army made its entry into the town, with the representatives at its head. The inhabitants kept themselves close, but all the persecuted Mountainers issued forth in a body to meet the victorious army, and prepared to greet it by performing a sort of popular triumph. General Doppet compelled his soldiers to observe the strictest order, and left to the representatives the exclusive charge of executing the revolutionary vengeance reserved for that unhappy city.

In the mean time Précy with his two thousand fugitives marched toward Switzerland. But Dubois-Crancé foreseeing that this expedient would be his only resource, had for a long time past kept all the passes. The unhappy Lyonnese were pursued, dispersed, and slain by the peasants. According to Précy, no more than eighty persons contrived to reach the Helvetic territory.

Couthon had hardly entered, before he restored the former Mountainer municipality, and commissioned it to apprehend and identify the rebels. He empowered a popular commission to try them according to military law. He next wrote to Paris with information that there were three classes of inhabitants. 1. Wealthy culprits; 2. Wealthy egoists; 3. Ignorant mechanics not identified with any party, and alike incapable of distinguishing good from evil. The first were to be guillotined and their houses levelled; the second were to be mulcted of their entire property; and the third were to be transplanted to some other country, and a republican colony founded in their stead.

The capture of Lyons occasioned the utmost satisfaction at Paris, and made amends for the disastrous intelligence at the close of September. Notwithstanding these successful results, complaints were made of the indulgence of Dubois-Crancé; and the flight of the Lyonnese by the Faubourg of Vaise, which had only been the means of preserving eighty persons, was made a subject of animadversion. Couthon, in particular, accused him of having made himself an independent general in his army, of having more often made his appearance in the costume of a superior officer than in the dress of a representative, of having affected the arrogance of a military tactician, in short, of having shown a preference for the regular system of besieging a town, rather than to attack en masse. An enquiry was therefore immediately set on foot by the Jacobins against Dubois-Crancé, whose activity and vigour, however, had been of such service at Grenoble, in the south, and before Lyons. Meanwhile, the committee of public welfare prepared decrees of dreadful import, in order to render the authority of the convention more formidable and more readily obeyed. The following is the decree which was presented by Barrère and adopted forthwith.

"Art. 1. There shall be nominated by the national convention upon the appointment of the committee of public welfare, a commission consisting of five representatives of the people, who are to proceed to Lyons without delay to apprehend and try according to military law all those counter-revolutionists who have taken up arms in that town.

"2. All the Lyonnese shall be disarmed; arms will be allowed to those of whom shall be declared that they have not tampered with rebellion, as well as to the defenders of their country.

"3. The town of Lyons shall be destroyed.

"4. No part of it shall be preserved except the poor-house, the manufactories, the studios of artists, the hospitals, the public monuments, and those commemorative of events.

"5. This town shall no longer be called Lyons. It shall be called 'Commune Affranchie.'

"6. Upon the ruins of Lyons shall be erected a monument, on which shall be inscribed these words: 'Lyons made war against Liberty, Lyons is no more.'"

The intelligence of the capture of Lyons was forthwith conveyed to the two armies of the north and La Vendée, where the decisive blows were to be stricken, and a proclamation exhorted them to imitate the army of Lyons. It thus addressed the army of the north. "The Standard of Liberty waves over the walls of Lyons and purifies them. There contemplate the presage of victory; victory is the meed of valour. Victory is yours; strike home, exterminate the satellites of tyrants! The country has her eyes upon you, the convention encourages your generous self-devotion; a few more days and tyrants shall exist no more, and the republic will owe to you its prosperity and glory." To the soldiers of the Vendean army it said: "and you, also, brave soldiers, you also will gain a victory; too long has La Vendée vexed the republic; march, strike, and make an end! All our enemies must fall at once; each army marches forth to victory. Would ye be the last to gather the palm and to merit the glory of having exterminated the rebels and saved the country?"

The committee, as we have already seen, did not omit to make the most of the capture of Lyons. This event, in point of fact, was of the utmost importance. It freed the eastern part of France from the last remains of the rebellion, and deprived the intriguing emigrants in Switzerland of all hope, as it also did the Piedmontese, who could not in future calculate upon making any diversion. It quelled the Jura, protected the rear of the army of the Rhine, opened the transit for men and stores, the want of which was beginning to be felt, to Toulon and the Pyrenees; and lastly, it struck terror into all those towns which demonstrated a tendency to rebellion, and ensured their absolute submission.

It was in the north that the committee was anxious to display more energy than ever, and where it was expected that the generals and soldiers were to exert themselves most extraordinarily. Scarcely had Custine's head been brought to the scaffold, when Houchard was sent before the revolutionary tribunal for not having done all that he could have done at Dunkirk. The recent complaints addressed to the committee in September last, had compelled it to remodel all the staffs. It had just completely renewed them, and had elevated mere subalterns to the highest promotions. Houchard, who at the opening of the campaign was a colonel, and before its termination became commander-in-chief, who now stood accused before the revolutionary tribunal; Hoche, a subaltern at the siege of Dunkirk, and now promoted to the command of the army of the Moselle; Jourdan, a chef de bataillon, afterwards commanding the centre on the day of Hondschote, and finally appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the north, were amongst the most striking examples of the vicissitudes of fortune in the republican armies. These sudden promotions not only prevented soldiers, officers, and generals from being well acquainted with, and well understanding one another, but imparted a dreadful idea of that exertion of power which thus was directed against the life of every individual, not only in the case of evident treason, but simply for a suspicion, for a meagre demonstration of zeal in the cause, or for a victory half-gained; but the result was a most absolute devotion on the part of the armies, and of unlimited expectations to those talents who were daring enough to aspire to the dangerous chances of the generalship.

To this period must be referred the first advances of the art of war. Certain it is, the principles of this science have been known and practised from the earliest times by captains who have combined boldness of conception with boldness of character. In comparatively recent times, Frederic afforded an example of the finest strategic combinations. But so soon as the man of genius disappears, and his place is supplied by men of ordinary character, the art of war degenerates into mere outward caution and routine. There used to be an interminable fight for the protection or for the attack of a line; it was a great point to calculate with precision the advantages of a ground, and to make it available for the purposes of that warfare for which it was best suited; but with all these appliances, there used to be a contest for whole years for a province which an adventurous commander might have gained by a single manœuvre; and this timid mediocrity occasioned a greater sacrifice of blood than the hardihood of a rash genius, for men were lost without results being obtained. This had been the practice of the skilful tacticians of the coalition. Against one battalion they set another, they kept all the roads that were exposed to the enemy, and at a time when by a bold advance they might have annihilated the revolution, they never had the courage to make a bold stroke, for fear of exposing themselves. The art of war required regeneration. To form a compacted mass, to inspire it with self-confidence and audacity, to convey it with celerity beyond a particular river, or a chain of mountains, and then fall upon an enemy unexpectedly, by dispersing his forces, by separating him from his resources, by seizing upon his capital, was a grand art, difficult of attainment, and which required a genius which could not but demonstrate itself during the excitement of the revolution.

The revolution, by causing agitation in the public mind, immediately preceded the period of great military combinations. In the beginning, the revolution called to her aid enormous masses of men, far greater in number than all those that had ever been raised for the purposes of kings. The revolution next effected a nervous desire to gain military successes out of the usual course of things, exhibited a marked dislike of protracted and scientific warfare, and suggested the idea of sudden and numerous irruptions upon one selected point. The common saying now was, You must fight in mass. This was the cry of the soldiers upon the frontiers, and of the Jacobins in the clubs. Courthou, when he came to Lyons, had made but one reply to all the arguments of Dubois-Crance, and that was, that the assault must be made in mass. Lastly, Barrère had made an able and well-digested report, wherein he demonstrated that the cause of our reverses was to be traced to our piecemeal system of fighting. Thus, by forming masses, by inspiring them with self-confidence, by freeing them from the shackles of methodical routine, by impressing them with the spirit and the hardihood of innovating principles, the revolution paved the way for the revival of war upon a large scale. Such a change as this could not be wrought without disorder. Peasants and labourers, when transferred to fields of battle, were, when they first went thither, ignorant, undisciplined, and constantly liable to panic fears, the natural consequences of a defective organization. The representatives, who came for the purpose of promoting a revolutionary feeling in the camps, frequently required that which was impracticable, and committed great acts of injustice towards their brave generals. Dumouriez, Custine, Houchard, Brunet, Canclaux, and Jourdan, all perished or fled from this overwhelming force; but in a month these labourers, who at first were mere Jacobin declaimers, became brave and intelligent soldiers. These representatives imparted an unprecedented, and an extraordinary faculty to the armies; and by dint of peremptory requirements and changes, they concluded by being able to distinguish those courageous talents best adapted to their purposes.

At length, one man came to impart regularity to this grand movement—this man was Carnot. Formerly, a most ingenious officer, and lately become a member of the convention, as well as of the committee of public welfare; as in some measure participating in its inviolability, he was able to impart arrangement and method to the most disjointed operations without being subjected to imputations, and above all, to give them a certain impress of consistency, which no ministry before him had been sufficiently powerful to have effected. One of the principal causes of our preceding reverses, was the utter absence of system which accompanies a great agitation. The committee now established, and become irresistible, and Carnot being invested with all the authority of that committee, deference was paid to the talented ideas of an experienced man, who, forming his judgment from a general view of the whole, prescribed evolutions in perfect harmony with each other, and all of them directed to one object. Generals were now no longer able, as Dumouriez or Custine had formerly done, to act each of them in their own sphere, by drawing all the war and all the means to themselves. Representatives were no longer able either to order or thwart manœuvres, or in any respect to interfere with superior orders. The supreme will of the committee was to be obeyed, and the uniformity of plan which it directed was to be strictly adhered to. Thus placed in the centre, and casting his eyes over the frontiers, the genius of Carnot naturally enlarged itself in proportion to its elevation; he conceived the most extended plans, in which prudence and boldness were equally combined. The instructions sent to Houchard afford a demonstration of this. Doubtless, his designs possessed something of that inaptitude which attaches on all official plans; and when his orders came to hand they were not always applicable to the places for which they were designed, nor could they be executed at the moment; but they compensated by the completeness of the whole for any difficulty attendant on its details, and ensured us in the following years triumphs in every quarter.

Carnot had hastened to the Northern frontier where Jourdan then was. It had been resolved to attack the enemy boldly, although he appeared formidable. Carnot required a plan from the commander-in-chief, in order to form a judgment upon his views, and reconcile them with those of the committee, in fact his own. The allies on their return from Dunkirk, towards the middle of the line, had joined each other between the Scheldt and the Meuse, and thus composed a formidable mass, capable of effecting decisive results. We have already made the reader acquainted with the theatre of the war. Several lines divide the space lying between the Meuse and the sea, that is to say, the Lys, the Scarpe, the Scheldt, and the Sambre. The allies had, in capturing Condé and Valenciennes, secured two important positions on the Scheldt. Le Quesnoy, of which they had very recently made themselves masters, afforded them a support between the Scheldt and the Sambre; but they possessed none upon the Sambre itself. They fixed their thoughts upon Maubeuge, which, by its position upon the Sambre, would have nearly made them masters over the space comprised between this river and the Meuse. At the opening of the ensuing campaign, Valenciennes and Maubeuge would have afforded them an excellent support for their operations, and their campaign of 1793 would not have been so entirely fruitless. Their last plan, therefore, consisted in occupying Maubeuge.

On the part of the French, among whom the spirit of calculating the probabilities of success began to develop itself, the course intended was to make a movement by Lille and Maubeuge upon both wings of the enemy, and in thus approaching him upon both his flanks, it was expected that his centre would give way. True enough, that the French would in this mode have to expend all their strength upon one or the other of the enemy's wings; but they would still possess the entire advantage derivable from their mass; there was certainly less of the old methodical system in this idea than in those that had preceded it. However, the most pressing matter was the relief of Maubeuge. Jourdan leaving nearly fifty thousand men in the camps of Gavrelle, Lille, and Cassel, who were to form his left wing, got together at Guise as many reinforcements as he was able. He had formed one mass of about forty-five thousand men, already disciplined, and lost no time in making up his regiments from the new levies that accrued from the permanent requisition. However, these levies were in such confusion, that he was obliged to leave behind him some detachments from the troops of the line, for the express purpose of guarding them.

Jourdan then appointed Guise as the place where all the recruits were to muster, and advanced at the head of five columns to the relief of Maubeuge.

Already had the enemy invested that fortress. Like those of Valenciennes and Lille, it was supported by an intrenched camp, posted upon the right bank of the Sambre, on the very side by which the French were advancing. Two divisions, under the command of generals Desjardins and Mayer, guarded the course of the Sambre, the one above, the other below Maubeuge. The enemy, instead of advancing in two closely compacted masses, to turn Desjardins back upon Maubeuge, and to throw Mayer back behind Charleroy, where he would have been lost, crossed the Sambre in small divisions, and let the two divisions of Desjardins and Mayer join each other in the intrenched camp of Maubeuge. It was well done to detach Desjardins from Jourdan, and thus to have prevented him from augmenting the active army of the French; but in allowing Mayer to effect a junction with Desjardins, they had permitted these two generals to form near Maubeuge a division of twenty thousand men, who could no longer support the character of a mere garrison, particularly upon the approach of the main army of Jourdan. However, the burden of having to provide for such a concourse of people became a matter of serious inconvenience to Maubeuge, and might, in a certain degree, form an excuse for the enemy's generals for having suffered this junction to have taken effect.

The prince of Cobourg stationed the Dutch, to the number of twelve thousand, upon the left bank of the Sambre, and made an effort to burn the store-houses of Maubeuge, in order to increase the scarcity. He placed General Colloredo on the right bank, and commissioned him to invest the intrenched camp. In advance of Colloredo, Clerfaut, with three divisions, formed a company of observation, and was to obstruct Jourdan's march. The allies amounted to nearly sixty-five thousand men.

Had the prince of Cobourg possessed either talents or boldness, he would have left fifteen or twenty thousand men, at most, to invest Maubeuge; he would next have marched with forty-five or fifty thousand against Jourdan, and would have infallibly beaten him; for with the advantage of taking the offensive, and having an equal number, his troops would have carried every thing against ours, which were still badly disciplined. Instead of adopting this course, the prince of Cobourg left about thirty-five thousand men round the place, and remained on the look-out with about thirty thousand in the positions of Dourlers and Watignies.

In this state of things it was practicable for General Jourdan to break through on one point the line occupied by the corps of observation, to march down upon Colloredo, who was engaged upon the investment of the intrenched camp, to place him between cross fires, and having overwhelmed him, to effect a junction with the entire army of Maubeuge, to form with that army a mass of sixty thousand men, and to beat all the allies stationed on the right bank of the Sambre. In order to have done this, he must have directed a single assault upon Watignies, the weakest point of all; but by bearing exclusively to that side, he would have left unprotected the road to Avesnes, which led to Guise, where our head-quarters were, and the place where all our stores were concentrated. The French general preferred a more prudent, though less brilliant course, and caused the corps of observation to be attacked upon four points, and so as to always protect the road to Avesnes and Guise. On his left, he detached Fromentin's division to Saint-Waast, with orders to march between Sambre and the enemy's right. General Balland, with several batteries, was to post himself in the centre, fronting Dourlers, to keep Clerfaut in check by a heavy cannonade. General Duquesnoy advanced with the right upon Watignies, which formed the enemy's left, a little behind the central position of Dourlers. This point was inefficiently occupied. A fourth division, that of General Beauregard, stationed still more on the right, was to support Duquesnoy in his attack upon Watignies. These various movements were not very connected, and were not directed upon the most important points; they were executed on the morning of the 15th of October; General Fromentin captured Saint-Waast; but not having taken the precaution to keep close along the woods, to shelter himself from the enemy's cavalry, he was assaulted and thrown back into the ravine of Saint-Rémy. At the centre, where it was believed that Fromentin was master of Saint-Waast, and where it was known that the right had succeeded in nearing Watignies, they wanted to go further, and, instead of cannonading Dourlers, thought of taking it. This, it seems, was the advice of Carnot, who settled that the attack should take place, against the opinion of general Jourdan. Our infantry rushed into the ravine which divided it from Dourlers, clambered up the heights exposed to a murderous fire, and reached a level ground, having formidable batteries in front, and in flank a large body of cavalry ready to charge. At the same moment, a fresh company, which had just assisted in putting Fromentin to the rout, again threatened to surround it on his left. General Jourdan exposed himself to the greatest hazard to support our infantry, but it gave way, threw itself in great confusion down the ravine, and very fortunately took up its positions without having been pursued. We had lost nearly a thousand men in this attempt, and our left, under Fromentin, had lost its artillery. General Duquesnoy, on the right, was the only one who was successful, in being able to approach Watignies.

After this attempt, the French became better acquainted with the position. They were sensible that Dourlers was too strongly defended for the principal assault to be directed on that point; that Watignies, which was loosely guarded by General Tercy, and situate behind Dourlers, was easily to be carried, and that this village, once occupied by our main force, the position of Dourlers must necessarily yield. Jourdan, therefore, sent off a detachment of from six to seven thousand men towards his right, to reinforce General Duquesnoy; he ordered General Beauregard, who was too far removed with his fourth column, to turn off from Eule upon Obrechies, so as to effect a concentric effort upon Watignies in conjunction with General

Duquesnoy, but he persisted in continuing his course to the centre, and to make Fromentin march towards the left, in order to constantly enclose the entire front of the enemy's line.

The next day, the 16th, the attack commenced. Our infantry, debouching by the three villages of Dinant, Demichaux, and Choise, approached Watignies. The Austrian grenadiers who connected Watignies with Dourlers, were thrown back upon the woods. The enemy's cavalry was kept in check by light artillery judiciously posted, and Watignies was carried. General Beauregard, less fortunate, was surprised by a brigade which the Austrians had dispatched against him. His company, conceiving that the enemy's force was greater than it really was, dispersed and gave up their ground. Both armies had kept each other in check at Dourlers and Saint-Waast, but Watignies was in our possession, and that was the main point. In order to secure its safe possession, Jourdan further reinforced his right at that place by five or six thousand men. Cobourg, too apprehensive of danger, made his retreat, notwithstanding the advantages obtained over Beauregard, and notwithstanding that the duke of York was coming up by a forced march from the opposite side of the Sambre. The probability is, that the fear of seeing the French form a junction with twenty thousand men in the intrenched camp, prevented him from a continued occupation of the right bank of the Sambre. Certain it is, that if the army of Maubeuge, on hearing the sound of the cannon at Watignies, had fallen upon the inefficient company that were investing the camp, and have done their best to march in the direction of Jourdan, the allies might have been overwhelmed. The soldiers called for this with a great outcry, but General Ferrand was opposed to it, and General Chancel, who was unjustly deemed guilty of this refusal, was sent to the revolutionary tribunal. The successful attack of Watignies decided the raising of the siege of Maubeuge, in precisely the same manner as the victory of Hondschote had decided the raising of the siege of Dunkirk. It was called the Victory of Watignies, and produced the greatest possible impression upon the public mind.

The allies were thus concentrated between the Scheldt and the Sambre. The committee of public welfare were desirous to derive immediate advantage from the victory of Watignies, from the discouragement which it had caused to the enemy, and from the energy which it had imparted to our army, and resolved to make one last effort, which before the winter should repel the allies from our territory, and leave them with the disheartening conviction that the campaign had been entirely lost. The opinion of Jourdan and of Carnot was opposed to the opinion of the committee. They considered that the rains, already very heavy, the bad state of the roads, and the rest required by the troops, were sufficient reasons for their entering into winter quarters, and their recommendation was, that the bad weather should be turned to account in reducing the army to discipline and order. However, the committee insisted that the French territory should be freed from the enemy, also arguing that in this season a defeat could not be attended with any very important results. In conformity with the newly suggested idea that a movement should be made upon the wings, the committee issued orders for marching by Maubeuge and Charleroy on one side, and by Cysaing, Maulde, and Tournay on the other, and thus to entirely enclose the enemy upon the very territory he had invaded. The minute was signed the 22nd of October. The orders were in consequence issued; the army of the Ardennes was to join Jourdan, and the garrisons of the fortresses were to quit them, and their place occupied by the new requisitions or forced levies.

The war with La Vendée had been very recently resumed with renewed activity. We have seen that Canclaux had retreated to Nantes, and that the columns of the Upper-Vendée had returned to Angers and Saumur. Before the recent decrees, which consolidated the two armies of La Rochelle and Brest into one, and conferred the command on general Léchelle, were made public, Canclaux was making ready for a new movement on the offensive. The garrison of Mentz was already reduced by war and disease to nine or ten thousand men. The division of Brest defeated under Beysser was almost disorganized. Canclaux, nevertheless, resolved to hazard a bold march into the heart of La Vendée, and at the same time he earnestly solicited Rossignol to assist him with his army. Rossignol immediately called a council of war at Saumur on the 2nd of October, and caused it to be settled that the columns of Saumur, Thouars, and La Chataigneraye should join on the 7th at Bressuire, and should march from thence to Chatillon, so as to make their attack concurrent with that of Canclaux. At the same time he gave orders to the two columns of Luçon and Sables to keep on the defensive, because of their recent miscarriages, and the dangers to which they were exposed from the quarter of Lower-Vendée.

In the meantime, Canclaux had advanced, on the 1st of October, as far as Montaigu, sending before him intelligences as far as Saint-Fulgent, with a view to do his best to form a communication by his right with the column of Luçon, in case it should have to take the offensive. Emboldened by the success of his march, he issued orders on the 6th to the advanced guard, always under the command of Kléber, to proceed to Tiffanges. Four thousand Mayençais encountered Elbée's army at Saint-Symphorien, routed it after a sanguinary contest, and drove it entirely away. That same evening, the decree which displaced Canclaux, Aubert Dubayet, and Grouchy, came to hand. This caused great discontent in the column of Mentz; and Philippeaux, Gillet, Mertin, and Rewbell, who were sensible that the army was deprived of an excellent general at the very moment they were lying exposed in the heart of La Vendée, were exceedingly indignant. Doubtless, the consolidation of the command of the West in one person was an excellent measure, but some other individual should have been selected to bear the burden. Léchelle was an ignorant man, and a coward, says Kléber in his Memoirs, and never once stood fire. A subaltern in the army of La Rochelle, he had been suddenly promoted in the same manner as Rossignol, on account of his reputed patriotism; but nobody seems to have been aware, that neither possessing the natural spirit of Rossignol or his courage, he was quite as bad as a soldier as he was inefficient as a general. Until his arrival, the command devolved upon Kléber. They occupied the same positions between Montaigu and Tiffanges.

At length Léchelle arrived, on the 8th of October, and a council of war was holden in his presence. They had just received intelligence of the march of the columns of Saumur, Thouars, and of La Chataigneraye, upon Bressuire; it was then settled that the army should continue its march upon Cholet, where they should fall in with the three columns mustered at Bressuire; and, at the same time, orders were issued to the remainder of the division of Luçon to advance towards the general place of meeting. Léchelle could not comprehend the reasoning of the generals, and approved of every thing, saying, We must march majestically and "en masse." Kléber folded up his map with the strongest feeling of contempt. Morlin said that they had chosen the most ignorant of men to command an army most awfully exposed. From this period, Kléber was commissioned by the representatives to take upon himself the entire direction of the operations, subject, however, as a matter of form, to his reporting upon them to Léchelle. The latter took advantage of this arrangement to keep himself far enough from the field of battle. Out of the reach of personal danger himself, he hated the brave fellows who were fighting for him; but there is this to be said for him, he permitted them to fight when and how they pleased.

It was at this time that Charette, perceiving the dangers which threatened the leaders of Upper Vendée, detached himself from them, feigning pretended reasons of dissatisfaction; and he made a precipitate retreat to the coast, with the design of seizing upon the island of Normoutiers. In point of fact, he did make himself master of it on the 12th by a surprise, and by the treason of the officer who commanded it. He was thus satisfied that he would save his division, and be able to enter into communication with the English; but he left the party in Upper Vendée exposed to almost inevitable destruction. He could have acted in a manner much more beneficial for the common cause; he might have attacked the column of Mentz in its rear, and perhaps have annihilated it. The officers of the grand army sent him letter upon letter, exhorting him so to do, but they never received any answer.

These unhappy officers of the Upper Vendée were pressed on all sides. The republican columns, who were to join at Bressuire, repaired thither by the specified time; and on the 9th, they were on the road from Bressuire to Chatillon. In their way, they encountered the army of M. de Lescure, and threw it into confusion. Westermann, now restored to his command, was constantly in the advance-guard, at the head of some hundreds of men. He was the first to enter Chatillon, on the evening of the 9th; the entire army entered it on the next day, the 10th. During this movement, Lescure and Larochejaquelein had summoned the grand army to their relief; and indeed it was not far from them: for being already very closely hemmed in, in the midst of this country, they fought at no great distance from each other. the assembled generals resolved to proceed to Chatillon, and they commenced their march on the 11th. Westermann had already advanced from Chatillon upon Mortagne with an advanced guard of five hundred men. At first, he did not consider that he should have to deal with an entire army, and therefore did not apply for any great assistance from his commanding officer; but being suddenly surrounded, he was compelled to make a hasty retreat, and he re-entered Chatillon with his company. The confusion communicated itself to the town, and the republican army abandoned it with the utmost precipitation. Westermann, in conjunction with Chalbos, the commander-in-chief, collecting around him a few brave fellows, stopped the flight, and even managed to get back nearly as far as Chatillon. At nightfall, he said to some of his soldiers who had fled, "You have this day lost your reputation; you must recover it." He immediately took a hundred horsemen, mounted a hundred grenadiers behind them, and at night, while the Vendéans, confusedly dispersed in Chatillon, were asleep or intoxicated, he had the hardihood to enter therein, and to throw himself into the midst of a whole army. The disturbance was indescribable, and the carnage was most frightful. The Vendéans, not recognising each other, fought with each other in mistake; and in the midst of the most terrible confusion, women, children, and old men were butchered. Westermann at daybreak quitted the place, with thirty or forty soldiers, who were left, and went to rejoin the main body of the army, which lay at about the distance of one league from the town. On the 12th, a most dreadful sight harrowed the Vendéans; they themselves had to quit Chatillon drenched with gore, and a prey to the flames, and bent their steps towards the quarter of Cholet, whither the Mayençais were marching. Chalbos, after having restored order in his division, on the next day but one, the 14th, re-entered Chatillon, and made his arrangements to march again in advance, so as to fall in with the army of Nantes.

All the Vendéan leaders, d'Elbée, Bonchamps, Lescure, and Larochefoucauld, were assembled, together with their forces, in the environs of Cholet. The Mayençais, who had commenced their march on the 14th, were fast approaching them; the column of Chatillon was not far distant; and the division of Lugo, which had been sent for, was also on its march, and was to station itself between the columns of Mentz and Chatillon. The time for the general junction of all these forces was close at hand. On the 15th, the army of Mentz marched, in two masses, towards Mortagne, which had just been evacuated. Kléber, with the main body, formed the left, and Beaupuy the right. At the same instant, the column of Lugo arrived near Mortagne, in the expectation of finding a battalion of direction, which Léchelle ought to have stationed on his route. But this general, who never did any thing, had not even discharged himself of this accessory duty. The column was therefore surprised by Lescure, and was assailed on all sides. Fortunately, Beaupuy, who happened to be in the neighbourhood, by reason of his position towards Mortagne, hastened to his relief, and managed to extricate him. The Vendéans were repulsed. The unfortunate Lescure received a ball above the eyebrow, and fell in the arms of his soldiers, who carried him off, and took to flight. The Lugo column then joined that of Beaupuy; young Marceau had very recently assumed its command. On the left, and at the very same time, Kléber had maintained a fight in the direction of Saint-Christopher, and repelled the enemy. On the evening of the 15th, all the republican troops bivouacked in the fields before Cholet, whither the Vendéans had retreated. The Lugo division consisted of about three thousand men; and this, with the column of Mentz, amounted to nearly twelve or thirteen thousand men.

The next morning the Vendéans, after a few cannon-shot, evacuated Cholet, and retreated to Beaupréau. Kléber immediately entered the place, and, prohibiting spoliation upon pain of death, caused the greatest order to be observed. The column of Lugo had conducted itself in the same manner at Mortagne. Therefore, all those historians who have stated that Kléber burnt Cholet and Mortagne, have either committed an error or advanced a falsehood.

Kléber immediately made all his arrangements, for Léchelle was two leagues behind. The river Moine runs in front of Cholet; beyond it is a hilly, uneven ground, forming a semicircle of heights. To the left of this semi-circle is the wood of Cholet; in the centre is Cholet itself; and on the right a mansion situated on an eminence. Kléber stationed Beaupuy, with the advance guard, before the wood; and Haxo, with the reserve of the Mayençais, behind the advance guard, and so as to support it; he posted the column of Lugo, under the command of Marceau, in the centre; and Vimeux, with the remainder of the Mayençais, on the right upon the heights. The column of Chatillon came up in the night between the 16th and 17th. Its number amounted to near nine or ten thousand men, and made the total republican forces amount to about twenty-two thousand strong. A council was held on the morning of the 17th. Kléber did not feel confident in his position before Cholet, because it left him no more than one retreat, and that was the bridge of Moine, communicating with the town. He, therefore, was desirous of marching forwards, so as to get round at the rear of Beaupréau, and to cut off the Loire from the Vendéans. The representatives did not agree with him, inasmuch as the column from Chatillon required a day's rest.

In the meantime, the Vendéan leaders held their council at Beaupréau, in the midst of the most horrible confusion. The peasants took away with them their wives, children, and cattle, and formed an emigration of upwards of one hundred thousand individuals. Larochefoucauld and d'Elbée were for holding out to the last upon the left bank; but Talmont and Antichamp, who possessed great influence in Brittany, were extremely anxious that their force should be shifted to the right hand side of the river. Bonchamps, who conceived that a great enterprise might be achieved by his making an excursion towards the north, and who, as it was currently reported, entertained some design connected with England, was for crossing the Loire. Nevertheless, he was by no means unwilling to attempt a final effort, and to hazard a general engagement before Cholet. Before the battle commenced he despatched a detachment of four thousand men to Varades, so as to secure a passage over the Loire in case of a defeat.

It was settled that they were to fight. On the 15th October, at one o'clock in the afternoon, the Vendéans advanced to the number of forty thousand men upon Cholet. The republican generals, not expecting that they would be attacked, had allowed one day for the soldiers to refresh themselves. The Vendéans were composed of three columns; one pointing to the left under Beaupuy and Haxo; the second, to the centre, under the command of Marceau; the third to be entrusted to Vimeux to the right. The Vendéans marched in rank and file, like regular soldiers. Every one of the wounded leaders who were able to sit their horses, were in the midst of their peasants, and encouraged them on that day, which was to decide their fate, and the possession of their homes. Between Beaupréau and the Loire, as well as in every commune that was left them, mass was solemnized, and solemn prayers offered up for the protection of that cause which had suffered so much, and stood exposed to such great peril.

The Vendéans put themselves in motion, and joined the advanced guard of Beaupuy, stationed as we have already noticed on a level ground in advance of the wood of Cholet. One company of the Vendéans advanced in a compacted mass, and charged in the same manner as troops of the line; the others were scattered here and there as sharpshooters, for the purpose of getting at the rear of the advance guard, and even the left wing, by forcing their way into the wood of Cholet. The republicans overwhelmed, were compelled to fall back. Beaupuy had two horses killed under him, as he fell his foot was caught by his spur, and he was within an ace of being made prisoner, when he jumped behind a baggage-waggon, got upon a third horse, and rejoined his column. At this critical moment, Kléber hastened towards the exposed wing; he gave orders to the centre and the right not to stir from their places, and sent instructions to Chalbos to send one of his columns from Cholet to assist the left wing. He himself taking his place near Haxo, imparted renewed confidence to his battalions, and brought back to the firing those who had given way to numerical force. The Vendéans were in their turn repulsed, and although they resolutely returned to the charge, they were again driven back. Meanwhile, the battle raged at the centre and on the right with the same fury. On the right, Vimeux was so advantageously posted that all the exertions proved utterly ineffectual.

However, the Vendéans made better way against the centre than they did against the two wings, and pushed into the hollow where young Marceau was placed. Kléber hastened thither to support the column of Luçon; and at that very time, one of the divisions of Chalbos which he had required, four thousand strong, issued from Cholet. At this juncture, this reinforcement would have been of the utmost importance; but at the sight of the firing, which extended the whole length of the plain, this undisciplined division, as indeed were all those which belonged to the army of La Rochelle, dispersed and returned in confusion to Cholet. Kléber and Marceau, therefore, remained in the centre, with no more than the column of Luçon. Young Marceau, under whose command this column was, was not alarmed; he suffered the enemy to approach within musket-shot, and then suddenly unmasked his artillery, and thus, by his unexpected firing, checked and overwhelmed the Vendéans. The latter, for some time, stood their ground, then rallied and closed their ranks, exposed to a shower of grape-shot; but it was not long before they gave ground and fled in confusion. At this time, their rout became complete at the centre, the right, and the left; Beaupuy, who had rallied his advanced guard, pursued them without mercy. None other than the Mentz and Luçon columns had any share in this battle. Thus, thirteen thousand men had beaten forty thousand. On both sides, the greatest valour had been displayed, but regularity and discipline had decided the advantage in favour of the republicans. Marceau, Beaupuy, and Merlin, who himself pointed the guns, had distinguished themselves by the greatest heroism. Kléber had shown his comprehensive judgment, and his accustomed vigour on the field of battle. On the side of the Vendéans, d'Elbée and Bouchamps, after having performed prodigies of valour, were mortally wounded; Larochejaquelein was the only one that was left of all the Vendéan leaders, and he had exposed himself to be a sharer in these honourable wounds quite as much as they had. The battle lasted from two till six in the afternoon.

By this time it was dark; the Vendéans fled in the utmost haste, throwing away their wooden shoes in their flight. Beaupuy followed them up as hard as he was able. Beaupuy had been joined by Westermann, who not desiring to be as inert as the troops of Chalbos, had headed a company of cavalry, and pursued the fugitives at full speed. After a protracted pursuit, Beaupuy and Westermann halted, and gave their soldiers some rest. However, said they, we are more likely to find bread at Beaupréau than at Cholet, and they actually ventured to march to Beaupréau, whither it was supposed the Vendéans had retreated en masse. But their flight had been so rapidly conducted, that one party of them had got to Saint Florent, on the banks of the Loire, the remainder evacuated Beaupréau in confusion on the approach of the republicans, and ceded to them that position, where they might have defended themselves. On the morning of the next day, the 18th, the entire army marched from Cholet in the direction of Beaupréau. The advance-guards of Beaupuy, stationed on the road to Saint-Florent, perceived a great number of individuals run towards them shouting, Vive la république, vive Bouchamps! When asked the meaning of this, they answered by stating that Bouchamps was their deliverer. In point of fact, this young hero, stretched on a mattress, and on the point of death, from a shot in the lower part of the belly, had asked and obtained mercy for four thousand prisoners, whom the Vendéans had hitherto dragged along with them, and whom they were about to shoot; the prisoners now rejoined the republican army.

There were at this time eighty thousand individuals, women, children, old men, and armed men, on the banks of the Loire, who, with the remains of their property, were disputing for a score of barks, in order to gain a passage over to the other side. The superior council, consisting of those leaders who were still capable of advising, considered whether they ought to disperse or carry the war into Brittany. Some of them were for dispersing themselves throughout La Vendée, and concealing there till things should come round. Larochejaquelein was of this number, and his advice was to hold out to the last extremity upon the left side, rather than cross over to the right side of the Loire. Nevertheless, the majority were of a different opinion, and it was settled that they should remain together and cross over. But Bonchamps had just breathed his last, and there was nobody competent to prosecute the designs he had formed in regard to Brittany. D'Elbée, who was in a dying state, had been sent to Normoultiers; Lescure, mortally wounded, was borne upon a litter. Eighty thousand individuals had quitted their pastures for the mere purpose of carrying devastation among their neighbours, and there inviting extermination, and for what purpose, gracious God! for an unreasonable cause, one that was on every side either deserted, or hypocritically defended! While these unfortunates thus generously exposed themselves to such dreadful evils, the allied powers scarcely gave them a thought, the emigrants were intriguing in courts, some few of them, perhaps, might be fighting bravely on the Rhine, but in foreign armies; and not one of them ever thought of sending a soldier or a crown-piece to poor unhappy Vendée, already the scene of twenty heroically contested fights, and now vanquished, exiled, and desolate.

The republican generals assembled together at Beaupréau, and there it was arranged that they should separate, and proceed, some of them to Nantes, and some of them to Angers, in order to present an off-hand attack on both those towns. The opinion of the representatives, but in which Kléber did not concur, was that La Vendée should be destroyed. "La Vendée is no more!" wrote they to the convention. The army had been allowed till the 20th of October to accomplish their mission, and they had concluded their operations by the 18th. On that same day the army of the north had gained the battle of Watignies, and had thus terminated the campaign by opening the blockade of Maubeuge. Thus in every way the convention seemed to have nothing else to do than to decree a victory as a means of ensuring it. Enthusiasm was at its height at Paris, and throughout France, and every one began to believe that before the end of the season the republic would become victorious over all the thrones which had conspired against her.

There was but one single event to disturb this general satisfaction, and that was the loss of the lines of Weissenburg on the Rhine, which had been forced upon the 13th and the 16th of October. After the defeat at Pirmasens we left the Prussians and the Austrians before the two lines of the Sarre and the Lauter, and every minute appearing ready to carry them by assault. The Prussians having harassed the French upon the banks of the Sarre, compelled them to fall back. The division of the Vosges driven beyond Hornbach, retreated a long way behind to Bitch, in the heart of the mountains; the army of the Moselle, driven back up to Sarreguemines, became separated from the division of the Vosges and from the army of the Rhine.

In this position it were a very easy matter for the Prussians, who had on the western slope passed beyond the common line of the Sarre and the Lauter, to get round at the back of the lines of Weissenburg by their extremity on the left. Consequently these lines must be taken. This indeed did actually take place on the 13th of October. Prussia and Austria, between whom there had been, as we have already observed, a want of cordiality, were at length upon better terms; the king of Prussia had gone into Poland, and had relinquished the command to Brunswick, who had orders to hold himself in communication with Wurmser. From the 13th to the 14th of October, while the Prussians marched along the line of the Vosges up to Bitch, considerably above the heights of Weissenburg, Wurmser was to attack the lines of the Lauter in seven columns. The first under the command of the prince of Waldeck, which had orders to cross the Rhine at Seltz and to get round at the back of Lauterburg, encountered, both from the nature of the locality and the courage of a semi-battalion of the Pyrenees, insurmountable obstacles; the second, after having passed the lines above Lauterburg, was repulsed; the others, after obtaining higher up and in the neighbourhood of Weissenburg some advantages, balanced by the vigorous defence of the French, nevertheless made themselves masters of Weissenburg. Our troops fell back upon the position of Geisburg, situated somewhat in the rear of Weissenburg, and much more difficult to carry. Still the lines of Weissenburg could not yet be considered as irretrievably lost, but the intelligence of the march of the Prussians upon the western slope compelled the French general to fall back upon Haguenau and upon the lines of the Lauter, and thus to make a cession of one part of the territory to the allies. On this point the frontier was then invaded, but the victories in the north and La Vendée neutralised the effect of this unpleasant news. Dispatches were forwarded to Saint-Just and Lebas in Alsatia, to counteract the movements that the Alsatian nobility and the emigrants excited at Strassburg. Numerous levies were being made with an eye to that quarter, and the French consoled themselves by resolving to obtain the mastery on that point as on every other.

The fearful apprehensions that had been entertained during the month of August, before the victories of Hondschoote and of Watignies, before the capture of Lyons, and the retreat of the Piedmontese beyond the Alps, and before the victories in La Vendée had been obtained, were now dispelled. At this period France witnessed the deliverance from the enemy of the northern frontier, the most important and the most exposed of all, the restoration of Lyons to the republic, La Vendée in subjection, every rebellion in the interior repressed, from the Italian frontier to the place where Toulon still held out, but who was the only one who did offer any resistance. One more victory at the Pyrenees, Toulon, and at the Rhine, and the republic would be in every respect victorious, and this threefold success did not seem to be more difficult of attainment than the others were. Doubtless the task was by no means finished, but there was nothing to prevent its soon being completed

covered it is true, but she was no longer in danger of a speedy dissolution.

THE revolutionary measures decreed for the welfare of France were put in execution throughout the length and the breadth of the land with the utmost severity. As having emanated from men of the most fervid ideas, they enunciated the most violent principles; as not being carried into effect under the eye of those persons in authority who had conceived them, but by those in a lower station, where the passions being less intelligent were more brutal, they became still more violent in their application. Some citizens were compelled to leave their homes, others were imprisoned as suspected persons; provisions and articles of daily consumption were seized for the purposes of the armies, *corvées were imposed to expedite their conveyance to their destination, and nothing was given in exchange for articles required, or services demanded, save assignats; in other words, a debenture upon the state which possessed no credit. The assessment of the compulsory loan was rapidly proceeded with, and the assessors of the commune would say to some: "Your income is ten thousand livres;" to others, "You have twenty;" and all so addressed, without having the power of being heard in reply, were compelled to bring forth the sum demanded. This universal arbitrary system was productive of great abuses; but the armies were filled with men, provisions in plenty were on their road to the government stores, and the thousand millions in assignats which were to be called in, began to be received. It is not without inflicting great sufferings that such rapid operations can be effected, and that a state exposed to peril can be saved.

In all those localities where the imminence of the danger had called for the presence of the commissaries of the convention, the revolutionary measures were in those places more strictly executed. In the neighbourhood of the frontiers, and in all those departments where royalism or federalism was supposed to exist, these commissaries had enlisted the population en masse; they had put every thing in requisition for the public service, levied heavy revolutionary taxes upon the wealthy over and above the proceeds of the forced loans; they had expedited the imprisonment of suspected persons; and in short, they had even on some occasions tried them by revolutionary commissions instituted by themselves. Laplanche, who had been sent into the department of the Cher, said, on the 29th Vendémiaire, to the Jacobins, "Wherever I have been, I have made terror the order of the day; I have every where levied heavy sums upon the wealthy and the aristocrats. Orleans provided me with fifty thousand livres, and two days were all I wanted to raise two millions from Bourges. As I could not be in more than one place at a time, my delegates filled my place: one individual, of the name of Mamin, a man worth seven millions, and assessed in respect of that sum by one of my delegates at forty thousand livres, complained to the convention, who has approved of my conduct; and if he had been assessed by myself, he would have had to pay two millions. I have made my delegates render at Orleans a public account: these accounts were passed at the popular club in that town; and this account has been ratified by the people. I have every where caused the bells to be melted down, and have consolidated several parishes. I have turned all federalists out of office, imprisoned suspected persons, and have called out the sans-culottes. The priests retained all their articles of luxury in the houses where they were confined; the sans-culottes lay upon straw in the prisons; the former have furnished me with good mattresses for the latter. I have every where compelled the priests to get married. Wherever I have been, I have electrified the hearts and the minds of men. I have organised manufactories for arms, visited the workshops, the hospitals, and the prisons. I have several battalions from the levy en masse. I have reviewed a great number of the national guards, in order to republicanise them; and I have guillotined a great number of royalists. In a word, I have followed my imperative commission. I have on every occasion, in my character of a revolutionary representative, conducted myself as a hot Mountaineer."

It was particularly in the three principal federalist cities, Lyons, Marseilles, and Bordeaux, that the representatives had caused a deep sensation of terror. The formidable decree passed against Lyons enacted, that the rebels and their accomplices should be tried by a commission, according to a military law, that the sans-culottes should be maintained at the expense of the aristocrats, that the houses of the wealthy should be destroyed, and that the name of the town should be changed. The execution of this decree had been confided to Collet d'Herbois, Maribon Montaut, and Fouché of Nantes. They had gone to Commune-Affranchie*, bringing down with them forty Jacobins, in order to organise a new Jacobinical club, and propagate the doctrines of the parent society. Ronsin had followed them with two thousand men of the revolutionary army, and had immediately displayed their fury. The representatives struck the first blow with a hammer upon one of the houses sentenced to be demolished, and eight hundred labourers had instantly been set to work in destroying the finest streets. The proscriptions also commenced at the same time. Those Lyonesse who lay under the suspicion of having borne arms, were either guillotined or shot at the rate of fifty or sixty a day. Terror, indeed, reigned supreme in this devoted city. The commissaries who had been sent to punish her, maddened and intoxicated with the shedding of blood, believing that at each cry of agony they saw the revival of rebellion, wrote to the convention that the aristocrats were by no means entirely brought to submission, that they were only watching the opportunity to effect a counteraction; and that in order to rid themselves of all apprehension, they must displace one part of the population and destroy the other. As the means employed did not appear to be sufficiently expeditious, Collet d'Herbois devised the idea of mining in order to destroy the buildings, and grape-shot as a means of killing the proscribed; and he wrote to the convention, that very soon he should avail himself of some more prompt and efficacious means for the punishment of the rebellious city. At Marseilles numerous victims had been sacrificed. But the direst wrath of the representatives was directed against Toulon, the siege whereof was most vigorously prosecuted.

In the department of the Gironde, revenge displayed itself with still greater fury. Isabeau and Tallien were stationed at La Réole: at that place they occupied themselves with forming the nucleus of a republican army, which was to penetrate into Bordeaux, and, as subservient to this intention, they used their utmost exertions to dissolve the sections of that town. To effect this they availed themselves of one section which was entirely Mountaineer, and this section, by dint of intimidating the others, caused the federalist club to be closed, and the departmental authorities to be turned out, so that they had entered Bordeaux in triumph, and had entirely restored the municipality and the Mountaineer authorities. Immediately afterwards they issued an order, declaring that Bordeaux should be subjected to military law, that all the inhabitants should be disarmed, that the aristocrats and the federalists should be tried by a special commission, and that an extraordinary tax should be levied upon the wealthy, to defray the expenses of the revolutionary army. This order was forthwith put in execution, the citizens were disarmed, and numbers perished on the scaffold.

It was at this particular period that the fugitive deputies, who had embarked in Brittany for the Gironde, arrived at Bordeaux. They all of them sought an asylum with a relation of Guadet, in the cellars of Saint-Emilion. There was a notion that they lay concealed in this quarter, and Tallien made the most strenuous exertions to discover their hiding place. Hitherto they had not succeeded, but he had unfortunately contrived to seize Biroteau, who had come from Lyons to embark at Bordeaux. This latter person was outlawed. Tallien immediately caused his identity to be evidenced, and executed him. Duchatel was also discovered, but as he was not outlawed, he was transferred to Paris, there to be tried by the revolutionary tribunal. With him were sent the three young friends, Riouffe, Girey-Duprey, and Marchenna, who were, as we have already seen, attached to the fortunes of the Girondists.

Thus all the great cities of France were subjected to the vengeful fury of the Mountain. But Paris, filled with more illustrious victims, was now about to become the scene of still greater atrocities.

While the proceedings against Marie-Antoinette, the Girondists, the Duke of Orleans, Bailly, and a host of generals and ministers were in preparation, the prisons were crammed with suspected persons. We have already stated that the commune of Paris had arrogated to itself a species of legislative authority upon all matters relating to police, provisions, traffic, divine worship, &c., and to each decree it appended a declaratory order, having the effect of extending or limiting the orders of the convention. Upon the requisition of Chaumette, it had particularly enough extended the definition of suspected persons, as declared by the law of the 17th of September. Chaumette had in a municipal notice specified the characters which it was intended to comprehend under this definition. This notice, addressed to the sections of Paris, and immediately afterwards to every section of the republic, was couched in the following terms:—

"Those are to be deemed suspected persons:

1st. "Who in the public meetings check their energy by crafty addresses, turbulent cries, and threatening language. 2nd. Those who, more prudent in their conduct, speak mysteriously upon the misfortunes of the republic, affect to commiserate the people, and are always ready to circulate bad news with an affected sorrow. 3rd. Those who have trimmed their language and demeanour according to the course of events; who, although silent upon the subject of the crimes of the royalists and federalists, emphatically declaim against the slight failings of the patriots, and affect, in order that they may appear to be republicans, an austerity of manner, and a studied severity of demeanour, but make allowances whenever a moderate or an aristocrat is concerned. 4th. Those who sympathize with those farmers and greedy tradesmen whom the law is compelled to prosecute. 5th. Those who, although constantly having the words, liberty, republic, and country upon their lips, yet associate with ci-devant nobles, priests, anti-revolutionists, aristocrats, feuillans, and moderatists, and interest themselves on their behalf. 6th. Those who have not taken an active part in everything that concerns the revolution, and to excuse themselves, set up the payment of their taxes, their patriotic donations, their service in the national guard, be it by substitute or otherwise. 7th. Those who have received the republican constitution with indifference, and have exhibited false apprehensions as to its establishment, and its probable duration. 8th. Those who, although they have committed no act against liberty, have yet done nothing for liberty. 9th. Those who do not frequent their sections, excusing themselves by pleading their inexperience in public speaking, or that they are prevented by business. 10th. Those who are in the habit of speaking contemptuously of the constituted authorities, of the symbols of the law, of the popular societies, and of the defenders of liberty. 11th. Those who have signed petitions of a counter-revolutionary tendency, or attended at anti-civic societies and clubs. 12th. Those who are well known as having been insincere in their professions, partisans of Lafayette, and those who have marched at a military pace in the Champ-de-Mars."

After such a definition the number of suspected persons must necessarily have been unlimited, and it soon rose in the prisons of Paris from a few hundreds to three thousand. At first they were detained at the Mairie, the Force, the Conciergerie, the Abbaye, Saint-Pelagie, the Madelonnettes, and in every state prison; but these large establishments being insufficient, it became necessary to provide new places of detention, specially appointed for persons confined on political charges. As the charges of imprisonment were payable by the prisoners, houses were hired at their expense. One had been selected in the Rue d'Enfer, known by the name of maison de Port-Libre; there was another in the Rue de Sevres, called maison Lazare. The College of Duplessis became a prison-house, and lastly, the palace of the Luxembourg, at first appropriated for the reception of the twenty-two, became filled with a vast number of prisoners, and there were shut up, without distinction, all those that remained of the brilliant society of the Faubourg Saint Germain. These sudden arrests had induced some confusion in the prisons, the prisoners at first being badly accommodated. No distinction being made between these prisoners and criminals, and having to lie upon straw, the first period of their imprisonment was bitter indeed. However, it was not long before time brought better arrangements, and some conveniences. Communications from without were permitted; the prisoners had the consolation of embracing their relatives, and the means of procuring money. They then hired beds, or had them brought thither; they no longer lay upon straw, and were separated from the criminals. They also were allowed all those accommodations which could render their state more supportable; for the decree permitted the transfer to the prison-houses of every thing that the prisoners required. Those who became inmates of the newly-established prison-houses were still better accommodated. At Port-Libre, in the maison Lazare, and at the Luxembourg, where wealthy prisoners were detained, decency and plenty were observable.

Their tables were supplied with luxuries upon payment of some fees for such indulgence. However, as the influx of visitors increased very much, and communications from without appeared too great an indulgence, the prisoners were deprived of this consolation, and they could no longer communicate with any one save by writing, and even that was restricted to the procuring such things as they required. From that time the society that existed between these unfortunate persons, who were doomed to live exclusively with each other, became linked by closer ties. Every one chose his acquaintance from a conformity of taste, and small societies were thus formed. Rules were framed, domestic offices were distributed among them, and they served them each in his turn. A subscription was opened to defray the charges of rent and housekeeping, and the wealthy thus contributed to the necessities of their poorer brethren.

After having attended to their domestic concerns, the occupiers of the different rooms met together in the common room, and forming themselves into small companies around a table, a stove, or a fire-place, amused themselves with working, reading, or conversation. Poets, who had been thrown into prison, with those who by exhibiting any superiority whatever had excited suspicion, here recited their poems. Musicians gave concerts, and very fine music was every day to be heard in these abodes of proscription. Expensive habits quickly became associated with these pleasurable enjoyments. The females attired themselves to the best advantage; connections of friendship and of love were formed, and up to the eve of the scaffold the ordinary scenes of life were exemplified here, forming a singular elucidation of the French character, of its thoughtlessness, its gaiety, and its tendency to pleasurable associations under every possible change of circumstances.

Delightful poems, romantic adventures, acts of mutual kindness, a singular confusion of ranks, fortune, and opinion, marked these first three months of the detention of suspected persons. A sort of voluntary equality realized in these places that ideal equality which its self-willed votaries desired should every where prevail, and which they failed in establishing, except in the prisons. It is true that the pride of certain prisoners was repugnant to this equality of misfortune. While men, very unequal in regard to fortune and education, were seen living on the best terms together, and with admirable disinterestedness congratulating themselves upon the victories of that republic which persecuted them, some ci-devant nobles and their wives, found by chance in the deserted mansions of the fauxbourg Saint Germain, yet dwelt apart, still called themselves by the proscribed titles of count and marquis, and manifested their ill-nature when they were told that the Austrians had fled at Watignies, or that the Prussians had not been able to pass over the Vosges. Affliction, however it is that revives the dictates of nature and of humanity; and soon, when Fouquier-Tinville, knocking daily at these miserable abodes, began incessantly to call for more heads, when friends and relatives were every day parted by death, those who remained mourned together, and imparted mutual consolation, and entertained but one feeling amidst the universality of the misfortune.

All the prisons, however, did not exhibit the same scenes. The Conciergerie, adjoining the palace of Justice, and for this reason containing the prisoners destined for the revolutionary tribunal, presented the painful spectacle of some hundreds of unfortunates who had no more than three or four days to live. They were removed thither the day before their trial, and it was there that they spent the short period that intervened between their trial and execution. There were to be seen the Girondists, who had been taken from their previous prison, the Luxembourg; Madame Roland, who, after she had assisted her husband in making his escape, had suffered herself to be imprisoned, not even thinking of flight; the younger Riouffe, Girey-Dupré, and Bois-Guion, attached to the cause of the proscribed deputies, and transferred from Bordeaux to Paris, to be tried at the same time with them; Bailly, who had been arrested at Melun; Clavières, ex-minister of the finances, who had not, like Lebrun, been lucky enough to escape; and the Duke of Orleans, transferred from the prisons of Marseilles to those of Paris; the generals Honchard and Brunet, all reserved for the same fate; and, lastly, the unfortunate Marie Antoinette, who was destined to precede all these illustrious victims to the scaffold. There the inmates took no heed to procure for themselves those conveniences which soothed the lot of the persons confined in the other prisons. They were placed in dull, dreary cells, whither neither light, consolation, or pleasure, ever penetrated. Scarcely were the prisoners allowed the privilege of sleeping on beds instead of upon straw. Unable to divert their attention from the consideration of death like the merely suspected, who imagined that they should not be detained longer than the peace, they strove to amuse themselves with its horrors, and strangely parodied the forms of the revolutionary tribunal, and even the guillotine itself. The Girondists in their prison extemporized and performed singular and terrible dramas, of which their fate and the revolution were the subject. It was at midnight, when the turnkeys had retired to rest, that the melancholy representations commenced. One of those which they devised was as follows; each of them sitting upon a bed, personated the judges and the jury of the revolutionary tribunal, and in particular Fouquier-Tinville. Two of them placed opposite to each other were to represent the accused and his defender. Following the usage of that sanguinary tribunal, the accused was in every case condemned, and then immediately stretched upon a bedstead turned upside down, he underwent the semblance of the punishment even to its minutest details. After many executions the accuser came in his turn to be the accused, and fell in his turn: then it was that, covered with a sheet in the character of the accuser's ghost, he described the torments which he was enduring in hell, proclaimed their fate to all these unjust judges, and seizing them with frightful cries, dragged them with him to the infernal regions. "It was thus," said Riouffe, "that we made sport with each other in the very jaws of death, and that, in our prophetic diversions, we spoke our real sentiments in the midst of spies and executioners."

Since the death of Custine the public began to be accustomed to those political trials, in which mere errors of judgment were transmogrified into crimes worthy of death. Accustomed to these sanguinary practices, the public mind dismissed all compunctious visitings, and looked upon it as quite a natural course of things, that every member of an adverse party should be sent to the scaffold. The Cordeliers and the Jacobins had obtained a decree for bringing the queen to trial, as well as the Girondists, several generals, and the Duke of Orleans. They peremptorily insisted that the promise made with them should be kept, and it was with the queen that they were particularly anxious to commence this long series of immolations. One would think that a woman ought not to have been exposed to political fury, but Marie Antoinette was hated more cordially than even Louis XVI. To her were attributed the duplicities of the court, the waste of the public money, and, above all, the implacable hostility of Austria. Louis XVI., it was said, had suffered every thing to be done, but it was Marie Antoinette who had done every thing; and that she was the person who ought to be punished.

We have already observed as to the alterations that had been made in the Temple. Marie Antoinette had been separated from her sister, her daughter, and her son. By virtue of a decree which gave orders for the trial or banishment of the last members of the family of the Bourbons, she had been removed to the Conciergerie; and there, alone, in a narrow prison, she was reduced to bare necessities, precisely upon the same footing as the other prisoners. The imprudence of a devoted friend had rendered her situation still more painful. Michonnis, a member of the municipality, in whom she had excited a warm interest, was desirous of introducing to her a person who, he said, wished to see her out of curiosity. This man, a courageous emigrant, threw her a pink, enclosing a slip of very fine paper with these words: Your friends are at hand. False hope! and equally pernicious to her who entertained as to him who communicated it. Michonnis and the emigrant were detected, and forthwith apprehended; and the vigilance exercised in regard to the unfortunate prisoner became from that day more severe than ever. Gendarmes were to keep incessant watch at the door of her prison, and they were expressly forbidden to answer any thing that she might say to them.

That wretch Hébert, the deputy of Chaumette, and editor of the disgusting newspaper of Père Duchêne, a writer of the party of which Vincent, Ronsin, Varlet, and Leclerc were the leaders,—this Hébert had made it his particular business to torment the unfortunate survivors of the dethroned family. He affected that the family of the tyrant ought not to be better treated than any sans-culotte family; and he had caused a resolution to be passed, which prohibited a certain description of liberality that had been shown towards the prisoners in the Temple, in respect of their diet. They were no longer to be allowed either poultry or pastry; they were reduced to a single article of food for breakfast, and to soup or broth, and a single dish, for dinner; to two dishes for supper, and half a bottle of wine apiece. Tallow candles were substituted for wax, pewter for silver plate, and common earthenware (faïence) for porcelain. None but the wood and water carriers were permitted to enter their room, and even then accompanied by two commissioners. Their food was given them by means of a turning-box. The well-appointed household was reduced to a cook and scullion, two men-servants, with a woman-servant for the linen.

Immediately after this order had been issued, Hébert went to the Temple, and inhumanly took away from the unfortunate prisoners even the most trifling articles, which they valued exceedingly. Eighty louis, which Madame Elizabeth had saved, and which she had received from Madame de Lamballe, were also taken away. No character is more dangerous or more obdurate than a brutal uneducated man invested with a brief authority. Above all, if he should be of a grovelling nature; if, like Hébert, who was cheek-taker at the door of a theatre and embezzled the receipts, he should be destitute of every natural decency, and if he happen to start, all at once, from the slime of his dirty origin, into power, he will exhibit himself in his true colours, and become as detestable as he is wicked. Such was Hébert in his conduct at the Temple. He did not confine himself to the annoyances we have just alluded to; he and some others conceived the idea of separating the young prince from his aunt and his sister. A shoemaker named Simon, and his wife, were the instructors to whom it was deemed right to consign him, for the purpose of giving him a sans-culotte education. Simon and his wife were confined in the Temple, and becoming prisoners with the unfortunate child, were directed to bring him up in their own way. Their food was better than that of the princesses, and they were fed from the table of the municipal commissaries who were on duty. Simon was permitted to go down, accompanied by two commissaries, to the court-yard of the Temple, with the young prince, for the purpose of giving him a little exercise.

Hébert conceived the detestable idea of wringing from this child statements against his unhappy mother. Whether this wretch communicated to the child false statements, or abused his tender age, and his condition, to extort from him whatsoever he pleased, he obtained a revolting deposition; and as the youth of the prince did not admit of his being brought before the tribunal, Hébert appeared, and detailed the infamous particulars which he had himself either dictated or fabricated.

It was on the 14th of October that Marie-Antoinette appeared before her judges. Dragged before the sanguinary tribunal by the inexorable vengeance of the revolution, she appeared there without the slightest chance of acquittal, for the Jacobins had brought her thither for a far different purpose than to get her acquitted. It was necessary, however, to state some complaints. Fouquier, therefore, collected the rumours current among the populace ever since the arrival of the princess in France; and in the act of accusation, he charged her with having wasted the public money, first, for the maintenance of her pleasures, and afterwards, in order to transmit money to her brother the emperor. He laid great stress upon the scenes of the 5th and 6th of October, and on the entertainment given by the life-guards, alleging that she had at that period contrived a plot, which compelled the people to go to Versailles to frustrate it. He afterwards accused her of having exclusively controlled her husband, of having interfered in the choice of ministers, of having herself been the contriver of the intrigues with the deputies gained over by the court, of having made preparations for the journey to Varennes, of having induced the war, and imparted to the enemy's generals all our plans of the campaign. He further accused her of having prepared a fresh conspiracy on the 10th of August; of having on that day caused the people to be fired upon; of having induced her husband to defend himself by taxing him with cowardice; lastly, of having never ceased to conspire and correspond with the foreign enemy since her captivity in the Temple, and of having there treated her young son as king. We here have presented to us the fact that every thing is distorted, and considered as a crime on that terrible day, when popular vengeance, long deferred, at length bursts forth with uncontrollable force, and smites those princes who have not merited the stroke; we are here also led to observe in what light the profusion and fondness for pleasure, so natural to a young princess, the attachment she displayed towards her native country, her influence over her husband, her complaints always accompanied with less discretion in a woman than in a man, nay, even her more uncompromising spirit, appeared to their excited or malignant imaginations.

Witnesses had to be produced. Lecointre, deputy of Versailles, who had been an eye witness of the events of the 5th and 6th of October, Hébert, who had frequently visited the Temple, various clerks in the government offices, and several domestic servants of the old court were summoned. Admiral d'Estaing, formerly commandant of the national guard of Versailles; Manuel, the ex-procurator of the commune; Latour-du-Pin, minister at war in 1789; the venerable Bailly, who, it was said, had been, with Lafayette, a party implicated in the journey to Varennes; lastly, Valazé, one of the Girondists, doomed to the scaffold, were taken from their prisons, and compelled to appear against her.

No specific fact was proved. Some of the witnesses had seen the queen in high spirits when the life-guards demonstrated their loyal feelings; others had seen her vexed and irritated on her being taken to Paris, or when brought back from Varennes; this person had been present at splendid balls, which must have cost enormous sums; that person had heard it said in the government offices, that the queen was adverse to the sanction of the decrees. An ancient waiting woman of the queen had, in 1788, heard the Duke de Coigny say, that the emperor had already received two hundred millions from France, to support him in his war against the Turks.

The obscene wretch, Hébert, being brought against the unfortunate queen, at length ventured to prefer the charges extorted from the young prince. He said that Charles Capet had given Simon an account of the journey to Varennes, and mentioned Lafayette and Bailly as having concurred therein. He then added that this boy was addicted to odious and precocious vices, considering his age, that Simon having detected him, and having questioned him, had been informed that he derived from his mother the vices in which he indulged. Hébert said that there was no doubt but that Marie-Antoinette had intended, by weakening thus early the physical constitution of her son, to secure to herself the means of obtaining complete ascendancy over him, in case he should ever ascend the throne.

The rumours which had been whispered for twenty years by a profligate court, had given the people the most unfavourable opinion possible of the morals of the queen. Notwithstanding this, the audience, although wholly Jacobin, were disgusted at the accusations of Hébert. However, he did not the less asseverate their truth. The unhappy mother made no reply. Again urged to answer, she said with extraordinary emotion, "I had thought that human nature would have excused me from answering such an imputation, but I appeal from it to the heart of every mother here present." This reply, so noble and yet so simple within, affected all who heard it. However, all was not of this vindictive character that appeared in the depositions of the witnesses against Marie-Antoinette. The brave d'Estaing, whose enemy she had been, declined to say any thing against her, but merely mentioned the courage she had shown on the 5th and 6th of October, and of the noble resolution she had expressed, to die beside her husband rather than turn her back. Manuel, in spite of his enmity to the court during the time of the legislative assembly, declared that he could not say any thing against the accused. When the venerable Bailly was brought forward, the Bailly who had on former occasions so often predicted to the court the calamities which its imprudences would draw down upon it, appeared painfully affected; and when he was asked if he knew the wife of Capet, "Yes," said he, bowing respectfully, "I have known Madame." He declared that he knew nothing, and maintained that the declarations extorted from the young prince relative to the journey to Varennes were false. In consequence of his deposition, he was assailed with the most violent abuse, from which he might readily infer the fate that awaited himself.

From the whole of the evidence there could be collected but two serious facts, evidenced by Latour-du-Pin and Valazé, and they deposed to them merely because they could not deny them. Latour-du-Pin declared that Marie-Antoinette had applied to him for an accurate statement of the armies while he was minister-at-war. Valazé, always cold in his demeanour, but preserving his respect for misfortune, would not say any thing to criminate the accused; yet he could not help declaring that, being a member of the commission of twenty-four, commissioned along with his colleagues to examine the papers discovered at the house of Septeuil, treasurer of the civil list, he had seen bonds for various sums signed Antoinette, in which was nothing extraordinary; but he added, that he had also seen a letter, in which the minister begged the king to transmit to the Queen the copy of the plan of campaign which he had in his hands. The most unfavourable construction was immediately put upon these two facts, namely, the application for a statement of the armies, and the communication of the plan of campaign; and it was concluded that they could not be wanted for any other purpose than to be sent to the enemy; for it was not supposed that a young princess should occupy herself, merely for her own curiosity, with matters of administration and military plans. After these depositions several others were put in, respecting the expenses of the court, the influence the queen exerted in public affairs, the scene of the 10th of August, and what had passed in the Temple; and the most vague rumours and most trivial circumstances were eagerly caught at as proofs.

Marie-Antoinette frequently repeated, with presence of mind and force of argument, that there was no specific fact against her, and that moreover, as being the wife of Louis XVI., she was not answerable for any of the acts of his reign. Fouquier nevertheless declared her to be sufficiently convicted; Claveau-Lagarde made unavailing efforts to defend her; and this unfortunate queen was condemned to undergo the same punishment as her husband.

Conveyed back to the Conciergerie, she there passed with a great degree of composure the night preceding her execution, and on the morning of the following day, the 16th of October, she was conveyed, amidst a great concourse of the populace, to the fatal spot where, ten months before, Louis XVI. had perished. She listened with composure to the exhortations of the ecclesiastic who accompanied her, and cast an indifferent look at the people who had so often applauded her beauty and her graceful motion, and who now as warmly applauded her execution. On reaching the foot of the scaffold, she perceived the Tuileries, and appeared to be agitated, but she hastened to ascend the fatal ladder, and submitted with courage to the executioner. The infamous wretch exhibited her head to the people, as he was always accustomed to do whenever he had sacrificed an illustrious victim.

The Jacobins were overjoyed. "Let these tidings be carried to Austria," said they; "the Romans sold the ground occupied by Hannibal; we strike off the heads that are dearest to the sovereigns who have invaded our territory."

But this was only the commencement of vengeance. Immediately after the trial of Marie-Antoinette, the tribunal was to proceed to that of the Girondists confined in the Conciergerie.

Before the revolt of the South, nothing could be laid to their charge but opinions. It was said, to be sure, that they were connected with Dumouriez, La Vendée, and Orleans; but this connexion, which it was easy to impute in the tribune, it was impossible to prove by evidence, even before a revolutionary tribunal. On the contrary, over since the day that they raised the standard of civil war, and when specific facts could be adduced against them, it was easy to condemn them. True it is also, that the imprisoned deputies were not those who had excited the insurrection of Calvados and of the South, but they were members of the same party, and maintainers of the same cause; there existed a moral conviction that they had corresponded with one another, and though the letters which had been intercepted, did not sufficiently prove the existence of the connexion, they proved quite enough to satisfy a tribunal that, from the term of its constitution, was to content itself with mere probability. All the moderation of the Girondins was, therefore, magnified into a vast conspiracy, which had developed itself by a civil war. Their reluctance in the time of the legislative assembly to act personally against the throne, their opposition to the project of the 10th of August, their struggle with the commune from the 10th of August to the 20th of September, their energetic protestations against the massacres, their pity for Louis XVI., their resistance to the inquisitorial system which disgusted the generals, the opposition they made to the extraordinary tribunal, the maximum, to the forced loan, and, in short, to every revolutionary measure; lastly, their efforts to create a controlling authority by instituting the commission of twelve, their despair after their defeat in Paris—a despair which made them have recourse to the provinces, all this was construed into a conspiracy, of which each fact formed so many connecting links. According to this system of accusation, the opinions which had been uttered in the tribune were merely the indications, the matter of inducement for the civil war which had immediately burst forth; and whoever had expressed, in the legislative assembly and in the convention, the same sentiments as the deputies who had assembled at Caen, Bordeaux, Lyons, and Marseilles, was quite as guilty as they. Though there existed no direct evidence of concert, yet that was to be inferred from their community of opinion, from the friendship which had united most of them together, and from their regular meetings at the houses of Roland and Valazé.

The Girondists, on the contrary, conceived that if they could but argue with the people, they could never be condemned. Their opinions, they said, had been free. They might have differed from the Mountaineers respecting the mode of revolutionary action, without being guilty of a crime. Their opinions neither evidenced personal ambition or premeditated conspiracy. On the contrary, they demonstrated that upon an infinity of points they were by no means entirely agreed. Lastly, their identity with the revolted deputies was but a mere supposition; and their letters, their friendship, their habit of sitting on the same benches, were by no means sufficient to lend to a conclusive demonstration. "If we are only suffered to speak," said the Girondists, "we shall be saved;" a fatal notion, which, without ensuring their acquittal, detracted from that dignity which is the only compensation for an unjust death.

If the parties had exhibited greater candour, they would at least have been more noble. The victorious party might then have said to the vanquished party, "You have carried your attachment to your system of moderate means to such a height as to make war upon us, and to bring the republic within an ace of destruction by a disastrous diversion: you are conquered; you must die." The Girondists, on their part, might fairly have had a good answer to make to their conquerors. They might have said to them, "We look upon you as wretches who overthrow the republic, who dishonour her while you affect to defend her; and we were determined to fight and to destroy you. Yes, we are all equally guilty. We are all the personal friends and of the same opinion with Buzot, Barbaroux, Pétion, and Guadet. These men are great and virtuous citizens, whose virtues we proclaim to your face. While their object was to avenge the republic, we have remained here to proclaim it in the face of our executioners. You are conquerors; put us to death."

But the mind of man is not so constituted as to seek to simplify every thing by candid admissions. The conquering party wishes to convince, and it uses deception. A shadow of hope induces the vanquished party to defend itself, and it avails itself of falsehood; and in civil dissensions we witness those shameful trials, where the stronger party listens, predetermined not to believe, and where the weaker speaks, but not to induce conviction. It is not till sentence is pronounced, not till all hope is lost, that human dignity recovers itself; and it is not till brought within sight of the axe, that it is seen to display itself without diminution.

The Girondists were resolved, therefore, to defend themselves; and they were then obliged to have recourse to concessions and mental reservations. Their adversaries determined to prove their crimes, and, in order to ensure a conviction, sent them before the revolutionary tribunal, all of whom were their enemies—Pache, Hébert, Chaumette, Chabot, and many others, either equally false or equally base. The crowd was great, for it was quite a novel spectacle to witness the condemnation of so many republicans on account of the republic. The accused were twenty-one in number, in the flower of their age, in full possession of their noblest faculties, some even in their prime of youth and manly beauty. There is something affecting in the mere recapitulation of their names and ages.

Brissot, Gardien, and Lasource, were thirty-nine years of age; Vergniaud, Gensonné, and Lehardy, thirty-five; Mainvielle and Ducos, twenty-eight; Boyer-Fonfrède, and Duchastel, twenty-six; Duperret, forty-six; Carra, fifty; Valazé and Lacaze, forty-two; Duprat, thirty-three; Sillery, fifty-seven; Fauchet, forty-nine; Lesterp Beauvais, forty-three; Boileau, fifty-one; Antiboul, forty; Vigée, thirty-six.

Gensonné was tranquil and frigid in his demeanour; Valazé, indignant and contemptuous; Vergniaud, more agitated than usual. Young Ducos was gay; and Fonfrède, who had been spared on the 2d of June, because he had not voted for the arrests ordered by the commission of twelve, but who, by his reiterated appeals in favour of his friends, had since deserved to share their fate—Fonfrède seemed, for so noble a cause, to relinquish cheerfully his large fortune, his young wife, and his existence.

Amar had drawn up the act of accusation in the name of the committee of general safety. Pache was the first witness heard in support of it. Cautious and prudent as he always was, he said that he had long perceived a faction adverse to the revolution, but he adduced no fact proving a premeditated conspiracy. He merely said that, when the convention was threatened by Dumouriez, he went to the committee of finance to obtain funds for the victualling of Paris, and that the committee refused them. He added, that he had been ill-used in the committee of general safety, and that Guadet had threatened him to demand the arrest of the municipal authorities. Chaumette narrated all the struggles of the commune with the right side, just as they had been reported by the newspapers. He added only one particular fact, namely, that Brissot had obtained the appointment of Santonax as commissioner for the colonies; and that Brissot was, consequently, the author of all the calamities of the new world. The wretch Hébert detailed the circumstances of his apprehension by the commission of twelve, and said that Roland bribed all the public writers, for Madame Roland had wished to buy his paper of Père Duchêne. Destournelles, minister of justice, and formerly a clerk to the commune, gave his deposition in an extremely vague manner, and repeated what every body knew; namely, that the accused had attacked the commune, inveighed against the massacres, and had been desirous to institute a departmental guard, &c. The witness whose deposition was the longest as well as the most hostile, for it lasted several hours, was Chabot, the ex-Capuchin, an impatient, weak, and grovelling soul. Chabot had always been treated by the Girondists as an extravagant person, and he never forgave their contempt of him. He arrogated much to himself for having contributed to the 10th of August, contrary to their advice; he affected to say that if they had consented to send him to the prisons, he would have saved the prisoners as he had saved the Swiss; he was desirous, therefore, of wreaking his vengeance on the Girondists; and, above all, to recover by calumniating them his popularity, which was on the wane at the Jacobins, because he was strongly suspected of having had a hand in the late stock-jobbing transactions. He invented a long and malicious accusation, in which he represented the Girondins, seeking first to make a tool of the minister Narbonne, then, after ejecting Narbonne, occupying three ministerial departments at once; bringing about the 20th of June to encourage their creatures, and exerting themselves in opposition to the 10th of August, because they were not desirous of having a republic; lastly, invariably pursuing a self-interested and ambitious part, and what was more atrocious than all the rest, suffering the massacres of September, and the robbery of the Garde Meuble, to take place for no other purpose than to ruin the political reputation of the patriots. "If they would have consented," said Chabot, "I could have saved the prisoners. Pétion gave the murderers money for drink, and Brissot did not wish them to be stopped, because in one of the prisons there was an enemy of his, Morande!"

Such are the vile wretches who persecute worthy characters, as soon as power has given them permission to do so. The moment, therefore, that the leaders cast the first stone, every living thing that crawls in the mud rises up and overwhelms the victim. Fabre d'Églantine, who, like Chabot, had become suspected of stock-jobbing, and was anxious to regain his popularity, made a more subtle but so much the more perfidious deposition, in which he insinuated that the intention of suffering the massacres, and the robbery of the Garde Meuble, to be perpetrated, was far from being inconsistent with the policy of the Girondins. Vergniaud, who could hold out no longer, exclaimed with indignation, "I am not bound to justify myself against

Inasmuch as no specific case was made out against the accused, the only charge alleged against them was in respect of their opinions openly maintained, and they replied that those opinions might have been erroneous, but that they might deceive themselves if they pleased. It was objected to them that their doctrines were not the result of an involuntary, and therefore an excusable error, but of a conspiracy got up at the houses of Roland and Valazé. Again they replied, that so far were these doctrines from being the effect of any previous concert among them, that there were many points on which they were not agreed. One said, I did not vote for the appeal to the people; another, I did not vote for the departmental guard; a third, I by no means concurred with the opinions expressed by the commission of twelve, I disapproved of the arrest of Hébert and Chaumette. All this was true enough; but then the defence no longer applied to all the defendants, they seemed almost to abandon one another, and to condemn those measures in which they had not taken a part. The defendant Boileau, in his anxiety to clear himself, exhibited great pusillanimity, and disgraced himself. He admitted that there had existed a conspiracy against the unity and the indivisibility of the republic; that he was now convinced of this, now confessed it, that he could not point out the guilty persons, but that he wished for their punishment; and he proclaimed himself a staunch Montainier. Gardien had also the weakness to absolutely disavow his connexion with the commission of twelve. However, Gensonné, Brissot, Vergniaud, and more especially Valazé, removed the bad impression the conduct of their two colleagues had created. They alleged fairly enough, that they had not always thought alike, and that, consequently, their opinions were not preconceived; but they disavowed neither their friendship or their doctrines. Valazé frankly admitted that meetings had been held at his house, and maintained that they had a right to meet and to enlighten each other with their ideas, like any other citizens. When at length their connivance with the fugitives was objected to them, they denied it. "What!" exclaimed Hébert, "the accused deny the conspiracy! When the senate of Rome had to pronounce upon the conspiracy of Catiline, if it had questioned each conspirator, and been content with a denial, they would all have escaped the punishment which awaited them; but the meetings at Catiline's, the flight of the latter, and the arms found at the house of [M. Porcius] Lecca, were material proofs, and they were sufficient to determine the judgment of the senate." "Very well," replied Brissot, "I will proceed with the parallel drawn between us and Catiline: Cicero said to him, 'Arms have been found at thy house; the ambassadors of the Allobroges accuse thee; the signatures of Lentulus, of Cethegus, and of Statilius, thy accomplices, prove thy infamous projects.' Here the senate accuses us, it is true; but have arms been found upon us? Are there signatures to produce against us?"

* Dico te priori nocte venisse inter falcarios, non agam obscurè in M. Lecca domum, &c. &c. Cic. Orat in Catil. Trans.

Unfortunately there had been discovered letters sent to Bordeaux by Vergniaud, expressive of the strongest indignation. A letter from a cousin of the defendant Lacaze had also been found, in which the preparations for the insurrection were mentioned; and, lastly, a letter from Duperret to Madame Roland had been intercepted, in which he stated that he had heard from Buzot and Barbaroux, and that they were making preparations to punish the outrages committed in Paris. Vergniaud, on being called upon to explain, replied, "Were I to acquaint you with the motives which induced me to write, perhaps I should appear to you more to be pitied than censured. I had reason to believe, after the plots of the 10th of March, that a design to murder us was connected with the plan for dissolving the national representation. Marat wrote an article to this effect on the 11th of March. The petitions since presented against us with such acrimony have confirmed me in this opinion. It was under these circumstances that my soul was wrung with anguish, and that I wrote to my fellow-citizens, that I was in extreme jeopardy (sous le couteau). I have expostulated against the tyranny of Marat. He was the only person whom I have named. I respect the opinion of the people concerning Marat, but in that particular Marat was my tyrant ———." At these words one of the jury rose and said, "Vergniaud complains of having been persecuted by Marat. I observe, that Marat has been assassinated, and that Vergniaud is still here." This stupid observation was applauded by part of the spectators; and all the candid statement, all the sound reasoning, of Vergniaud were thrown away upon the blind multitude.

Vergniaud, however, had succeeded in making himself heard, and recovered all his eloquence in expatiating on the conduct of his friends, on their devotedness, and on their sacrifices for the republic. The whole audience had shown signs of emotion; and this condemnation, though previously settled, no longer seemed to be irrevocable. The arguments had lasted several days. The Jacobins, enraged at the tardiness of the tribunal, addressed to the convention a fresh petition for the purpose of expediting the proceedings. Robespierre caused a decree to be passed, by which the jury, after three days' discussion, were empowered to declare that they had made up their minds, and to proceed to judgment without hearing any thing further. And to render the appellation more conformable with the subject of nomenclature, it was moreover settled on his motion, that the name of "extraordinary tribunal" should be changed to that of REVOLUTIONARY TRIBUNAL.

Although this decree was passed, the jury did not venture to avail themselves of it immediately, and declared that they had not then made up their minds. But on the following day they made use of their new power to shorten the arguments, and insisted that they should be closed. The accused had now lost all hope, and were resolved to die nobly. They attended with a tranquil air the last sitting of the tribunal. While they were being searched at the gate of the Conciergerie, in order that all instruments with which they could commit suicide should be taken from them, Valazé, giving a pair of scissors to Riouffe, in the presence of the gendarmes, said, "Here my friend is a prohibited weapon. We must not make any attempts on our lives."

On the 30th of October, at midnight, the jury entered to pronounce their verdict. The features of Antonelle, their foreman, appeared changed. Camille-Desmoulins, on hearing the verdict pronounced, cried out, "Ah! it is I who am the death of them, it is my 'Brissot displayed' (Brissot dévoilé *). Let me go," he added, and rushed out in despair. The accused were brought in. On hearing the fatal word pronounced, Brissot dropped his arms, and his head suddenly dropped upon his breast. Gensonné would have said a few words as to the application of the law in this case, but could not obtain a hearing. Sillery letting fall his crutches exclaimed, "This is the happiest day of my life!" Some hopes had been conceived for the two young brothers, Ducos and Fonfrède, who appeared to be less identified with the others, and who had attached themselves to the Girondists, not so much from conformity of opinion, as from admiration of their character and talents. They were nevertheless condemned with the others. Fonfrède embraced Ducos, saying, "Brother, I am the cause of your death." Be of good cheer," replied Ducos, "we shall die together." The Abba Fauchet, with downcast look, seemed to utter a prayer to heaven; Carra retained his stern expression; Vergniaud's appearance had something in it of lofty contempt and disdain; Lasource repeated the saying of one of the ancients, "I die on the day that the people have lost their reason, you will die on that when they shall have recovered it." The weak-spirited Boileau and the timid Gardien were not spared. The former, throwing his hat into the air, exclaimed, "I am innocent." "We are all of us innocent," repeated all the accused; "people, they are deceiving you!" Some of them had the bad taste to throw some assignats among the multitude, as if to cause the people to fly to their relief, but no one stirred. The gendarmes then summoned them for the purpose of conducting them back to their prison. One of the condemned suddenly fell at their feet. They lifted him up weltering in his blood. It was Valazé, who, when giving his scissors to Riouffe, had kept a dagger, with which he had stabbed himself. The tribunal immediately decided that his body should be carried in a tumbril after the condemned. As they left the court, they struck up altogether, by a spontaneous movement, the Marseillais hymn,

L'étendard sanglant est levé.

Their last night was sublime. Vergniaud was provided with poison; he threw it away, that he might die with his friends. They took a last meal together, at which they were by turns gay, serious, and eloquent. Brissot and Gensonné were grave and pensive; Vergniaud spoke of expiring liberty in the noblest terms of regret, and of the ultimate destination of man with persuasive eloquence. Ducos repeated verses which he had composed in prison, and they all joined in singing hymns to France and liberty.

* The title of a pamphlet of which he was the author, directed against the Girondists.

Next day, the 31st of October, an immense crowd collected to see them pass. On their way to the scaffold, they chanted that hymn of the Marseillais which our soldiers sung when marching against the enemy. On reaching the Place de la Revolution, having alighted from their cars, they embraced one another, shouting Vive la Republique! Sillery first ascended the scaffold; and after gravely bowing to the people, in whom he still regarded faulty and misguided human nature, he received the fatal stroke. All of them imitated Sillery, and died with the same dignity. In thirty-one minutes the executioner had caused these illustrious heads to fall, and thus destroyed, in a few moments, youth, beauty, virtue, and talents! Such was the end of these noble and courageous citizens, victims of their Utopian principles. Comprehending neither human nature, or its vicious propensities, or the means of steering it through a revolution, they felt indignant because they could not make it better; and in persisting to act contrary to its passions, they became its victims. Respect to their memory! Never were greater virtues or greater talents displayed in a civil war; and to their glory be it said, if they did not comprehend the necessity of violent means for saving the cause of France, most of their adversaries who preferred those means, decided from the impulse of feeling rather than from reflection. The only one who could stand in a more elevated position was that Mountaineer, who could decide in favour of revolutionary measures out of pure political feeling, and not from the warping influence of personal hatred.

No sooner had the Girondins expired, than fresh victims were sacrificed. The sword stayed not itself for a single moment. On the 2d of November, the unfortunate Olympe de Gouges was put to death for writings styled counter-revolutionary; as was Adam Lux, deputy of Mentz, accused of the same crime. On the 6th, the hapless Duke of Orleans, transferred from Marseilles to Paris, was brought before the revolutionary tribunal, and condemned on account of the suspicions which he had excited in all parties. Odious to the emigrants, suspected both by Girondists and Jacobins, he excited none of that sympathy which affords some consolation for an unjust death. Being rather an enemy to the court than an enthusiast for the republic, he felt not that moral conviction which gives support at the last moment; and of all the victims that suffered, he received least compensation, and was most to be pitied. A disgust of life, and an absolute scepticism, were his expiring sentiments; and he went to the scaffold with extraordinary composure and indifference. As he was drawn along the Rue Saint-Honoré, he beheld his palace with a dry eye, and never for a moment belied his disgust of men and of life. His aid-de-camp, Coustard, who like him was also a deputy, shared his fate. Two days afterwards the interesting and courageous wife of Roland followed them to the scaffold. This woman, combining with the graces of a Frenchwoman the heroism of a Roman matron, had to suffer every species of misfortune. She loved and revered her husband as a father. She experienced for one of the proscribed Girondists a vehement passion, which she had always repressed. She left a young and orphan daughter to the care of friends. While agitated on account of so many and such dear objects, she considered the cause of liberty to which she was enthusiastically attached, and for which she had made such great sacrifices, as for ever lost. Thus she suffered in all her affections at once. Condemned as a party concerned with the Girondists, she heard her sentence with a sort of enthusiasm, seemed to be under the influence of elevated feelings from the moment of her condemnation to that of her execution, and excited a kind of holy awe in all those who visited her. She went to the scaffold dressed in white, and exerted herself the whole way to cheer the spirits of a companion in misfortune, who was to perish with her, but who did not possess the same firmness of character. She even succeeded so far as to draw from him a smile on two occasions. On reaching the place of execution, she bowed to the statue of Liberty, exclaiming, O Liberty! what crimes are committed in thy name! She then submitted to her fate with unshaken resolution (10th of November). Thus perished that charming and elevated woman, who deserved to share in the fate of her friends, but who, more retiring and acting more in accordance with the passive part allotted to her sex, did not shrink from meeting the death due to her talents and her virtues, and spared her husband and herself the ridiculous and calumnious aspersions to which she must have been exposed.

Her husband had fled to the neighbourhood of Rouen. On receiving intelligence of her tragic end, he resolved not to survive her. He quitted the hospitable house where he had received an asylum, and, to avoid compromising any friend, put an end to his life on the high road. He was found pierced to the heart by a sword, and lying against the foot of the tree against which he had placed the destructive weapon. In his pocket was a paper relative to his life and to his conduct as a minister.

Thus, in that frightful delirium which had rendered genius, virtue, and courage suspected, all that was most noble and most generous in France, perished either by suicide or by the axe of the executioner.

Among the deaths of so many illustrious and courageous individuals, there occurred one still more lamentable and more sublime than all the others, it was that of Bailly. It was not very difficult to imagine from the manner in which he had been treated during the queen's trial, what reception he would meet with from the revolutionary tribunal. The scene in the Champ de Mars, the proclamation of martial law, and the firing which followed, were the events most frequently and most bitterly laid to the charge of the constituent party. It was upon Bailly, the friend of Lafayette, and the magistrate who had ordered the red flag to be unfurled, that all the alleged offences of the constituent assembly were to be visited. He was condemned, and was to be executed in the Champ de Mars, the theatre of what was termed his crime. His execution took place on the 11th of November, the weather being cold and rainy. Conducted on foot, and amidst the insults of an inhuman populace, whom he had, when mayor, saved from starving, he exhibited the utmost tranquillity and composure of mind. During the whole way from the Conciergerie to the Champ de Mars, they shook in his face the red flag which had been discovered at the mairie, enclosed in a mahogany box. On reaching the foot of the scaffold it might be supposed that his punishment would immediately have taken place; but one of the abandoned wretches who had made a point of persecuting him, cried out that the field of the federation ought not to be polluted by his blood. A rush was immediately made by the people towards the guillotine, which they forthwith took down, bore off with the same eagerness they had formerly exhibited in digging in that same field of the federation*; they hastened to erect it again upon a dung-heap on the bank of the Seine, and opposite to the quarter of Chaillot, where Bailly had passed his life and composed his works. This operation lasted some hours. Meanwhile, he was obliged to walk several times round the Champ de Mars; bareheaded, and with his hands pinioned behind him, he could scarcely drag himself along. Some pelted him with mud, others kicked and struck him with sticks. He at last fell from sheer exhaustion. They lifted him up again: rain and cold had communicated to his limbs an involuntary shivering. "Thou tremblest," said a soldier to him. "My friend," replied the old man, "it is from cold." After he had been for several hours exposed to this torture, they burned the red flag under his nose, and at length the executioner seized him; when one more illustrious scholar, and one of the most virtuous men that ever honoured our country, was taken from it.

Ever since the time that Tacitus witnessed the applauses the vile populace bestowed upon the crimes of emperors, no change has taken place. Always gross in its actions, at one time it raises an altar to the country, at another it erects scaffolds, and only exhibits a beautiful and a noble spectacle when, incorporated with the armies, it rushes upon the hostile battalions. Let not despotism impute its crimes to liberty, for under despotism it was always quite as guilty as under the republic; but let us rather continually call education and intelligence to the aid of those barbarians who are nurtured in the dregs of society, and are but too ready to stain themselves with the commission of every possible crime, at the instigation of every superior power, and for the dishonour of any cause with which they may be identified.

On the 25th of November, the unfortunate Manuel was also put to death, who had from procurator of the commune become a deputy to the convention, and had resigned his seat at the time of the trial of Louis XVI., because he had been accused of having taken away the balloting-box. The charge against him before the tribunal was his having induced the massacres of September, for the purpose of raising the departments against Paris. It was Fouquier-Tinville who was commissioned to devise these atrocious calumnies, more atrocious even than the condemnation. On the same day was condemned the unfortunate General Brunet, because he had not sent off part of his army from Nice to Toulon; and on the following day, the 26th, sentence of death was pronounced upon the victorious Houchard, because he had not understood the plan laid down for him, and had not been so rapid in his movements upon the causeway of Furnes as to take the whole English army. His was a gross blunder, but it did not call for a capital punishment.

These executions begun to spread general terror, and to render the supreme authority formidable. The alarm they excited was not confined solely to the prisons, the hall of the revolutionary tribunal, and the place de la Revolution; it prevailed every where, in the markets and in the shops, where the maximum and the laws against forestalling had recently been rigorously executed. We have already seen how the depreciation of the assignats and the increased price of commodities had led to the decree of the maximum, for the purpose of putting merchandise and money upon the same footing. The first effects of this maximum had been most disastrous, and had occasioned the shutting up of a great number of shops. By establishing a tariff for articles of primary necessity, the government had done no more than subject to its regulations those goods which had found their way to the retail dealer, and were ready to pass from the hands of the latter into those of the consumer. But the retail dealer who had bought them of the wholesale trader before the maximum, and at a higher price than that of the new tariff, suffered enormous losses, and complained bitterly. Even when he had made his purchases after the maximum had been settled, the losses sustained by him were not a whit the less. In point of fact, in the tariff of those commodities termed necessities of life, they were not so called until they were made up, and ready for consumption, and it was not till they came under this latter description that their price was fixed. But no mention was made as to what price they should bear in shape of the raw material, or what wages were to be paid to the mechanic who worked them up; to the carrier, or the navigator, who conveyed them from place to place; consequently the retailer, who was obliged to sell to the consumer according to the tariff, and who could have no dealings with the workman, the manufacturer, or the wholesale trader, according to that same tariff, could not possibly continue so ruinous a mode of trade. Greater part of the tradesmen shut up their shops, or fraudulently evaded the law. They sold only goods of the worst quality at the maximum, and reserved the best for those who came secretly to pay for them at their true value.

The populace who detected these frauds, and saw a great number of shops shut up, did not restrain themselves, but also assailed the commune with their remonstrances. They insisted that all traders should be obliged to keep their shops open and to continue their trade, whether they liked it or not. Being in the humour to complain of every thing and every body, they denounced those butchers and porkmen who bought diseased animals, or such as had died naturally, as well as those who, in order that the meat might weigh heavier, did not bleed the carcasses sufficiently; those bakers who, in order to keep back the best flour for the rich, sold the worst to the poor, and baked the bread too slack, that it might weigh the heavier; those wine-merchants who mixed the most deleterious drugs with their wines; those dealers in salt who, to increase the weight of that commodity, adulterated it grossly; those grocers, and, in short, all those retail dealers who adulterated commodities in a thousand ways.

Some of these abuses had always existed, and some were peculiar to the present state of things, but when the impatience of wrong seizes the minds of the people, they complain of every thing, they endeavour to reform every thing, and to punish every body.

The procurator general, Chaumette, made a flaming harangue against the traders in reference to this subject. "It will be recollected," said he, "that in '89 and the following years all these men carried on a great trade, but with whom? with foreigners. It is well known that it was they who caused the fall of the assignats, and that it was by jobbing in paper money that they enriched themselves. What have they done since they made their fortune? They have retired from business; they have threatened the people with a dearth of commodities; but if they have gold and assignats, the public has something still more valuable—it has arms. Arms, not gold, are wanted to put our trades and manufactures in motion. If, then, these individuals leave off trade, the republic will take them on hand, and put in requisition all the raw materials. Let them remember that it rests with the republic to reduce, whenever it pleases, to dust and ashes, the gold and the assignats which are in their hands. That giant the people must crush the mercantile speculators.

"We feel for the hardships of the people, because we ourselves are the people. The entire council is composed of sans-culottes. This is the legislating people. It is of little consequence if our heads fall, provided posterity will deign to preserve our skulls ———! It is not the Gospel I shall quote, but Plato: 'He who shall strike with the sword,' says that philosopher, 'shall fall by the sword; he who shall destroy by poison, shall perish by poison; famine shall pine him who would furnish the people ———.' If commodities and provisions run short, to whom shall the people betake themselves? The constituted authorities? no. The convention? no. They will betake themselves to the contractors and provision-merchants. Rousseau, who was also one of the people, said: 'When the people shall have nothing more to eat, they will devour the rich.'" (Commune 14, October.)

Forced measures lead on to forced measures, as we have elsewhere observed. The scope of the first laws did not extend to other than wrought goods. It was now become necessary to notice the raw material; nay, the idea of taking to the raw material and the workmen for the account of the republic began to float in some minds. It is a dreadful obligation, that of forcing nature, and attempting to regulate all her movements. We are soon compelled to supply the act of volition in every particular, and to substitute even our existence for obedience to the law. The commune and the convention were obliged to take new measures, each according to its respective department.

The commune of Paris obliged every dealer to declare the quantity of articles of consumption he had on hand, the orders which he had given to procure more, and the expectations which he had of their arrival. Every shopkeeper who had been in business for a year, and either relinquished it or suffered it to be at a stand-still, was declared a suspected person, and imprisoned as such. To prevent the confusion and the accumulation arising from an anxiety to lay in a stock, the commune also decided that the consumer should apply only to the retailer, and the retailer only to the wholesale dealer: and it fixed the quantities which each should be allowed to order. Thus the grocer could not order more than twenty-five pounds of sugar at a time of the wholesale dealer, and the vendor of lemonade not more than twelve. It was the revolutionary committees that delivered the tickets for purchasing and that assessed the proportions. The commune did not confine itself to these regulations. As the throng about the doors of the bakers still continued the same, as there was still the same tumult there, and as many people were kept waiting part of the night to be served, it was ordered, on the suggestion of Chaumette, that those who came last should be served first, which diminished neither the tumult or the eagerness which was exhibited. As the people complained that the worst flour was reserved for them, it was ordered that in the city of Paris there should be made in future but one sort of bread, composed of three-fourths wheaten flour, and one-fourth rye. Lastly, a commission of inspection for provisions was instituted, to certify the state of commodities, to take cognizance of frauds, and to punish them. These measures, imitated by the other communes, and frequently even embodied in decrees, immediately became general laws; and thus, as we have already observed, the commune exercised an enormous influence in every thing connected with the internal management and the police.

The convention, urged to reform the law of the maximum, devised a new one, which included every process of manufacture, and even the raw material. It required that a statement should be made out of the cost price of goods at the place of manufacture in 1790. To this price was to be added, in the first place, one-third more, according to circumstances; secondly, a fixed sum for carriage from the place of manufacture to the place of consumption; thirdly, and lastly, five per cent. for the profit of the wholesale dealer, and ten for the retail dealer. From all these elements the future price of necessities of life was to be sought. The local administrations were directed to see these regulations enforced, each of them according to the manufacture and consumption that took place within the district. A bounty was granted to every retail dealer, who, possessing a capital of less than ten thousand francs, could prove that he had lost that capital by the maximum. The communes were to judge of the case by personal inspection,—a mode of decision at that time universally adopted, as in fact it is in all times of dictatorship. Thus this law, without considering every process of manufacture, from the raw material to its being worked up, assessed the price of the commodity on its leaving the manufactory, the price of carriage, and the profit of the wholesale and retail dealer, and by absolute rules compensated for the fickleness of nature in at least half of the social operations. But all this, we repeat, was an inevitable consequence of the first maximum: the first maximum proceeded from the assignats, and the as-

To administer to this system of control, instituted in respect of commercial transactions, a commission of provisioning and victualling was appointed, whose authority was to extend over the whole republic, and was composed of three members appointed by the convention, enjoying nearly the importance of the ministers themselves, and having voices in the council. This commission had it in charge to carry the tariffs into execution, to superintend the conduct of the communes in this respect, to continually ascertain the quantities of articles of general consumption and food, to order their transfer from one department to another, and to fix the requisitions for the armies, in accordance with the celebrated decree which instituted the revolutionary government.

The financial situation of the country was not less extraordinary than all the rest. The two loans, the one forced, the other voluntary, were filled up rapidly. A general eagerness was manifested to subscribe to the second, because the advantages which it held out rendered it far preferable; and thus the moment approached, when one thousand millions of assignats were about to be withdrawn from circulation. There were in the treasury, for current expenses, four hundred millions, or thereabouts, remaining from the old loans, and five hundred millions of royal assignats, called in by the decree which divested them of their monetary character, now converted into a like sum in republican assignats. There remained, therefore, for the public service a sum of about nine hundred millions, or thereabouts.

That which appears most extraordinary is, that the assignat, which had fallen three-fourths, and even four-fifths, had risen to a par with specie. In this rise there was something substantive and something factitious. The gradual extinction of a floating thousand millions, the success of the first levy, which had produced six hundred thousand men in the space of a month, and the recent victories of the republic, which almost ensured its existence, had accelerated the continual sale of the national possessions, and restored some credit to the assignats, but still not sufficient to place them on the same footing with money. The causes which put them apparently upon the footing of a monetary currency were these. It will be recollected, that a law forbade, under very heavy penalties, the traffic in specie, that is, the exchange at a loss to the assignat, when put in competition with money; another law also enacted very severe penalties against those who, in making purchases, should bargain for different prices, having regard to the fact whether payment was to be made in paper or in money. In this manner specie could not maintain its real value, either as against the assignat, or as against merchandise; and people had no other resource than to hoard it. But by a recent law it was enacted that hoarded gold, silver, or jewels, should belong partly to the state, partly to the informer. Thenceforth people could neither employ specie in trade, or conceal it; it became a burden, it exposed the possessor to the risk of being considered as a suspected person, people began to be afraid of it, and preferred the assignat for daily purposes. This it was that had momentarily re-established the par which, so far as paper was concerned, had never really existed, even on the first day of its creation. Many communes, annexing their own regulations to those of the convention, had even prohibited the circulation of money, and ordered that it should be brought in chests to be exchanged for assignats. The convention, it is true, had abolished all these particular regulations of the communes; but the general laws which it had passed had, nevertheless, rendered specie useless and dangerous. Many people disposed of it for payment of taxes, or to the loan, or handed it over to foreigners, who carried on a great traffic in it, and came to the frontier towns to receive it in exchange for merchandise. The Italians and the Genoese, in particular, who brought us great quantities of corn, frequented the southern ports, and bought up gold and silver at low prices. Specie had, therefore, made its appearance again, owing to the effect of these terrible laws; and the party of fervid revolutionists, apprehending lest its appearance should again prove prejudicial to the paper money, were desirous that specie, which hitherto had not been excluded from circulation, should be absolutely prohibited; they required that its circulation should be forbidden, and that all who possessed it should be ordered to bring it to the public coffers to be exchanged for assignats.

Terror had almost even extinguished stock-jobbing. Speculations upon specie had, as we have just seen, become impracticable. Foreign paper, now branded with reprobation, no longer circulated as it did two months before; and the bankers, accused on all sides of being agents of the emigrants, and adding themselves to stock-jobbing, were in the utmost consternation. For a moment, the seal had been put upon their effects; but the danger of interrupting banking operations, and thus checking the circulation of all capital, was soon felt, and the seals were removed. Nevertheless the alarm was so great, that nobody thought of engaging in any kind of speculation.

The East India Company was at length dissolved. We have noticed the conspiracy which had been formed by certain deputies to speculate in the shares of that company. The Baron de Batz, in concert with Julien of Toulouse, Delaunay of Angers, and Chabot, had arranged, by means of making motions of alarming import, to make shares fall, then to buy them up, and afterwards by more moderately framed motions to produce a re-action, and then sell out, and realize the profits of this fraudulent rise. The Abbé d'Espagnac, whose patron Julien was at the committee of contracts, was to furnish the funds for these speculations. These unhappy men actually succeeded in causing the shares to fall from four thousand five hundred to six hundred and fifty livres, and they made considerable gains. The extinction of the company, however, could not be prevented. They then put themselves in motion to make a bargain with it for favourable terms to be inserted in the bill for its abolition. Delaunay and Julien of Toulouse talked the matter over with the directors in their way, and said to them, "If you will give us such a sum, we shall bring in the draft of such a decree; if not, we will bring in such a one." It was agreed that they should be paid the sum of five hundred thousand francs, for which they were, in proposing the abolition of the company, which could no longer be deferred, to cause the matter of its dissolution to be assigned to itself, which might prolong its duration for a considerable time. This sum was to be divided among Delaunay, Julien, Chabot, and Bazire, whom his friend Chabot had acquainted with the intrigue, but who refused to take any part in it.

Delaunay brought in the bill for the abolition, on the 17th of Vendémiaire. He proposed to abolish the company, to oblige it to refund the sums which it owed to the state; and, above all, to make it pay the duty on transfers, which it had evaded by changing its shares into inscriptions upon its books. Finally, he proposed to leave the business of winding up its affairs to itself. Fabre d'Eglantine, who was not yet in the secret, and who speculated as it appeared upon other views, immediately opposed this motion, saying, that to permit the company to wind up its affairs itself was perpetuating it, and that upon this pretext it might continue to exist for an indefinite period. He proposed, therefore, to transfer to the government the matter of this dissolution. Cambon moved, as a sub-amendment, that the state, in undertaking the matter of the dissolution, should not be charged with the debts of the company if they exceeded its assets. The decree and the two amendments were adopted, and referred to the commission to be definitively settled. The members in the plot immediately thought it necessary that they should bring over Fabre to their plan, so as to obtain, in the settling of the decree, some provisos therein. Chabot was despatched to Fabre with one hundred thousand francs, and secured his concurrence. Now see what they next did. The decree was drawn up as it had been passed by the convention, and submitted for signature to Cambon and to those members of the commission who were not accomplices in the scheme. To this authentic copy were then added certain words which entirely reversed the sense. In the clause respecting the transfers which had evaded the duty, but which were subjected to its payment, were added these words: excepting those fraudulently made, which tended to revive all the pretensions of the company, in regard to the exemption from the duty. On the subject of the matter of the dissolution these words were added: Agreeably to the statutes and rules of the company, which gave to the latter the right of interference in settling the matter of the dissolution. These interpolations materially altered the effect of the decree. Chabot, Fabre, Delaunay, and Julien of Toulouse, afterwards signed it, and delivered the falsified copy to the commission for the promulgation of the laws, who caused it to be printed and promulgated as an authentic decree. They hoped that the members who had signed before these slight alterations were made, would either not recollect or not perceive them, and they divided among themselves the sum of five hundred thousand francs. Bazire alone refused his share, saying that he would not be a party to such disgraceful transactions.

Meanwhile Chabot, whose luxurious style of living began to attract the eye of the accuser, was sorely afraid lest he should find himself compromised. He had hung up in bags the hundred thousand francs which he had received as his share, in water-closets; and as his accomplices saw that he was ready to betray them, they threatened to be beforehand with him, and to denounce the whole affair if he abandoned them. Such had been the issue of this scandalous conspiracy between the Baron de Batz and three or four deputies. The general terror which threatened every body's life, however blameless, communicated itself to them, and they were apprehensive of being detected and punished. For a time, therefore, all speculations were suspended, and nobody ever thought of engaging in stock-jobbing.

It was precisely at this time, when there was no care of acting in repugnance to all generally received notions and to all established habits, that the plan for introducing a new system of weights and measures, and changing the calendar, was carried into execution. An affectation of general uniformity, and a contempt for every impediment, could scarcely fail to distinguish a revolution which was at once philosophical and political. It had divided the country into eighty-three equal portions; it had imparted uniformity to the civil, religious, and military administrations; it had reduced to a system of uniformity every description of public engagements. It therefore did not wish to be behindhand in reducing weights, measures, and the division of time, to the same uniformity. It is true that this affectation for uniformity, degenerating into a spirit of system, nay, even into a rage, caused the indispensable and attractive varieties of nature to be too often forgotten; but it is only in paroxysms of this kind that the human mind effects extensive and difficult regenerations. The new system of weights and measures, one of the most admirable inventions of the age, was the result of this audacious spirit of innovation. The idea was conceived of taking for the unit of weights and for the unit of measures, those quantities which were natural, and invariably recognised in every country. Thus, distilled water was taken for the unit of weight, and a part of the meridian for the unit of measure. These units, multiplied or divided by ten, ad infinitum, formed that beautiful system known by the name of the system of decimals (calcul decimal).

The same regularity had to be applied to the division of time; and the difficulty of changing the associations of a people in those points which are most difficult to unsettle, was not capable of deterring men so determined as those who then presided over the destinies of France. They had already changed the Gregorian era into a republican era, and dated the latter from the first year of liberty. They made the year and the new era begin with the 22nd of September, 1791*, a day which, by a fortunate coincidence, was that of the institution of the republic and of the autumnal equinox. The year would have been divided into ten parts, in conformity with the decimal system, but in basing a division of the months upon a system correspondent with the twelve revolutions of the moon round the earth, it became absolutely necessary to admit twelve months. Nature here commanded the infraction of the decimal system. The month consisted of thirty days; it was divided into three portions of ten days each, called decades, as a substitute for the four weeks. The tenth day of each decade was set apart for rest, and answered to the former Sunday. Thus there was one day of rest less in the month*. The Catholic religion had multiplied holydays to infinity. The revolution, preaching up industry, deemed it right to reduce them as much as possible. The months were named after the seasons to which they belonged. As the year commenced with autumn, the first three months belonged to that season, they were called Vendémiaire, Brumaire, Frimaire; the three following corresponded to the winter months, and were called Nivose, Pluviose, Ventose; the next three, answering to spring, were named Germinal, Floréal, Prairial; and the last three, comprising summer, were denominated Messidor, Thermidor, Fructidor†.

* A specimen of one month will serve to make the others understood. The reader will suppose, Nivose (or the snowy month), which began on the 21st of December, 1797, and ended on the 19th of January, 1798. And one thing is to be remarked, that the republicans mentioned the date as they had used to do, changing only the name of the month, and without noticing the Decadi, or whether it were Primidi, Duodi, Tridi, &c. for they said, Cette Bataille se donna le 26 Nivose, that battle was fought on the 26 Nivose, just as we should say, that event took place on the 20th of such a month, without mentioning whether it were Monday or any other day.

† These names were intended to signify, or have relation to, the state of the atmosphere, or the productions of nature.

I. VENDÉMIAIRE.—Vintage month, which contained the nine last days of September and the twenty first days of October.

II. BRUMAIRE.—Foggy month, which contained the ten last days of October and the twenty first days of November.

These twelve months, of thirty days each, formed a total of only three hundred and sixty days. There remained five days for completing the year. These were called complementary days, and by a felicitous thought they were to be set apart for national festivals by the name of sans-culottides, a name which must be conceded to the passions of the time, and which is not more absurd than many others adopted by the people of other countries. The first was to be consecrated to genius; the second to labour; the third to noble actions; the fourth to rewards; and lastly, the fifth to opinion. This last festival, absolutely original in its conception, and perfectly adapted to the French character, was to be a sort of political carnival of twenty-four hours, during which time every one was to be allowed to say or to write respecting every public character whatever he pleased. It was for opinion to do justice upon opinion itself; and all magistrates were to protect themselves by their virtues against the truths and the calumnies of that day. Nothing could be more grand or moral than this idea. We ought not now, because a more mighty destiny has swept away the thoughts and the institutions of that period, to make its vast and bold conceptions the butt of ridicule. The Romans have not been held ridiculous, because on the day of triumph, the soldier placed behind the car of the triumphant general, was at liberty to utter whatever his hatred or his mirth suggested. As in every four years the leap-year brought six complementary days instead of five, this sixth sans-culottide was to be called the festival of the revolution, and was to be consecrated to a grand solemnity, in which the French should celebrate the epocha of their enfranchisement, and the institution of the republic.

The day was divided according to the decimal system into ten parts or hours, these into ten others, and so on. New dials were ordered for the purpose of putting in practice this new method of calculating time; but not to attempt too much at once, this latter reform was postponed for one year.

The last revolution, the most difficult, the most obnoxious to the accusation of tyranny, was the experiment made in respect of religion. The revolutionary laws relative to religion had been left precisely as the constituent assembly had framed them. It will be recollected that this first assembly, desirous of bringing the ecclesiastical administration to the same description of uniformity as the civil administration, determined that the extent of every diocese should be commensurate with the department, that the bishop should be elective like all the other functionaries, and that, in short, without having regard to any particular doctrine, its discipline should be regulated, as all the parts of the political organization had just been. Such was the civil constitution of the clergy, to which the ecclesiastics were compelled under oath to observe. From that day, it will be recollected, a schism had taken place. Those who had adhered to the new institution were called constitutional or sworn priests, and those who refused to do so, refractory priests. These latter were merely deprived of their functions, and provided for by a pension. The legislative assembly, seeing that they made it their business to excite a strong feeling against the new system, placed them under the surveillance of the authorities of the departments, and even decreed that upon conviction before those authorities, they might be banished from the territory of France. Lastly, the convention, more severe in proportion as their conduct became more seditious, condemned all the refractory priests to transportation. As the public mind became daily more extravagantly outrageous, it began to be questioned why, when all the old monarchical superstitions were abolished, there should yet be retained a shadow of religion, in which scarcely any one continued to believe, and which formed a most striking contrast with the new institutions and the new manners of republican France. Laws had already been called for in favor of married priests, and for protecting them against certain local administrations, which wanted to deprive them of their functions. The convention, extremely reserved on this point, would not make any new enactments in regard to this subject, and by this course the priests were authorized by them to retain their functions and their salaries. Moreover, certain petitions had been preferred against the payment of salaries in support of any religion, and to leave it to each sect to pay its own ministers, to prohibit external ceremonies, and to oblige all religions to confine themselves to their own places of worship. The convention confined itself to reducing the income of a bishop to the maximum of six thousand francs, since there were some of them whose income amounted to seventy thousand. On every other point the convention declined to interfere, and kept silence, leaving it to France to take the initiative in the abolition of every species of religious worship. The convention was apprehensive lest, by meddling itself with creeds, it should alienate part of the population still attached to the Catholic religion. The commune of Paris, who were less scrupulous, seized this glorious opportunity for a great reform, and was anxious to set the first example of the abjuration of Catholicism.

While the patriots of the convention and of the Jacobins, while Robespierre, Saint-Just, and the other revolutionary leaders, stopped short at deism, Chaumette, Hébert, and all the notables of the commune and the Cordeliers, placed in a far lower station by their functions and their intelligence, could not fail, according to the common course of things, to overstep all bounds, and proceed to atheism itself. They did not openly profess that doctrine, but there were grounds for imputing it to them. In their speeches and in their writings the name of God was never mentioned, and they were incessantly repeating that a nation ought to be governed by reason alone, and to allow no other worship but that of reason. Chaumette was neither so grovelling or malignant or ambitious as Hébert: he did not seek, by overacting the prevailing opinions, to supplant the actual leaders of the revolution; but destitute of political views, full of a common-place philosophy, and possessed with an extraordinary propensity for declamation, he preached with all the zeal and the bigotry of a missionary in favour of good morals, industry, the patriotic virtues, and lastly reason, always abstaining from the mention of the name of God. He had inveighed with vehemence against the pillages; he had severely reprimanded the women who neglected their household concerns to take a part in political commotions, and he had had the courage to abolish their club; he had induced the prohibition of mendicity, and the establishment of public workshops for the purpose of giving employment to the poor; he had thundered against prostitution, and prevailed on the commune to prohibit the profession of women of the town, everywhere tolerated as inevitable. These unfortunates were forbidden to appear in public, or even to carry on their deplorable profession in the interior of houses. Chaumette said that they belonged to monarchical and Catholic countries, where there were idle citizens and unmarried priests, and that industry and marriage ought to drive them from republican territories.

Chaumette, therefore, taking the initiative in the name of that system of reason, launched out at the commune against the publicity of the Catholic worship. He insisted that this was a privilege which that religion ought not to enjoy more than any other; and that if each sect had that exclusive allowance, the streets and public places would soon become the theatre of the most ridiculous farces. As the commune was invested with the local police, he obtained a resolution, on the 23d of Vendémiaire (October the 14th), that no ministers of religion whatever should be allowed to exercise their worship, save in the places consecrated thereto. He instituted new funeral ceremonies for rendering the last duties to the dead. None but friends and relatives were to accompany the coffin. All the religious symbols in cemeteries were suppressed, and were replaced by a statue of Sleep, following Fouché's example in the department of L'Allier. Instead of cypress and mournful shrubs, the burial-grounds were to be planted with those of a more cheerful appearance and of a more fragrant nature. "The beauty and the perfume of the flowers," said Chaumette, "will naturally excite more consolatory associations. I would fain, if it were possible, be able to inhale the spirit of my father!" All the outward signs of religion were entirely abolished. It was also settled by the same regulation, and always upon the representations of Chaumette, that there should not be sold in the streets any kinds of jugglery, such as consecrated napkins, Saint-Veronica's handkerchiefs, Eusebii Hosios, crosses, Agnus Deis, Virgins, bodies and rings of Saint-Hubert, nor any powders, medicinal waters, and other adulterated drugs. The image of the Virgin was every where suppressed; and all the Madonnas in niches at the corners of streets were taken down, to make room for the busts of Marat and Lepelletier.

Anacharsis Clootz, the same Prussian baron who, possessing an income of one hundred thousand livres, had left his own country to come to Paris, as the representative, he said, of the human race; who at the first federation in 1790 had figured at the head of the self-styled envoys of all nations; and who had afterwards been elected deputy to the national convention,—this Anacharsis Clootz was unceasingly preaching an universal republic and the worship of reason. Full of these two ideas, he incessantly illustrated them in his writings; and at one time by manifestos, at another time by addresses, he submitted his notions to all nations for their approval. To him Deism appeared quite as culpable as Catholicism itself. He never ceased to call for the destruction of tyrants and gods of every description, and held forth that all that liberated and enlightened humanity required was pure reason and her beneficent and immortal worship. To the convention he said, "I found no other way of getting free from all the tyrants, sacred and profane, but by incessant travel; I was in Rome when they would have imprisoned me in Paris, and in London when they would have burned me in Lisbon. It was by thus running hither and thither, from one extremity of Europe to the other, like a weaver's shuttle, that I escaped the algazils and the spies, all the masters and all the servants. My emigrations ceased when the emigration of the wretches commenced. It was at the greatest place on the face of the globe, it was at Paris that the orator of the human race took his station. I have not quitted it since 1789. It was then that I redoubled my zeal against the pretended sovereigns of earth and heaven. I boldly preached that there is no other God but nature, no other sovereign but the human race, the godlike people. The people is sufficient for itself. It will subsist for ever. Nature kneels not before herself. Judge then of the majesty of the liberated human race by that of the French people, who compose but a fraction. Judge of the infallibility of the whole by the sagacity of a part, which singly makes the enslaved world tremble. The committee of superintendence of the universal republic will have a less care than the committee of the smallest section of Paris. A general confidence will succeed an universal distrust. In my commonwealth there will be few public offices, few taxes, and no executioner. Reason will unite all men into a single representative fuscus, without any other tie than epistolary correspondence. Citizens, religion is the only impediment to this Utopia. It is high time to destroy it. The human race has burnt its swaddling-clothes. 'The people exert no vigour,' said one of the ancients, 'except on the day that follows a bad reign.' Let us profit by this first day, which we will prolong till the morrow for the deliverance of the world!"

The requisitions of Chaumette revived all the hopes of Clootz. He called upon Gobel, an intriguer of Porentruy, who had become constitutional bishop of the department of Paris, by that rapid movement which had elevated Chaumette, Hébert, and many others, to the highest municipal functions. He persuaded him that the moment had arrived for abjuring, in the face of France, the Catholic religion, of which he was the chief pontiff; that his example would be followed by all the ministers of that communion; that it would enlighten the nation, produce a general abjuration, and thus oblige the convention to decree the abolition of Christianity. Gobel did not exactly wish to abjure his own belief, and thereby admit that he had been playing the part of a deceiver all his life; but he consented to go and abdicate the episcopacy. Gobel then prevailed upon the majority of his vicars to follow his example. It was agreed with Chaumette and the members of the department that all the constituted authorities of Paris should accompany Gobel, and form part of the deputation, to invest it with the greater solemnity.

On the 17th of Brumaire (November 7, 1793) Momoro, Pache, Lhuillier, Chaumette, Gobel, and all his vicars, repaired to the convention. Chaumette and Lhuillier, both of them procurators, one of the commune, the other of the department, announced to the convention that the clergy of Paris had come to pay a glorious and sincere homage to reason. They then introduced Gobel, with a red cap on his head, and who holding in his hand his mitre, his crosier, his cross, and his ring, thus addressed the assembly: "Born a plebeian, a curate of Porentruy, sent by my clergy to the former assembly, then raised to the archbishopric of Paris, I have never ceased to obey the people. I have accepted the functions which that people formerly bestowed on me, and now, in obedience to the people, I am come to resign them. I suffered myself to be made a bishop when the people wanted bishops. I cease to be a bishop now when the people no longer desire to have any." Gobel added, that all his clergy, actuated by the same sentiment, charged him to make the like declaration for them. When he had finished speaking, he laid down his mitre, his crosier, and his ring. His clergy confirmed his declaration. The president replied, with great address, that the convention had decreed perfect freedom in religious worship, that she had felt it her duty to leave it unrestricted to every sect, that she had never interfered in their creeds, but that she applauded those who, enlightened by reason, came to renounce their superstitions and their errors.

Gobel had not abjured either the priesthood or Catholicism, and had not ventured to declare himself an impostor who had brought himself at last to confess his lies; but others assume that his declaration went that length for him. "Renouncing," said the curé of Vaugirard, "the prejudices which fanaticism had implanted in my heart and mind, I lay down my letters of ordination." Several bishops and curates, as members also of the convention, then followed this example, and laid down their letters of ordination or abjured Catholicism. Julien of Toulouse abdicated also his title of Protestant minister. These abdications were hailed with tumultuous applause by the assembly and the galleries. At this moment, Gregoire, bishop of Blois, entered the hall. He was informed of what had passed, and was requested to follow the example of his colleagues. He resolutely refused. "If it be," said he, "a mere question as to the income attached to the episcopal functions, I resign that without regret. Is it my quality of priest and bishop? I cannot strip myself of that; my religion forbids me. I appeal to the freedom of religion." The words of Gregoire finished amidst tumult, but they did not check the explosion of joy which this scene had excited. The deputation quitted the assembly attended by an immense concourse, and proceeded to the Hotel de Ville, to receive the congratulations of the commune.

After the example had been once set, it became no difficult matter to excite all the sections of Paris, and all the communes of the republic, to follow it. The sections soon met, and came one after another to declare that they renounced the errors of superstition, and that they acknowledged no other worship than that of reason. The section of L'Homme-Armé declared that it acknowledged no other worship than that of truth and reason, no other fanaticism than that of liberty and equality, no other doctrine than that of fraternity and the republican laws decreed since the 31st of May, 1793. The section of La Reunion intimated that it would make a bonfire of all the confessionals, and of all the books used by the catholics, and that it would cause the church of Saint Méry to be closed. The section of William Tell renounced for ever what it termed the worship of error and imposture. The section of Mucius Sævola abjured Catholicism, and declared that on the next decadi it would celebrate at the high altar of Saint Sulpice the inauguration of the busts of Marat, Lepelletier, and Mucius Sævola. The section of Les Piques that it would adore no other god than the god of liberty and equality. The section of the Arsenal also abjured the Catholic religion.

Thus the sections, taking the initiative, abjured Catholicism as the established religion, and took possession of its edifices and its treasures, as it would of buildings and treasures appurtenant to the communal demesnes. The deputies on mission in the departments had already incited a great number of communes to seize the moveable property of the churches, which they said was not necessary for religion, and which, besides, like all public property, belonged to the state, and might therefore be appropriated for its purposes. Fouché had sent several chests of plate from the department of L'Allier. A great quantity had arrived from other departments. This example, followed in Paris and the environs, soon brought piles of wealth to the bar of the convention. All the churches were stripped, and the communes sent deputations with the gold and silver accumulated in the shrines of saints, or in places consecrated by antique devotion. They went in procession to the convention, and the rabble indulging their taste for the burlesque, caricatured in the most ludicrous manner the ceremonies of religion, and took as much delight in profaning as they had formerly done in celebrating them. Men wearing surplices, chasubles, and copes, came singing Alleluia, and dancing the carmagnole at the bar of the convention; there they deposited the ostensories and the boxes in which the host was kept, and the images of gold and silver; they delivered themselves of satirical speeches, and sometimes addressed the most singular harangues to the saints themselves. "O ye," exclaimed a deputation from Saint Denis, "O ye instruments of fanaticism! blessed saints of every degree, be at last patriots, rise en masse, serve the country by going to be melted for money, and give us in this world that felicity which you desired to obtain for us in the other!" These scenes of merriment were followed all at once by scenes of reverence and devotion. The same persons who trampled underfoot the saints of Christianity bore a canopy; the curtains were thrown back, and pointing to the busts of Marat and Lepelletier, "These," said they, "are not gods made by men, but the images of worthy citizens assassinated by the slaves of kings." They then filed off before the convention, again singing alleluia and dancing the carmagnole; they then carried the rich spoils of the altars to the mint, and placed the revered busts of Marat and Lepelletier in the churches, now become the temples of a new worship.

At the requisition of Chaumette, it was resolved that the metropolitan church of Notre Dame should be converted into a republican edifice, called the Temple of Reason. A fête was appointed for the days of the decades, which fête was to supersede the catholic ceremonies of Sunday. The mayor, the municipal officers, and the public functionaries, repaired to the temple of reason, where they read the declaration of the rights of man, as also the constitutional act, discussed the news from the armies, and related the brilliant actions which had been performed during the decade. A letter-box of truth (une bouche de vérité), resembling the letter-boxes of denunciation which formerly existed at Venice, was placed in the temple of reason, to receive opinions, censures, or advice, likely to prove of utility to the public. These letters were examined and read upon everydecade, an orator then delivered a moral sermon, after which pieces of music were performed, and the performance concluded by singing republican hymns. There were in the temple two tribunes, one for aged men, the other for pregnant women, with these inscriptions: Reverence for old age—Respect and attention to pregnant women.

The first festival of reason was held with pomp on the 20th of Brumaire (the 10th of November.) All the sections, together with the constituted authorities, repaired thither; a young woman representing the Goddess of Reason. She was the wife of Momoro, the printer, one of the friends of Vincent, Ronsin, Chaumette, Hébert, and the like. She was dressed in a white drapery; a mantle of azure blue hung from her shoulders; her flowing hair was covered with the cap of liberty. She was seated upon an antique seat, entwined with ivy, and borne by four citizens. Young girls dressed in white, and crowned with roses, preceded and followed the goddess. Then came the busts of Lepelletier and Marat, musicians, troops, and all the armed sections. Speeches were delivered, and hymns sung in the temple of reason; they then proceeded to the convention; Chaumette spoke in these terms:—

"Legislators! fanaticism has given way to reason. Her bleared eyes could not endure the brilliancy of the light. This day an immense concourse has assembled beneath these fretted vaults, which for the first time have echoed to the voice of truth. There it is that the French have celebrated the only true worship, that of liberty, that of reason. There it is that we have formed wishes for the prosperity of the arms of the republic. There it is that we have abandoned inanimate idols, for reason, for that animated image, the masterpiece of nature." As he uttered these words, Chaumette pointed to the living goddess of reason. The young and beautiful woman descended from her seat, and went up to the president, who gave her the fraternal embrace, amidst universal bravos, and shouts of The republic for ever! Reason for ever! Down with fanaticism! The convention, who had not yet taken any part in these representations, was hurried away, and obliged to follow the procession, which returned to the temple of reason, and there sang a patriotic hymn. An important piece of intelligence, that of the re-taking of Noirmoutiers from Charette, augmented the general joy, and furnished a more substantial cause for this rejoicing, than the mere abolition of fanaticism.

It is impossible to view with any other feeling than that of disgust these scenes, possessing neither reflection or sincerity, exhibited by a nation that had changed its worship, without comprehending either the previous, or the present, form of adoration.

When is the multitude sincere? When is it capable of comprehending the doctrines that are submitted to its belief? What does it generally want? Great meetings, which pander to its desire of being assembled, symbolic spectacles, which incessantly remind it of a power superior to its own; lastly, festivals, in which homage is paid to those who have made the nearest approach to what is good, noble, or great; in short, temples, ceremonies, and saints. There were now temples to Reason, Marat, and Lepelletier. The people were assembled, they adored a mysterious power, they celebrated those two men. All their desires were satisfied, and they gave themselves up to their passion on this occasion, in no other manner than as they always have done.

If, then, we survey the state of France at this period, we shall see that never were more restraints imposed at once on that inert and patient part of the population on which political experiments are usually made. People dared no longer express any opinion. They were afraid to visit their friends, for fear lest they might be compromised with them, and forfeit their liberty, or even their life. A hundred thousand arrests, and some hundreds of condemnations, rendered imprisonment and the scaffold ever present to the minds of twenty-five millions of French people. They had to bear heavy taxes. If, according to an entirely arbitrary classification, they were classified with the wealthy, they lost for that year a portion of their income. Sometimes, at the requisition of a representative, or of some agent or other, they were obliged to surrender their crops, or their most valuable effects in gold and silver. They durst no longer display any luxury, or indulge in noisy pleasures. They were no longer permitted to use metallic money, but obliged to take and give a depreciated paper, with which it was difficult to procure such things as they needed. If they were shopkeepers, they were compelled to sell at a fictitious price; if they were purchasers, to put up with the worst commodities, because the best eluded the maximum and the assignats; sometimes, indeed, they had to do without either, because good and bad commodities were alike withdrawn. They had but one sort of black bread, common to the rich as to the poor, for which they were obliged to contend at the doors of the bakers, by waiting their turn several hours at a time. The names of the weights and measures, the names of the months and days, were changed; there were but three Sundays instead of four; and, lastly, women and aged men found themselves deprived of those religious ceremonies which they had been accustomed to attend all their lives.

Never had power overthrown with greater violence the habits of a people. To threaten every body's life, to decimate every body's fortune, to fix compulsorily the course of exchange, to apply new names to every thing, to abolish the performance of religious worship, this was indisputably the most atrocious of tyrannies; but we must take into consideration the perilous condition of the state, the inevitable crisis of commerce, and the spirit of system inseparable from the spirit of innovation.

CHAPTER XVI.

DANTON'S RETURN—DIVISION IN THE MOUNTAIN, DANTONISTS AND HÉBERTISTS—POLICY OF ROBESPIERRE AND THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC WELFARE—DANTON ACCUSED BY THE JACQINS, JUSTIFIES HIMSELF; HE IS DEFENDED BY ROBESPIERRE.—ABOLITION OF THE WORSHIP OF REASON—RECENT IMPROVEMENTS IN THE REVOLUTIONARY DICTATORIAL GOVERNMENT—ENERGY OF THE COMMITTEE AS EXERTED AGAINST ALL THE PARTIES—ARREST OF HONJIN, VINCENT, OF THE FOUR DEPUTIES WHO UTTERED THE FORGED DECREE, AND OF THE PRESUMED AGENTS OF FOREIGN POWERS.

EVER since the fall of the Girondists, the Mountain party, left alone and victorious, had begun to be disunited. The daily increasing excesses of the revolution tended to complete this division, and an absolute rupture was near at hand. Many deputies had been moved by the fate of the Girondists, of Bailly, of Brunet, and of Houchard. Others censured the violence committed in regard to religion, and considered them as in the highest degree impolitic and dangerous. They said that new superstitions would start up in the place of those which people were anxious to annihilate; that the pretended worship of reason was nothing else than atheism; that atheism could never be suitable for any nation; and that these extravagances were the consequence of foreign pay. On the contrary, that party which held sway at the Cordeliers and at the commune, which had Hébert for its writer, Ronsin and Vincent for its leaders, Chaumette and Clotz for its apostles, insisted that its adversaries meant to resuscitate a moderatist faction, and to bring round a fresh division in the republic.

Danton had returned from his absence. He did not utter his sentiments, but the leader of a party would in vain attempt to conceal them. They pass from man to man, and are soon made known to the public. It was well known that he would fain have prevented the execution of the Girondins, and that their tragic end had visibly affected him. It was well known that though a partisan and an inventor of revolutionary measures, he began to condemn their blind and ferocious application; in his opinion there was no necessity for continuing violent measures a moment after the danger that had suggested them was over, and that at the close of the present campaign, and the entire expulsion of the enemy, he desired that a spirit of mild and equitable legislation should prevail. No one in the tribunes of the clubs had yet ventured to attack him. Hébert dared not insult him in his paper of Père Duchêne, but the most insidious rumours were orally circulated; insinuations were thrown out against his integrity; allusion was made, and that in the most perfidious manner, to the disturbances in Belgium, which in some measure were imputed to his connivance; indeed they had even gone so far as to assert, that during his seclusion at Arcis-sur-Aube, he had emigrated and carried his wealth along with him. With him were associated, as no better than himself, his friend Camille-Desmoulins, who with him had felt sympathy for the Girondists, and had defended Dillon as well as Philippeaux, who had just returned from La Vendée, enraged against the disorganizers, and quite ready to denounce Ronsin and Rossignol. In his party were likewise classed all those who had in any way displeased the fervid revolutionists, and their number began to be very considerable.

Julien of Toulouse, who had already incurred suspicion on account of his connexion with d'Espagnac and the contractors, had completely committed himself by a report on the federalist administrations, in which he strove to palliate the improprieties committed by the greater part of them. No sooner was this report delivered, than the indignant Cordeliers and Jacobins, thoroughly roused, obliged him to withdraw it. They made inquiries concerning his private life; they discovered that he had consorted with stock-jobbers, that his mistress was a ci-devant countess; and they declared him to be both a dissolute character and a moderatist. Fabre d'Églantine had recently exhibited a great alteration in his circumstances, and lived in an expensive style, perfectly inconsistent with former appearances. Chabot, the capuchin Chabot, who, on espousing the cause of the revolution, had nothing but his ecclesiastical pension, had also lately begun to display expensive furniture, and married the young sister of the two Freys, with a marriage portion of two hundred thousand livres. This sudden change of fortune excited suspicions against these recently enriched deputies, and it was not long before a proposition which they made to the convention completed their ruin. Osselin, a deputy, had just been arrested, for having, as 'twas said, concealed a female emigrant. Fabre, Chabot, Julien, and Delaunay, who were not easy on their own account, as well as Bazire and Thuriot, who had nothing wherewith to reproach themselves, but who perceived with alarm that even members of the convention were not spared, proposed a decree, purporting that no deputy could be arrested till he had been first heard at the bar. This decree was adopted; but all the clubs and the Jacobins rose up against it, and alleged that it was an attempt to renew the inviolability. They caused a report to be made upon it, and commenced the strictest inquiry concerning those who had proposed it, their conduct, and the origin of their sudden wealth. Julien, Fabre, Chabot, Delaunay, Bazire, and Thuriot, stripped of their popularity in a few days, were classed among the party of equivocal and moderate men. Hébert loaded them with the grossest abuse in his paper, and thus handed them over to the mob.

Four or five other persons shared the same fate, though hitherto considered excellent patriots. These were Prolli, Percyra, Gusman, Dubuisson, and Desfieux. Natives, almost all of them, of foreign countries, they had come hither, like the two Freys, as well as Clotz, and identified themselves with the French revolution out of sheer enthusiasm, and probably, also, from a desire to make their fortune. Nobody cared who or what they were, so long as they appeared to be strongly attached to the revolution. Prolli, who was a native of Brussels, had been sent with Percyra and Desfieux to Dumouriez, to discover his intentions. They drew from him an explanation of them, and then went, as we have related, and denounced him to the convention and to the Jacobins. So far all was right; but they had also been employed by Lebrun, because, being foreigners and well-informed men, they were capable of being made serviceable in respect of foreign affairs. In their intercourse with Lebrun, they had learned to esteem him, and latterly they had defended him. Prolli had been well acquainted with Dumouriez, and notwithstanding the defection of that general, he had persisted in extolling his talents, and asserting that he might yet have been preserved for the republic. Lastly, almost all of them, possessing a better knowledge of the neighbouring countries, had censured the application of the Jacobinical system to Belgium, and to the provinces united with France. Their expressions were treasured up; and when a general distrust led to the notion of the secret interference of a foreign faction, people began to suspect them, and reflected upon the tenor of their previous language. It was known that Prolli was a natural son of Kaunitz; he was supposed to be the principal conspirator, and they were all metamorphosed into spies of Pitt and Cobourg. The public rage soon knew no bounds, and the very exaggeration of their patriotism, which they thought was the best mode of disarming suspicion, only served to render them still more obnoxious to suspicion. They were confounded with the party of the equivocal men and the moderates. Thus, whenever Danton or his friends had any remark to make on the faults of the ministerial agents, or on the violence offered to religion, the party of Hébert, Vincent, and Ronsin replied by crying out against moderation, corruption, and the foreign faction.

As usual, the moderates flung back this accusation on their adversaries, saying, "It is you who are the accomplices of these foreigners; your connexion with them is proved as well by the common violence of your language, as by the determination to overturn every thing, and to carry matters to extremities. Look," added they, "at that commune which arrogates to itself a legislative authority, and passes laws under the modest title of resolutions (arrêts); which regulates every thing—the police, the markets, and public worship; which at its own good pleasure substitutes one religion for another, supersedes ancient superstitions, and introduces new, preaches up atheism, and causes its example to be followed by all the municipalities of the republic. Look at those offices of the war department whence issue a multitude of agents, who spread themselves over the provinces, to vie with the representatives in practising the greatest oppressions, and to decry the revolution by their conduct; look at that commune, at those offices—what is it they want but to usurp the legislative and executive authority, to dispossess the convention and the committees, and to dissolve the government? Who can possibly be goading them on, except it be the foreign enemy?"

Amidst these agitations and these quarrels, the supreme authority was necessarily compelled to take a very active part. Robespierre thought, with the whole committee, that these counter accusations were extremely dangerous. His policy, as we have already seen, had consisted, ever since the 31st of May, in preventing a new revolutionary outbreak, in rallying opinion around the convention, and the convention around the committee, so as to create an energetic power, and to effect this he had made use of the Jacobins, who were then all powerful in public estimation. These new charges against accredited patriots, such as Danton and Camille Desmoulins, appeared to him very dangerous. He was afraid that no reputation would be able to stand against the unrestrained popular feeling; he was apprehensive lest the violence offered to religion might alienate part of France, and cause the revolution to be regarded as atheistical; lastly, he fancied that he beheld the hand of the foreign enemy in this vast confusion. It was not long before Hébert afforded him an opportunity, of which he readily availed himself, to explain his sentiments on this head to the Jacobins.

The intentions of Robespierre had got abroad. It was secretly rumoured that he was going to make one of his furious attacks upon Pache, Hébert, Chaumette, and Clotz, the originators of the movement against religion. Proudhon, Desfieux, and Pereyra, already compromised and threatened, resolved to identify their cause with that of Pache, Chaumette, and Hébert. They went to these latter and told them that there was a conspiracy against the best patriots; that they were all equally in danger, that they ought to support and reciprocally defend each other. Hébert then went to the Jacobins on the 1st of Brumaire (November 21, 1793), and complained of a plan of disunion tending to divide the patriots. "Wherever I go," said he, "I meet with people who congratulate me on not having been yet arrested. It is reported that Robespierre intends to denounce myself, Chaumette, and Pache—As for myself, who put myself forward every day for the interest of the country, and speak freely on every subject that occurs to my mind, the rumour may have some foundation; but as to Pache—I know the high esteem which Robespierre entertains for him, and I utterly reject such a notion. It has been said, too, that Danton has emigrated—that he has gone to Switzerland laden with the spoils of the people.—I met him this morning in the Tuileries, and since he is in Paris, he ought to come and explain himself fraternally at the Jacobins. It is a duty which all the patriots owe to themselves to contradict the injurious reports which are circulated respecting them." Hébert then stated that some portion of these reports came from Dubuisson, who wished to impart to him the information he had received, of a conspiracy against the patriots; and according to the usual custom of throwing all the blame upon the vanquished, he added, that the cause of the troubles was to be traced to those accomplices of Brissot who were still alive, and to the Bourbons who still remained in the temple. Robespierre immediately mounted the tribune—"Is it true," said he, "that our most dangerous enemies are the impure remnants of the race of our tyrants? I vote from my heart that the race of tyrants disappear from the face of the earth; but can I shut my eyes to the state of my country so completely as to believe that this event would suffice to extinguish the secret flame of those conspiracies which are rending us? whom shall we persuade by any thing we can say, that the punishment of the despicable sister of Capet would awe our enemies, more than that of Capet himself and of his guilty partner?"

"Is it true that another cause of our calamities is fanaticism? Fanaticism! it is expiring; nay, I may say, it is already dead. In directing, for some days past, all our energy against it, are not we diverting our attention from the real dangers which infest us? You are afraid of the priests, and they are eagerly abdicating their titles, and exchanging them for those of municipals, of administrators, and even of presidents of popular societies. Not long ago they were strongly attached to their ministry, when it produced them an income of seventy thousand livres; they cast it off when it yielded them no more than six thousand.—Yes; fear not their fanaticism, but rather their ambition; not the dress which they did wear, but the new skin in which they now appear. Fear not the old superstition, but the new and false superstition, which men simulate in order to effect our destruction!"

Grappling at once the question of religious obscurances, Robespierre thus proceeded. "Let citizens, animated by a pure zeal, deposit upon the altar of the country the useless and pompous monuments of superstition, so as to render them available for the triumphs of liberty; the country and reason graciously smile upon these offerings; but what right have aristocracy and hypocrisy to mingle their influence with that of civism? What right have men, hitherto unknown in the career of the revolution, to seek amidst all these events the means of usurping a false popularity, of inveigling the very patriots into false measures, and of throwing disturbance and discord among us? What right have they to violate the liberty of religion in the name of liberty, and to attack fanaticism with a new fanaticism? What right have they to make the solemn homage paid to pure truth, degenerate into wearisome and ridiculous farces?

"It has been supposed, that in accepting the civic offerings, the convention has proscribed the Catholic worship. No, the convention has taken no such step, and never will take it. Its intention is to uphold that universal toleration of all religions which it has proclaimed, and to repress at the same time all those who shall abuse it, and thus disturb the public peace. The convention will not allow the peaceful ministers of the different religions to be persecuted, and she will punish them severely, whenever they shall dare to avail themselves of their functions to mislead the citizens, and to arm either prejudice or royalism against the republic.

"There are men who would fain go further; who, upon pretext of destroying superstition, would rather make or carve a species of religion out of atheism itself. Every philosopher, every individual, is at liberty to adopt on that subject what opinion he pleases; whoever would make a crime of this is a madman, but the public man and the legislator would be a hundred times more insane who should adopt such a system. The national convention abhors it. The convention is not a maker of books and of systems; it is a political and popular body. Atheism is aristocratic. The idea of a great Being, who watches over oppressed innocence, and who punishes triumphant guilt, is perfectly in accordance with popular notions. The people and the unfortunate applaud me. If I meet with censures, it will be amongst the rich and amongst the guilty. I have been, ever since I left college, a very indifferent Catholic; but I have never been a cold friend, or an unfaithful defender of humanity. I am on that account only the more attached to the moral and political ideas which I have just been demonstrating to you. If a God did not exist, it would behoove man to invent one."

Robespierre, after making this confession of faith, imputed to the foreign foe the persecutions exercised against religion, and the calumnies circulated against the best patriots. Robespierre, who was extremely distrustful, and who had supposed the Girondists to be royalists, was a firm believer in a foreign faction, which, as we have observed, had no other representatives than a few spies sent to the armies, and some few bankers, who were the agents of stock-jobbers, and correspondents of the emigrants. "The foreigners," said he, "have two sorts of armies: the one on our frontiers is powerless and nearly ruined; the other, the more dangerous of the two, is in the midst of us. It is an army of spies, of hiring knaves, who introduce themselves every where, even into the bosom of the popular societies. It is this faction which has persuaded Hébert that I meant to cause Pache, Chaumette, Hébert, nay, the whole commune, to be arrested. Could I persecute Pache, whose simple and retiring worth I have always admired and defended!—I, who have fought for him against a Brissot and his accomplices!" Robespierre lauded Pache, but took no notice whatever of Hébert. He contented himself by saying, that he had not forgotten the services of the commune in the days when liberty was in danger. Then, launching out against what he called the foreign faction, he hurled the bolts of the Jacobins at Prouli, Dubuisson, Pereyra, and Desfieux. He related their history; he depicted them as the agents of Lebrun and of the foreign powers, employed to embitter animosities, to divide the patriots, and to inflame them against one another. From the manner in which he expressed himself, it was obvious that the hatred which he felt for the old friends of Lebrun, had no small share in causing his distrust. At length he caused all four of them to be expelled from the society, amidst the roar of the most tumultuous applause, and he proposed that a purifying scrutiny of all the Jacobins should immediately take place.

Thus Robespierre had hinted an anathema at the new worship, given a severe lesson to all the firebrands, said nothing very consolatory to Hébert, not committed himself so far as to praise that disgusting writer, and directed the whole fury of the storm upon those foreigners, who had the misfortune to be friends of Lebrun, to admire Dumouriez, and to censure our political system in the conquered countries. Lastly, he had arrogated to himself the remodelling of the society, by obtaining the adoption of his motion for a purifying scrutiny.

During the succeeding days, Robespierre followed up his system, and read letters to the Jacobins, some anonymous, others intercepted, tending to prove that the foreign enemy, if he did not produce, at least rejoiced at, the extravagances in regard to religion, and the calumnies cast upon the best patriots. Danton had received from Hébert a sort of challenge to explain himself. He would not do so at first, lest it should appear as though he were obeying a summons; but fifteen days afterwards, he seized a favourable occasion for addressing the assembly. A proposition had been brought forward, that all the popular societies should be furnished with a place for meeting at the expense of the state. On this subject he offered various observations, and then took the opportunity of saying that, even assuming that the constitution ought to be passive, while the people were levelling their blows and terrifying their enemies by means of their revolutionary operations, it was nevertheless right to have an eye to those who wanted to urge that same people beyond the prescribed bounds of the revolution. Coupé, of the Oise, replied to Danton, and, while he addressed himself against his ideas, gave them a false construction. Danton immediately re-ascended the tribune, and experienced some tokens of dissatisfaction. He then challenged those who had any thing to allege against him, to bring forward their charges against him in a distinct form, so that he might reply to them publicly. He complained of the disapprobation which was expressed in his presence. "Have I then lost," he exclaimed, "those features which characterize the face of a free man?" As he uttered these words, he shook that head which had been so often seen, so often encountered, amid the storms of the revolution, and which had always encouraged the audacity of the republicans, and struck terror into the aristocrats. "Am I no longer," he continued, "the same man who was at your side in every critical moment? Am I no longer that man so persecuted, so well known to you, that man whom you have so often embraced as your friend, and with whom you have sworn to die in our mutual dangers?" He then reminded the assembly that he was the defender of Marat, and was thus obliged to cover himself as it were with the shade of that being whom he had formerly protected and disdained. "You will be surprised," said he, "when I shall make you acquainted with my private conduct, to see that the colossal fortune which my enemies and yours have attributed to me, is dwindled down to the very small portion of property which I have always possessed. I defy the malignants to furnish any proof against me. Their utmost efforts will not be able to shake me. I will take my stand in face of the people. You shall judge me in their presence. I will no more obliterate the page of my history, than you will obliterate yours." In conclusion, Danton demanded a commission to investigate the accusations preferred against him. Robespierre then rushed with the greatest eagerness to the tribune. "Danton," he exclaimed, "demands of you a commission to investigate his conduct. I consent to it, if he thinks that this measure will prove serviceable to him. He wishes the crimes with which he is charged to be specified. Well, I will specify them: Danton, thou art accused of having emigrated. It has been said that thou hast gone to Switzerland; that thy indisposition was feigned, to disguise thy flight from the people: it has been said that it was thy ambition to be regent under Louis XVII; that every thing was prepared for proclaiming, at a fixed time, this seion of the Capets; that thou wert at the head of the conspiracy; that neither Pitt, or Cobourg, or England, or Austria, or Prussia, were our real enemy, but thyself alone; that the Mountain was composed of thy accomplices; that there existed no necessity for bestowing a thought upon agents sent by the foreign powers; that their conspiracies were old wives' tales, worthy only of contempt; in short, that it was thou who oughtest to be put to death,—thou alone!" Universal applause drowned the voice of Robespierre. He resumed: "Knowest thou not, Danton, that the more courage and patriotism a man possesses, the more intent are the enemies of the public weal upon his destruction? Knowest thou not, and know not all of you, ye citizens, that this method is infallible? Ah! if the defender of liberty were not slandered, this alone would be a proof that we had no more nobles or priests to encounter." Then alluding to Hébert's newspaper, in which he, Robespierre, was highly praised, he added, "The enemies of the country seem to overwhelm me exclusively with praises. But I repudiate them. Is it to be supposed that in those very praises which are repeated in certain papers, I do not perceive the weapon with which they would slay massacre the country? The cause of the patriots is like that of the tyrants. They are all bound for one another, body for body. I may, perhaps, be mistaken respecting Danton, but, considered in his domestic relations, he deserves nothing but praise. In his political relations I have watched him; a difference of opinion led me to study him with attention, frequently with anger; he was reluctant, I must admit, to suspect Dumouriez; he did not hate Brissot and his accomplices quite enough; but if he was not always of the same sentiments as myself, am I thence to conclude that he would have betrayed the country? No, I always saw him serve it with zeal. Danton wishes to be tried. He is right. Let me be tried too! Let them produce men more patriotic than both of us are. I would wager that they are nobles, privileged persons,—priests. You will there find a marquis, and you will have the exact measure of the patriotism of the gentry who accuse us."

Robespierre then called upon all those who had any thing to allege against Danton to come forward and state it; but no one ventured to do so. Momoro, himself a friend of Hébert's, was the first to remark that as no person came forward, this was a proof that there was nothing to be alleged against Danton. A member then proposed that the president should give him the fraternal embrace. It was agreed to, and Danton, stepping up to the bureau, received the embrace amidst universal applause.

The conduct of Robespierre on this occasion was generous and well managed. That danger, common to all the old patriots, that ingratitude with which Danton's services were then about to be repaid, and lastly, a decided superiority, had made Robespierre depart from his habitual egotism; and on this occasion, actuated by laudable motives, he was more eloquent than ordinary. But the service which he rendered Danton was of greater utility to the cause of the government, and of the old patriots who composed it, than to Danton himself, whose popularity was gone. Extinct enthusiasm cannot be rekindled; and there was no room to afford the presumption that the public would be again exposed to dangers imminent enough to afford Danton, by his courage, the opportunity of retrieving his influence.

Robespierre, prosecuting his work, did not fail to attend every sitting while the purifying process was in progress. Clootz's turn came: he was accused of being connected with the foreign banker, Vandeniver. He attempted to justify himself, but Robespierre addressed the society. He reminded them of Clootz's connexion with the Girondists, his rupture with them, owing to a pamphlet entitled "Neither Roland nor Marat," ("Ni Roland ni Marat,") a pamphlet in which he attacked the Mountain as strongly as the Gironde; his extravagant exaggerations, his perseverance in talking of a universal republic, his exciting a rage for conquests, and thus compromising France with all Europe. "And how," continued Robespierre, "could M. Clootz interest himself in the welfare of France, when he took so deep an interest in the welfare of Persia and Monomatapa. There is a recent crisis, indeed, of which he may boast. I allude to the movement against the established worship—a movement which, conducted rationally and deliberately, might have produced excellent effects, but the violence of which was liable to do the greatest mischief.—M. Clootz had a conference one night with Bishop Gobel. Gobel passed his word for the next day, and suddenly changing language and dress, he came to resign his letters of ordination——. M. Clootz imagined that we should be the dupes of these masquerades. No, no; the Jacobins will never regard as a friend of the people this pretended sans-culotte, who is a Prussian and a baron, who possesses an income of one hundred thousand livres, who dines with conspirator bankers, and who is not the orator of the French people, but of the human race."

Clootz was immediately excluded from the society; and on the motion of Robespierre, it was decided that all nobles, priests, bankers, and foreigners, without distinction, should be excluded.

At the next sitting, it came to the turn of Camille-Desmoulins. His letter to Dillon, expressing a sympathy for the Girondists, was laid to his charge. "I thought Dillon a brave and a clever man," said Camille, "and I defended him. As for the Girondists, I was peculiarly situated in regard to them. I have always loved and served the republic, but I have frequently been wrong in my notions of those who served it. That I have adored Mirabeau, I loved Barnave, and the Lameths, I admit; but I sacrificed my friendship and my admiration for them so soon as I knew that they had ceased to be Jacobins. A most extraordinary fatality has decreed that, out of sixty revolutionists who signed my marriage-contract, only two friends, Danton and Robespierre, are now left to me. All the others have emigrated or been guillotined. Of this number were seven of the twenty-two. An emotion of sympathy was therefore very pardonable on this occasion. I have certainly sinned," added Desmoulins, "that they died as republicans, but my meaning was as federalist republicans; for I assure you that I do not believe there was any royalist among them."

Camille Desmoulins was beloved for his easy disposition and his natural and original turn of mind. "Camille has made a bad choice of his friends," said a Jacobin; "let us prove to him that we know better how to choose ours by receiving him with open arms." Robespierre, ever the protector of his old colleagues, but assuming at the same time a tone of superiority, defended Camille Desmoulins. "He is weak," said he, "and confiding, but he has always been a republican. He loved Mirabeau, Lameth, and Dillon, but he has broken his idols as soon as he was undeceived. Let him pursue his career, and be more cautious in future." After this exhortation, Camille was admitted amidst applause. Danton was then admitted without any observation, as well as Fabre d'Eglantine in his turn, but he had to submit to some questions concerning his fortune, which he was allowed to attribute to his literary talents. This purification was continued, and occupied a long time. It was begun in November, 1793, and lasted several months.

The policy of Robespierre and the government was well known. The energy with which this policy had been demonstrated intimidated the firebrands and restless promoters of the new worship, and they began to think of retracting, and of retracing their steps. Chaumette, who had the eloquence of a club or a commune orator, but who had neither ambition nor courage enough to qualify him for a party leader, did not by any means pretend to put himself in competition with the convention, and to set himself up as the inventor of a new worship. He was eager, therefore, to seize the opportunity for making amends for his error. He resolved to obtain an interpretation of the resolution which shut up all the places of worship, and proposed to the commune to declare that it had no intention to interfere with religious toleration, and by no means prohibited the professors to meet in places paid for by them, and maintained at their own expense. "Let it not be supposed," said he, "that I am actuated by weakness or selfish policy. I am equally incapable of the one or the other. It is the conviction that our enemies would fain abuse our zeal, by urging us beyond its proper limits, and by engaging us in erroneous measures; the conviction exists, that if we prevent the Catholics from exercising their worship in public, and with the sanction of the law, a set of atrabillous wretches will go and induce them to entertain extravagant notions, or cause them to conspire in cellars. It is this conviction alone that presses upon me, and induces me to speak." The resolution, proposed by Chaumette, and strongly seconded by the mayor Pache, was at length adopted with some murmurs soon drowned in the general applause. On her part, the convention declared that she had never intended by her decrees to fetter religious toleration, and it forbade the plate still remaining in the churches to be touched, since the treasury had no further need of that kind of aid. From that day the indecent farces performed by the people were no longer repeated in Paris, and the ceremonies of the worship of reason, which had caused so much diversion, were abolished.

Amidst this great confusion, the committee of public welfare felt more keenly every day the necessity of rendering the supreme authority more vigorous, more prompt, and more readily obeyed. Every day the experience he derived from various impediments rendered it more expert, and it was constantly making fresh accessions to that revolutionary machine created for the duration of the war. It had already prevented the transfer of power to new and inexperienced hands, by protracting the convention, and by declaring the government revolutionary till the peace. At the same time, it had concentrated this power in itself by making the revolutionary tribunal, the police, the military operations, and the very distribution of the articles of consumption, subordinate to itself. Two months' experience had made it acquainted with the obstacles by which the local authorities, either from excessive or defective zeal, clogged the action of the superior authority. The transmission of the decrees was frequently interrupted or delayed, and their promulgation neglected in certain departments. There still remained many of those federalist administrations, which had risen in rebellion, and the power of coalescing had not yet been forbidden them. If, on the one hand, the departmental administrations exhibited some tendency to federalism, the communes, on the other, acting in a contrary spirit, exercised, after the example of that of Paris, an oppressive authority, issued laws, and imposed taxes; the revolutionary committees displayed towards individuals an arbitrary and inquisitorial power, revolutionary armies, stationed in different localities, fortified these local, tyrannical, petty governments, divided among themselves, and embarrassing the superior government. Lastly, the authority of the representatives, added to all the others, increased the confusion of the sovereign powers; for they imposed taxes, and issued penal laws, in precisely the same manner as the communes, or even the convention itself.

Billard-Varennes, in a carelessly written but yet able report, detailed these inconveniences, and caused the decree of the 14th of Frimaire, (year II., Dec. 4.) to be a model for a provisional, energetic, and absolute government. Anarchy, said the reporter, threatens republics at their birth and in their old age. Let us endeavour to secure ourselves against it. This decree instituted the Bulletin des Lois, an admirable and new invention, the idea of which had never been made public; for the laws, sent by the assembly to the ministers, and by the ministers to the local authorities, without the date when they were to take effect, and without minutes to guaranty their transmission or their arrival, were frequently issued a long time before they were either promulgated or known. According to the new decree, a commission, a printing-office, and a particular kind of paper, were exclusively devoted to the printing and publication of the laws. The commission, composed of four persons, independent of all authority, and discharged of all other labours, received the law, caused it to be printed, and sent it by post within fixed and invariable terms. The transmission and the delivery were ascertained by the ordinary means of the post; and these movements, thus reduced to a regular system, became infallible. The convention was afterwards declared to be the central point, from whence the government received its impulsive motion (centre d'impulsion du gouvernement): under these words was impliedly included the sovereignty of the committees, which did every thing for the convention. The departmental authorities were in some measure abolished; they were deprived of all their political functions, and the only duties left for their performance, as in the case of the department of Paris, on the event of the 10th of August, were the assessment of taxes, the maintenance of the roads, and the superintendence of purely local interests. Thus these intermediate and too powerful agents between the people and the supreme authority were suppressed. None but the district and communal administrations were suffered to exist with all their privileges. Every local administration was forbidden to consolidate itself with others; to transfer itself to a new place; to send out agents; to issue ordinances extending or limiting the effect of decrees, or to levy taxes on men. All the revolutionary armies established in the departments were disbanded, and there was to be left only the single revolutionary army established at Paris for the service of the whole republic. The revolutionary committees were obliged to correspond with the districts charged to watch them, as well as with the committee of general safety. Those of Paris were allowed to correspond only with the committee of general safety, and not with the commune. Representatives were forbidden to levy taxes unless they were specially authorized by the convention; they were also forbidden to issue penal regulations.

Thus all the authorities were brought back to their proper sphere, and conflict or coalition between them was rendered impracticable. They received the laws by an unerring process. They could neither modify them or defer their execution. The two committees still retained their command. The committee of public welfare, besides its supremacy over the committee of general safety, continued to retain the diplomatic and the war department, and the universal superintendence of all affairs. This committee from henceforward was the only committee allowed to retain that style, for no committee in the communes could assume that title.

This new decree concerning the institution of the revolutionary government, although restrictive of the authority of the communes, and even directed against their abuse of power, was received in the commune of Paris with great demonstrations of obedience. Chaumette, who affected docility as well as patriotism, made a long speech in praise of the decree. By his awkward haste to enter into the system of the supreme authority, he even incurred a reprimand; and found that he possessed the faculty of being disobedient by striving to be more obedient than necessary. The decree placed the revolutionary committees of Paris in direct and exclusive communication with the committee of general safety. In their fiery zeal they had allowed arrests of every description to be made; they were accused of having imprisoned a host of patriots, and were also said to be filled with that class of persons now beginning to be termed ultra-revolutionists. Chaumette complained to the council general of their conduct, and proposed to summon them before the commune to receive a severe admonition. Chaumette's motion was carried, but this man with his ostentatious obedience had forgotten that according to the new decree the revolutionary committees of Paris were to correspond with the committee of general safety, and with no other. The committee of public welfare, who made no distinction between an exaggerated obedience and practical disobedience, and, above all, in no disposition to permit the commune to presume to give lessons, even were they good, to committees placed under the superior authority, caused Chaumette's resolution to be quashed, and prohibited the committees from meeting at the commune. Chaumette received this rebuke with perfect humility. "Every man," said he to the commune, "is liable to error. I candidly confess that I was wrong. The convention has annulled my requisition and the resolution adopted on my motion; it has done justice upon the fault which I committed; she is our general mother; let us unite ourselves with her."

It was only by demonstrating such energy as this, that the committee was likely to succeed in putting a stop to all the disorderly movements either of zeal or opposition, and to produce the greatest possible precision in the action of the government. The ultra-revolutionists, compromised and repressed since the movement against religion, received another check, more severe than any of those that preceded it. Ronsin had returned from Lyons, whither he had accompanied Collot-d'Herbois, with a detachment of the revolutionary army. He had arrived in Paris at the moment when the report of the sanguinary executions committed in Lyons had excited sympathy. Ronsin had caused a bill to be placarded at which the convention were highly indignant. He therein stated, that out of the one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants of Lyons, fifteen hundred only were not implicated in the rebellion; that before the end of Frimaire, all the guilty would have perished, and that their bodies would have rolled down the Rhone to Toulon. Other atrocious expressions of his were mentioned; there were also great complaints of the despotism of Vincent in the war offices, and of the conduct of his ministerial agents in the provinces, and their putting themselves in competition with the representatives. Various expressions which escaped some of them, and serving to indicate a design to cause the executive power to be constitutionally organized, were repeated. The energy which Robespierre and the committee had recently displayed, was an encouragement for them to set their faces against these agitators. In the sitting of the 27th of Frimaire (17th December) they began by making complaints against certain revolutionary committees. Lecointre denounced the arrest of a courier of the committee of public welfare by one of the ministerial agents. Boursault said, that in passing through Longjumeau, he had been stopped by the commune; that he had informed them that he was a deputy, but that the commune nevertheless insisted that his passport should be confirmed by the agent of the executive council then on the spot. Fabre d'Eglantine denounced Maillard, the leader of the murderers of September, who had been sent to Bordeaux by the executive council, and who was charged with a mission, when in fact he ought to have been scouted from society; he denounced Ronsin and his placard, which had caused an universal shudder; lastly, he denounced Vincent, who had centered in his own person all the authorities of the war-offices, and declared that he would blow the convention into the air, or else compel it to organize the executive power, as he was determined not to be the valet of the committees. The convention immediately arrested Vincent, secretary-general at war, Ronsin, general of the revolutionary army, Maillard, on commission at Bordeaux, three agents of the executive power, who had made themselves notorious by their oppressive behaviour at Saint-Girons, and lastly, one Mazuel, an adjutant in the revolutionary army, who had said that the convention was concocting a conspiracy, and that he would spit in the faces of the deputies. The convention then decreed the penalty of death against those officers of the revolutionary armies who, being members of illegal associations in the provinces, should not instantly dissolve; and lastly, the convention ordered that the executive council should come the following day and explain its conduct.

This act of energy caused severe mortification at the Cordeliers, and provoked explanations at the Jacobins. The latter had not yet declared themselves in regard to Vincent and Ronsin, but they required that an inquiry should be made to ascertain the nature of the charges against them. The executive council justified itself with all humility to the convention. It declared that it never intended to compete with the national representation, and that the arrest of the courier, and the difficulties experienced by Boursault, the deputy, were occasioned solely by an order of the committee of public welfare itself, an order which directed all passports and all despatches to be verified. Immediately after Vincent and Ronsin had been committed to prison as ultra-revolutionists, the committee at the same time pursued severe measures against the equivocals (équivoques) and the stock-jobbers. It arrested Prolli, Dubuisson, Desfieux, and Percyra, who were accused of being agents of the foreign powers, and accomplices of all the parties. Lastly, it caused the arrest at midnight of the four deputies, Bazire, Chabot, Delaunay of Angers, and Julien of Toulouse, who were accused of being moderatists, and of having made rapid fortunes.

We have already related the narrative of the joint fraud of these representatives, and of the forgery which it had induced them to commit. We have seen that Chabot, whose self-possession was lost, was in the mood to denounce his colleagues, and to throw the whole blame upon them. The reports circulated respecting his marriage, and the denunciation which Hébert was daily repeating, completely intimidated him, and he hastened to reveal the whole affair to Robespierre. He pretended that he had entered into the plot with no other intention than that of participating in it and then informing against it; he imputed this plot to the agency of foreign powers, which, he said, strove to corrupt the deputies in order to bring the national representation into contempt, and that the foreign powers were then employing Hébert and his accomplices to publish their infamy after they had been so corrupted by them. Thus there were, according to him, two distinct parts of the conspiracy, the corruptionary part and the defamatory part, both of which had the same object in view, and this was to scandalize and to cause the dissolution of the convention. The participation of the foreign bankers in this intrigue, the designs of Julien and Delaunay, as evidenced by their language, for they said that the convention would soon come to an end by devouring its own members, and that it was right to make a fortune as speedily as possible, and some intercourse between Hébert's wife and the mistresses of Julien and Delaunay, furnished Chabot with materials to prop up the tale of this double conspiracy, in which the corrupters and scandalizers were secretly leagued for the attainment of the same object. Chabot had, however, some scruples left, and justified Bazire. As he himself had corrupted Fabre, and should have incurred a denunciation from the latter had he accused him, he pretended that his overtures had been rejected, and that the hundred thousand francs in assignats, hung up in the waterclosets, were the hundred thousand francs intended for Fabre and refused by him. These tales of Chabot had no semblance of truth; for it would have been much more natural, if he had really entered into the conspiracy for the purpose of divulging it, for him to have divulged it to some of the members of one or the other committee, and to have deposited the money in their hands. Robespierre sent Chabot to the committee of general welfare, who gave orders in the night for the arrest of the deputies already mentioned. Julien contrived to escape. Bazire, Delaunay, and Chabot only were apprehended.*

The discovery of this disgraceful conspiracy caused a great sensation, and confirmed all the calumnies which the parties levelled at each other. Greater credit than ever now attached to the report of the existence of a foreign faction that had for its object the corrupting the patriots, by exciting them to obstruct the march of the revolution: some by an unseasonable moderation, others by an intemperate exaggeration, by incessant scandals, and by an odious profession of atheism. And yet, what reality was there in all these suppositions? On the one hand, there were men less fanatic, more inclined to pity the vanquished, and for that very reason more ready to yield to the allurements of pleasure and corruption; on the other hand, there were men more violent and more blind, calling the dregs of the people to their assistance, persecuting with their reproaches those who did not share in their fanatical insensibility, and profaning the ancient rites of religion without consideration or decency. Between these two parties there were bankers taking advantage of every crisis to carry on their stock-jobbing speculations; four deputies out of seven hundred and fifty yielding to the influence of corruption, and becoming the accomplices of this jobbing; lastly, a few sincere revolutionists, but foreigners, and suspected on that ground, compromising themselves by that very exaggeration, under colour of which they hoped to cause their origin to be forgotten. This was the only substantive part of the case that had any existence, and in this we observe nothing but what was very ordinary, indeed nothing that justified the supposition of a deep laid scheme.

The committee of public welfare, anxious to make itself independent of parties, resolved to strike and to brand them all; and to effect this, its point was to show that they were all accomplices of the foreign enemy. Robespierre had already denounced a foreign faction, in the existence of which his mistrustful disposition led him to believe. The turbulent faction, thwarting the supreme authority and scandalizing the revolution, was immediately accused of being the accomplice of the foreign faction, but it made no such charge against the moderate faction; nay, it even defended the latter, as we have seen in the case of Danton. If it still spared it, this was because it had thus far done nothing that could obstruct the progress of the revolution, as it did not form a numerous and obstinate party, like the old Girondists, and because it consisted only of a few individuals who condemned the ultra-revolutionary extravagance.

Such was the state of parties and the policy of the committee of public welfare in regard to them, in Frimaire, year II (December, 1793). During the period that this committee exercised its authority with such vigour, and achieved the labour of completing the interior of the machine of revolutionary power, it displayed equal energy abroad, and ensured the prosperity of the revolution by a series of glorious victories.

CHAPTER XVII.

TERMINATION OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1793—MANŒUVRES OF HOCHÉ IN THE VOSGES—RETREAT OF THE AUSTRIANS AND PRUSSIANS—THE BLOCKADE OF LANDAU RAISED—OPERATIONS OF THE ARMY OF ITALY—SIEGE AND CAPTURE OF TOULON BY THE REPUBLICAN ARMY—THE LAST ENGAGEMENTS AND DEFEATS AT THE PYRENEES—EXCURSION OF THE VENDEANS BEYOND THE LOIRE, AND THEIR UTTER DESTRUCTION AT SAVENAY—GENERAL REVIEW OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1793.

THE campaign of 1793 terminated upon all the frontiers, in the most brilliant and successful manner. In Belgium it had been at length deemed preferable to go into winter quarters, in despite of the plan of the committee of public welfare, who were desirous of pursuing the advantages derived from the victory of Watignies, to enclose the enemy between the Scheldt and the Sambre. Thus, at this point, the aspect of affairs had not changed, and the advantages of Watignies were still retained by us.

On the Rhine, the campaign had been greatly protracted by the loss of the lines of Weissenburg on the 13th of October (22nd of Vendémiaire). The committee of public welfare determined to recover them at any cost, and to raise the blockade of Landau, as it had opened the blockades of Dunkirk and Maubeuge. The state of our departments of the Rhine was an additional reason for losing no time in removing the enemy from that quarter. The Vosges were singularly imbued with the spirit of feudality; the priests and the nobles had there retained a powerful influence; the French language being not much spoken, the new revolutionary ideas had scarcely penetrated thither; in a great number of communes, the decrees of the convention were unknown, many of them were without revolutionary committees, and in every one of them the emigrants went to and fro with impunity. A host of nobles of Alsace had followed the army of Wurmser, and were spread over the country from Weissenburg to the environs of Strasburg. In this latter town a plot had been formed for delivering it up to Wurmser. The committee of public welfare immediately sent Lebas and Saint-Just thither, to exercise the ordinary dictatorship of commissioners of the convention. The committee appointed young Hoche, who had so eminently distinguished himself at the siege of Dunkirk, to the command of the army of the Moselle; it detached a strong division from the unemployed army of the Ardennes, and this detachment was divided between the two armies of the Moselle and the Rhine; lastly, it caused levies en masse to be raised in all the contiguous departments, and appointed them for Besançon. These new levies occupied the fortresses, and the garrisons were transferred to the line. At Strasburg, Saint-Just displayed his utmost energy and intelligence. He struck terror into the malignants; those who were suspected of the design to betray Strasburg, he handed over to a commission, and thus brought them to the scaffold. He imparted a renewed vigour to the generals and soldiers. He insisted on daily attacks along the whole line, in order to exercise our raw conscripts. Equally brave and merciless, he exposed himself to the fire, and shared all the dangers of warfare. An extraordinary enthusiasm seized the army; and the cry of the soldiers, who were inflamed with the hope of recovering the lost ground, was, "Landau or death!"

The most accurate manœuvres to execute on this part of the frontiers would still have consisted in constantly keeping the two armies of the Rhine and of the Moselle together, so as to operate en masse on one of the slopes of the Vosges. For this purpose, it would have been necessary to regain possession of the passes which bisected the line of the mountains, and which we had lost ever since Brunswick advanced to the centre of the Vosges, and Wurmser to the walls of Strasburg. The plan of the committee was formed: its orders were, that we should possess ourselves of the chain itself, with a view to cut off the Austrians from the Prussians. Young Hoche, then in the plenitude of ardour and talent, was commissioned with the execution of this plan, and his first movements at the head of the army of the Moselle induced a hope of the most decided results.

The Prussians, to give security to their position, had attempted to take by surprise the castle of Bitche, situated in the very heart of the Vosges. The attempt was thwarted by the vigilance of the garrison, which appeared in time upon the ramparts; and Brunswick, whether he was disconcerted by this failure, whether he dreaded the activity and energy of Hoche, or whether he was dissatisfied with Wurmser—with whom he was not on good terms—retired first to Bisingen, on the line of the Erbach, and then to Kayerslautern, in the centre of the Vosges. He had not given Wurmser notice of this retrograde movement; and while the latter was engaged upon the eastern slope near the eminence of Strasburg, Brunswick, on the western slope, found himself in the rear of Weissenburg and not far from the height of Landau. Hoche had followed Brunswick very closely in his retrograde movement; and after he had in vain attempted to surround him at Bisingen, and even to reach Kayerslautern before him, he formed the plan of attacking him at Kayerslautern itself in spite of the difficulties of the locality. Hoche had about thirteen thousand men. He fought on the 28th, 29th, and 30th of November, but the country was imperfectly known and scarcely practicable. On the first day general Ambert, who commanded the left, was engaged, while Hoche, with the centre, was seeking his way; the next, Hoche was by himself face to face with the enemy, while Ambert had lost his way in the mountains. Owing to the difficulties of the locality, his own strength, and to his advantageous position, Brunswick was completely successful. He did not lose more than a dozen men. Hoche was obliged to retire with the loss of about three thousand; but he was not discouraged, and proceeded to rally his troops at Pirmasens, Hornbach, and Deux-Ponts. Hoche, though unfortunate, had nevertheless displayed a boldness and a resolution which made a great impression upon the representatives and the army. The committee of public welfare, who, since Carnot had entered into office, were sufficiently intelligent to be just, and who were only severe in cases of lukewarm zeal, wrote him the most encouraging letters, and for the first time bestowed praise upon a defeated general. Hoche, without being for a moment daunted by his defeat, immediately formed the resolution of joining the army of the Rhine, with a view to overwhelm Wurmser. The latter, who had remained in Alsace while Brunswick had retired to Kayerslautern, had his right flank uncovered. Hoche sent general Taponnier with twelve thousand men to Werdt to break through the line of the Vosges, and to throw himself on the flank of Wurmser, while the army of the Rhine should make a general attack upon his front.

Owing to the presence of Saint-Just incessant fighting had taken place at the end of November and the beginning of December between the army of the Rhine and the Austrians. By standing fire every day this army began to be familiarized with war. Pichegru commanded this army. The detachment sent by Hoche into the Vosges had to surmount numerous difficulties before it could get thither, but it at length succeeded and seriously harassed Wurmser's right wing. On the 22nd of December (2 Nivose), Hoche marched his army across the mountains, and appeared at Werdt on the eastern slope. He overwhelmed Wurmser's right, took from him a vast quantity of cannon and a great number of prisoners. The Austrians were then obliged to quit the line of the Motter and to move, first to Sultz, and afterwards, on the 24th, to Weissenburg, on the very lines of the Lauter. Their retreat was effected with disorder and confusion. The emigrants and the Alsatian nobles who had flocked to join Wurmser fled with the utmost precipitation. The roads were covered by whole families seeking to escape. The two armies, Prussian and Austrian, became dissatisfied with one another, and rendered but little assistance to each other against a foe so fervid and enthusiastic.

A junction had been effected between the two armies of the Rhine and the Moselle. The representatives gave the command in chief to Hoche, and he immediately made his preparations for retaking Weissenburg. The Prussians and the Austrians concentrated by their retrograde movement, were better able to support one another. They resolved, therefore, on the 26th of December, (6 Nivose), to take the offensive, the very day on which the French general was preparing to rush upon them. The Prussians were in the Vosges and around Weissenburg. The Austrians were extended in advance of the Lauter, from Weissenburg to the Rhine. Certain it is, that had they not been determined themselves to begin, they would not have received the attack in advance of the lines, and having the Lauter at their back; but they had resolved to be the first to attack; and the French, in advancing upon them, found their advanced guards in march. General Dessaix, who commanded the right of the army of the Rhine, marched to Lauterburg; General Michaud was ordered to Schleithal; the centre attacked the Austrians, drawn up on the Geisberg; and the left penetrated into the Vosges to turn the Prussians. Dessaix carried Lauterburg; Michaud occupied Schleithal; and the centre, driving back the Austrians, made them retire from the Geisberg, even up to Weissenburg itself. The occupation of Weissenburg was likely to prove disastrous to the allies, and it was in imminent danger; but Brunswick, who was at Pigeonnier, hastened to this point, and repressed the motions of the French with great firmness. The retreat of the Austrians was then effected with less disorder; but next day the French occupied the lines of Weissenburg. The Austrians fell back upon Gemersheim, the Prussians upon Bergzabern. The French soldiers incessantly advanced shouting, "Landau or death!" The Austrians hastened to recross the Rhine, without attempting to remain another day on the left bank, and without giving the Prussians time to arrive from Mentz. The blockade of Landau was raised, and the French took up their winter quarters in the Palatinate. Immediately afterwards, the two allied generals attacked one another in contradictory statements, and Brunswick sent in his resignation to Frederic-William. Thus, on this part of the theatre of the war, we had gloriously recovered our frontiers, in spite of the united forces of Prussia and Austria.

The army of Italy had undertaken nothing of importance, and since its defeat in the month of June, it had remained upon the defensive. In the month of September, the Piedmontese seeing Toulon attacked by the English, thought at length of profiting by this circumstance, which might occasion the loss of the French army. The king of Sardinia repaired in person to the theatre of war, and a general attack of the French camp was resolved upon for the 8th of September. The surest way of operating against the French would have been to occupy the line of the Var, which separated Nice from their territory. In so doing, the enemy would have mastered every one of the positions which they had taken beyond the Var, and they would have been compelled to evacuate the comté of Nice, and perhaps even to lay down their arms. They rather preferred an immediate attack of their camp. This attack, executed by single detachments through several valleys at once, was a failure; and the king of Sardinia, dissatisfied with the result, immediately retired to his own dominions. Nearly about the same time, the Austrian general, Devius, at length thought of moving upon the Var; but he executed his movement with no more than three or four thousand men, advanced no further than Isola, and suddenly stopped by a slight check, he again ascended the Upper Alps, without following up this attempt. Such had been the insignificant operations of the army of Italy.

A more serious interest recalled universal attention to Toulon. That place, occupied by the English and the Spanish, seemed to give them a footing in the South, and a point from which an invasion might be attempted. It therefore behoved France to recover Toulon as speedily as possible. The committee had issued the most urgent orders in this respect, but there was an utter deficiency of the appliances for a siege. Carteaux, after reducing Marseilles, had debouched with seven or eight thousand men by the gorges of Ollioules, had made himself master of them after a slight action, and had established himself at the very outlet of these gorges, in sight of Toulon. General Lapoype, detached from the army of Italy with about four thousand men, had placed himself on the opposite side to that on which Carteaux was, towards Solies and Savalette. These two French divisions thus posted, the one on the west, the other on the east, were so far apart that they could scarcely perceive one another, and were unable to afford the slightest assistance to each other. The besieged, with a little more activity, might have attacked them singly, and overwhelmed them one after the other. Luckily for us, they thought of nothing but fortifying the place, and manning it with troops. They landed eight thousand Spaniards, Neapolitans, and Piedmontese, and two English regiments from Gibraltar, and thus raised the force of the garrison to fourteen or fifteen thousand men. They strengthened all the defences, and armed all the forts, especially those on the coast, which protected the road where their squadrons lay at anchor. They were particularly solicitous to render Fort Eguillette, situated at the extremity of that promontory which encloses the inner road, or little road, inaccessible. So difficult was its approach made, that it was called in the army Little Gibraltar. The Marseillais, and all the people of Provence, who had taken refuge in Toulon, laboured themselves at the works, and manifested the greatest zeal. However, this unity of sentiment could not be of long duration in the interior of the town; for the reaction against the Mountain had caused the revival of all sorts of factions. In that place were to be found republicans and royalists of all shades. Even the allies themselves were not upon the very best terms.

The Spaniards were offended at the superiority affected by the English, and harboured a distrust of their intentions. Admiral Hood taking advantage of this disunion, said that since they could not agree, it would be best for the time being not to proclaim any supreme authority. He even prevented the departure of a deputation which the inhabitants wished to send to the Count de Provence, to induce that prince to come to their city in the capacity of regent. From that moment the motives of the English could be guessed at, and it became apparent how blind and how culpable those had been, who had delivered Toulon to the most cruel enemies of the French navy.

The republicans could not hope, with such means as they then possessed, to recapture Toulon. The representatives even recommended that the army should fall back beyond the Durance, and wait for the following season. The reduction of Lyons, however, having placed fresh forces at their disposal, troops and materials were sent off to Toulon. General Doppet, to whom the credit of the capture of Lyons had been attributed, was appointed to supersede Carteaux. Doppet himself was soon displaced, and succeeded by Dugoumier, a very brave officer, and possessing far greater experience. Twenty-eight or thirty thousand men were collected, and orders were given to terminate the siege before the conclusion of the campaign.

The French began by closely hemming in the place, and erecting batteries against the forts. General Lapoype, detached from the army of Italy, was still to the East, and Dugommier the commander-in-chief, to the West, in advance of Ollioules. The latter was ordered to make the principal attack. The committee of public welfare had caused a regular plan of attack to be drawn up by the committee of fortification. The general summoned a council of war to discuss the plan sent from Paris. This plan was ably conceived, but another was also laid before them, better adapted to the circumstances, and which could not fail to produce more speedy results.

In the council of war there was a young man who commanded the artillery in the absence of the superior officer appointed to that service. His name was Bonaparte, a native of Corsica. Attached to France, the country in which he had been educated, he fought in Corsica for the cause of the convention against Paoli and the English; he had then joined the army of Italy, and now served before Toulon. He displayed extraordinary intelligence and extreme activity, and slept by the side of his guns. This young officer, on surveying the place, was struck with an idea, which he communicated to the council of war. Fort Eguillette, called Little Gibraltar, closed the road where the allied squadrons lay at anchor. This fort taken, the squadrons could no longer lie in the road, without running the risk of being burned on the spot; they could do nothing else than abandon it and leave in it a garrison of fifteen thousand men, without communication, without success, without any other prospect than that of being obliged, sooner or later, to lay down their arms: there was, therefore, every reason to presume that if Fort Eguillette were once in the possession of the republicans, the squadrons and the garrison would both evacuate Toulon. Thus the key of the place was Fort Eguillette, but this fort was almost impregnable. Young Bonaparte strongly supported this idea as best adapted to circumstances, and at length caused it to be adopted.

The French began by hemming in the place. Bonaparte, sheltered from observation by a few olive-trees which masked his artillerymen, placed a battery very near Fort Malbosquet, one of the most important of those surrounding Toulon. One morning this battery suddenly opened and surprised the besieged, who did not conceive it possible to place guns so near to the fort. The English general, O'Hara, who commanded the garrison, resolved to make a sortie for the purpose of destroying the battery and spiking the guns. On the 30th of November (10 Frimaire) he sallied forth at the head of six thousand men, forced a passage through the republican posts, gained possession of the battery, and immediately began to spike the guns. Fortunately, young Bonaparte was not far off with a battalion; a trench led to the battery, Bonaparte threw himself into it with his battalion, advanced with noiseless steps into the midst of the English, then all at once gave the order to fire, and threw them, by his sudden appearance, into the greatest surprise. General O'Hara, in astonishment, imagined that it was his own soldiers who were firing in mistake upon one another. He then advanced towards the republicans to ascertain the fact, but was wounded in the hand, and taken in the trench itself by a sergeant. At the same moment, Dugommier, who had ordered the général to be beaten in the camp, brought up his soldiers to the attack, and pushed on between the battery and the city. The English, finding themselves in danger of being cut off, then retired, after losing their general, and without being able to rid themselves of this dangerous battery.

This success remarkably encouraged the besiegers, and in a proportionate degree dispirited the besieged. So great were the apprehensions of the latter, that they said that General O'Hara had purposely suffered himself to be taken, to sell Toulon to the republicans. Meanwhile the republicans, who were determined to conquer the place, and who had not the means of purchasing it, prepared for the extremely perilous attack of the Eguillette. They had thrown into it a great number of bombs, and strove to demolish its defences with twenty-four pounders. On the 18th of December (28th Frimaire), it was resolved to make the assault at midnight. A simultaneous attack was to be made by General Lapoype on Fort Faron. At midnight, and in a tremendous storm, the republicans put themselves in motion. The soldiers who guarded the fort kept themselves chiefly in the back ground, in order to shelter themselves from the bombs and balls. The French hoped to reach it unperceived, but at the foot of the height they found some of the enemy's riflemen: an action commenced. On hearing the report of the musketry, the garrison of the fort ran to the ramparts and fired upon the assailants, who alternately fell back and advanced. A young captain of artillery, named Muiron, taking advantage of the inequalities of the ground, had succeeded in climbing the height without losing many of his men. On reaching the base of the fort he got in through an embrasure, the soldiers followed him, forced their way into the battery, made themselves masters of the guns, and in a short time of the fort itself.

In this action, General Dugommier, the representatives Salicetti and Robespierre the younger, and Bonaparte, the commandant of artillery, had been present in the fire, and had imparted the greatest courage to the troops. On the part of General Lapoype the attack had not been so successful, though one of the redoubts of Fort Faron had been carried.

As soon as Fort Eguillette was occupied, the republicans lost no time in disposing the guns so as to play upon the shipping. But the English did not wait till they had completed their preparations. They immediately resolved to evacuate the place, that they might no longer run the risk of a difficult and perilous defence. Before they withdrew, they determined to burn the arsenal, the dock-yards, and all the ships that they could not take away. On the 18th and 19th, without apprising the Spanish admiral, without forewarning the compromised inhabitants that they were about to be delivered up to the victorious Mountaineers, orders were given for the evacuation of the place. Every English ship came in its turn to supply itself from the arsenal. The forts were then all evacuated, excepting Fort Lamalgue, which was the last to be abandoned. This evacuation was effected with such dispatch, that the Spaniards, apprised of it too late, were left outside the walls, and escaped almost by a miracle. Lastly, orders were given to set fire to the arsenal. Twenty ships of the line and frigates suddenly appeared in flames in the middle of the road, and caused despair in the unfortunate inhabitants, and excited the indignation of the republicans, who saw the squadron burning, without having the power to save it. Immediately afterwards, more than twenty thousand persons, men, women, and children, carrying their most valuable effects, poured upon the quays, extending their hands towards the squadrons, and imploring an asylum to shelter them from the victorious army. These were all the Provencal families who were involved in the sectionary movement at Aix, Marseilles, and Toulon. Not a single boat put off from the ships to the succour of these imprudent French, who had entrusted themselves to the care of foreigners, and had delivered to them the principal seaport of their country. However, Admiral Langarn, with more humanity, ordered his boats to put off and take on board the Spanish squadron as many fugitives as the ships could receive. Lord Hood dared not resist the example, amid the imprecations that were vented against him. He issued orders, in his turn, but in no great haste, that the Toulonnais should be taken care of. Those unfortunate creatures rushed into the boats. In this confusion, some fell into the sea, others got separated from their families. Mothers might be seen looking for their children; wives and daughters seeking their husbands or their fathers, and wandering upon the quays by the light of the conflagration. At this dreadful moment, robbers, taking every advantage of the confusion to plunder, rushed among the unhappy wretches crowded together upon the quays, and fired upon them, shouting, Here are the republicans! The terrified crowd hurried away in the most desperate haste, leaving their property to the robbers who had contrived this surprise.

The republicans at last got into the town, and found it half deserted, and greater part of the naval stores destroyed. Fortunately, the galley-slaves had extinguished the fire, and prevented it from spreading. Out of fifty-six ships and frigates, no more than seven ships and eleven frigates were left. The others had been taken or burned by the English. To the horrors of the siege and those accompanying the evacuation, those of revolutionary vengeance were soon to have place. We shall have to relate elsewhere the sequel of the disasters of this guilty and miserable city. The capture of Toulon caused great rejoicing, and made quite as strong an impression as the victories of Watignies, the reduction of Lyons, and the raising of the blockade of Landau. After this, there was no room to apprehend that the English would again make use of Toulon to cause devastation and rebellion in the south.

The campaign did not terminate quite so successfully at the Pyrenees. However, in spite of the numerous reverses we experienced, and the great deficiency in point of ability in our generals, we had lost nothing but the line of the Tech, and still retained that of the Tet. After the unfortunate action at Truillas, which took place on the 22nd of September (1st Vendémiaire), directed against the Spanish camp, wherein Dagobert had displayed so much coolness and intrepidity, Ricardos, instead of marching forward, had, on the contrary, fallen back upon the Tech. The recapture of Villefranche, and a reinforcement of fifteen thousand men received by the republicans, had made him decide upon this retrograde movement. After he had raised the blockade of Collioure and Port-Vendre, he proceeded to the camp of Boulon, between Céret and Ville-Longue, and kept a sharp look out as to his communications, by securing the highroad to Bellegarde. The representatives, Fabre and Gaston, in the plenitude of their ardour, determined upon attacking the camp of the Spaniards, so as to drive them beyond the Pyrenees; but the attack produced no result, and only terminated in an useless effusion of blood.

The representative Fabre, from a strong desire to make some effectual effort, had long meditated a march to the other side of the Pyrenees, in order to compel the Spaniards to retreat. He had been persuaded that the fort of Rosas could be carried by a sudden and off-hand attack. In conformity with his desire, but in direct opposition to the advice of the generals, three columns were sent off beyond the Pyrenees, with orders to join each other at Espola. But, being very ineffective, and too far apart, they were unable to fall in with one another, were beaten, and driven back upon the great chain with considerable loss. This happened in October. In November, thunder-storms, unusual at that season, swelled the torrents, interrupted the communications of the different Spanish camps with one another, and placed them in the greatest danger.

Now was the opportunity afforded us for revenging upon the Spaniards the reverses which we had experienced. The only way they had left them for recrossing the Tech was the bridge of Céret, and there they remained drenched and famished, on the left bank of that river, at the mercy of the French. But nothing that ought to have been done was done. General Dagobert had been succeeded by General Turreau, and he, in his turn, by General Doppet. The army was disorganised. It made but a poor stand in the environs of Céret, and it even lost the camp of Saint-Ferréol, and Ricardos thus delivered himself from the dangers of his position. It was not long before he revenged himself much more ably for the dangerous situation in which he had been placed, and on the 7th of November (17th Brumaire), he fell fiercely with his forces upon a French column, which was cooped up at Ville-Longue, on the right bank of the Tech, between the river, the sea, and the Pyrenees. He defeated this column, which was ten thousand strong, and threw it into such confusion, that it could not rally before it reached Argelès. Immediately afterwards, Ricardos ordered an attack upon Delattre's division at Collioure, and seized upon Collioure, Port-Vendre, and Saint-Elme, and drove us completely beyond the Tech. Thus the campaign was at an end by the latter end of December. The Spaniards took up their winter-quarters on the banks of the Tech; the French encamped in the neighbourhood of Perpignan and on the banks of the Tet. We had lost some ground, but less than might have been apprehended, after so many disasters. It was, after all, the only frontier on which the campaign had not terminated gloriously for the arms of the republic. At the western Pyrenees, a mutual defensive had been maintained. However, in La Vendée, strange and terrible battles had been fought, in which the republic gained the upper hand, but not without inflicting great injury upon France, who on both sides beheld Frenchmen slaughtering one another.

The Vendéans, after their defeat at Cholet on the 17th of October (26th Vendémiaire), had rushed to the banks of the Loire, to the number of eighty thousand persons, men, women, children, and old men, not daring to return to their country, then in the possession of the republicans; and unable to keep the field any longer before an army flushed with victory, thought of repairing to Brittany, in order to carry out the suggestions of Bonchamps, since that young hero was now dead, and could no longer direct them in their melancholy situation. We have seen that, the day before the battle of Cholet, he sent a detachment to occupy the post of Varade on the Loire. That post, negligently guarded by the republicans, was taken in the night between the 16th and 17th. The battle being lost, the Vendéans were then able to cross the river unmolested, by means of some boats left on the bank, and out of reach of the republican cannon. The danger having been hitherto on the left bank, the government had not thought of defending the right bank. All the towns in Brittany were unprotected; some few detachments of the national guard, dispersed here and there, were incapable of checking the progress of the Vendéans, and could only retreat on their approach. The latter advanced, therefore, without any thing to impede their progress, and successively passed through Candé, Château-Gonthier, and Laval, without encountering any opposition.

In the meantime, the republican army had no intelligence of their whereabouts, their number, or their intentions; nay, for a moment, they believed that the Vendéans were destroyed, and so the representatives had written to the convention. Kléber alone, who had always commanded the army in the name of Léchelle, was by no means of that opinion, and did his utmost to keep this false security within bounds. It was not long, in fact, before intelligence was received that the Vendéans were far from exterminated, inasmuch as in the fugitive column there were still left thirty to forty thousand armed men, and in order for fighting. A council of war was immediately held; and as it was not known whether the fugitives intended to proceed towards Angers or Nantes, or whether they were for marching to Brittany, or were going by the Lower Loire to join Charette, it was settled that the army should form two detachments; that one detachment should hold Charette in check, and recapture Noirmoutiers; that the other detachment, under Kléber, should occupy the camp of Saint-George, near Nantes; and that the rest should remain at Angers, to cover that town, and to keep an eye upon the enemy's march. There is no doubt that had they been better informed, they would not have been behindhand in recollecting that the best course they could take was to remain altogether en masse, and march without delay in pursuit of the Vendéans. In the state of disorder and dismay in which they would have found them, it would have been easy to disperse and entirely destroy them; they knew not whither they had gone, and while they possessed no certain information on this point the course pursued was after all the wisest. However, it was not long before they received better intelligence, and they were informed that the Vendéans had marched to Candé, Château-Gonthier, and Laval. They then resolved to pursue them immediately, and to overtake them before they could agitate Brittany, and make themselves masters of any great town or seaport. Generals Vimeux and Haxo stayed behind at Nantes and in Lower Vendée, the remaining portion of the army proceeded towards Candé and Château-Gonthier. Westermann and Beaupuy formed the advanced guard; Chalbos, Kléber, and Canuel, each commanded a single division; and Léchelle, at a distance from the field of battle, left it to Kléber to direct the necessary movements, as he enjoyed the confidence and respect of the army.

In the evening of the 25th of October (4th Brumaire), the republican advanced guard arrived at Château-Gonthier; the main body was a day's march behind. Westermann, although his troops were extremely fatigued, although it was almost dark, and he was yet six leagues from Laval, determined to march thither at once. Beaupuy, who was quite as brave, but who possessed more discretion than Westermann, strove in vain to convince him of the danger attendant upon attacking the Vendean mass in the middle of the night, already far in advance of the main body of the army, and with troops harassed by fatigue. Beaupuy was compelled to yield to the opinion of his senior in command. The republicans commenced their march without delay, and got to Laval at midnight, from whence Westermann despatched an officer to reconnoitre the enemy: the latter, hurried away by his ardour, made a charge instead of an examination, and quickly drove back the outposts. The alarm was given in Laval, the tocsin rang, the whole mass of the enemy immediately turned out, and came to make head against the republicans. Beaupuy, believing with his usual firmness, courageously sustained the attack of the Vendéans. Westermann displayed all his intrepidity. The battle was most obstinately contested, and the darkness of the night made it indeed very bloody. The republican advanced guard, although much inferior in number, would nevertheless have kept its ground to the last, had not Westermann's cavalry, which was not always as brave as its commander, suddenly dispersed, and obliged him to retreat. It was entirely owing to the efforts of Beaupuy that they were able to retreat to Château-Gonthier in tolerable order. The main body arrived there on the following day. Thus the whole army was again collected on the 26th; the advanced guard exhausted by a useless and destructive action, and the main body fatigued by a long march, performed without provisions, without shoes, and through the slough of autumn. Westermann and the representatives were still for moving forward. Kléber strongly maintained a contrary opinion, and it was settled that they should advance beyond Villiers, half way between Château-Gonthier and Laval.

The next point was to form a plan for the attack

of Laval. This town is seated on the Mayenne. To have marched directly by the left bank, which the army occupied, would have been highly imprudent, as was judiciously observed by a highly distinguished officer, Savary, who was perfectly acquainted with the locality. The Vendéans could easily occupy the bridge of Laval, and so maintain themselves there against all attacks. They might then, while the republican army was uselessly crowded together on the left bank, march along the right bank, cross the Mayenne in the rear of the republican army, and suddenly overwhelm it. Savary's advice, therefore, was to divide the attack, and to place one part of the army upon the right bank. On this side there would be no bridge to cross, and no serious impediment would present itself to the army's seizing Laval. This plan, approved as it was by the generals, was adopted by Léchelle; next day, however, Léchelle, who sometimes divested himself of his passive authority to commit blunders, issued an order the most stupid and the most inconsistent with the course agreed upon the day before. He directed that the army should march, according to his favourite expression, majestically and en masse upon Laval, by marching along the left bank. Kléber and the other generals were highly indignant; nevertheless, they were obliged to obey. Beaupuy advanced first, Kléber immediately followed. The entire Vendean army was extended over the heights of Entrames. Beaupuy commenced the engagement, while Kléber deployed on the right and the left of the road, so as to extend his line as much as possible; however, becoming sensible of the disadvantage of this position, he sent to desire Léchelle to bring Chabos's division to bear upon the enemy's flank, a movement which would have thrown him into disorder. But this column, composed of those battalions formed at Orleans and at Niort, who had so often shown their backs, dispersed themselves before they were put in order to march. Léchelle was the first to run off at full gallop. The greater part of the army, which was not engaged, fled with the utmost precipitation, with Léchelle at its head, and ran to Château-Gonthier, and from Château-Gonthier to Angers. The brave Mayençais, who had never exhibited want of courage, for the first time dispersed themselves. The rout then became general; Beaupuy, Kléber, Marceau, and the representatives Merlin and Terreau, made incredible but useless efforts to stop the fugitives. Beaupuy received a ball in the middle of the chest; on being carried into a hut, he cried out, "Leave me here and show my bloody shirt to my soldiers;" the gallant Bloss, who commanded the grenadiers, and was conspicuous for an extraordinary intrepidity, fell at the head of his regiment. At length one part of the army halted at Lyon-d'Angers; the other part fled as far as Angers itself. General indignation was excited by the cowardly example set by Léchelle in being the first to fly. The soldiers murmured loudly. On the following day during the review, the small number of brave men who had stuck to their colours, and these were some of the Mayençais, shouted "Down with Léchelle! Kléber and Dubayet for ever! Give us back Dubayet!" Léchelle, who heard these shouts, conceived a greater ill-will than ever for the Mentz army, and against those generals whose bravery had put him to shame.

The representatives, seeing that the soldiers would no longer have any thing to do with Léchelle, resolved to suspend him, and offered the command to Kléber. The latter refused it, because he had an objection to the situation of a commander-in-chief, as being a constant mark for the representatives, the ministers, and the committee of public welfare, and consented merely to take the conduct of the army in the name of another. The command, therefore, was given to Chabos, who was one of the oldest generals in the army. Léchelle anticipating the resolution of the representatives, demanded his leave to retire, on the ground of ill-health, and withdrew himself to Nantes, where he died some time afterwards.

Kléber, seeing the army in a pitiable state, dispersed partly at Angers, and partly at Lyon-d'Angers, proposed to collect the whole of it at Angers, then to allow it a few days' rest, to supply it with shoes and clothes, and to reorganize it in a complete manner. This suggestion was adopted, and all the troops were collected at Angers. Léchelle, when he resigned, did not fail to denounce the army of Mentz, and attributed to brave men a rout originating solely in his own cowardice. For a considerable time a species of jealousy had existed in respect of that army, on account of its esprit de corps, its attachment to its generals, and its opposition to the staff of Saumur. The recent shouts of "Dubayet for ever! Down with Léchelle!" completely compromised it in the opinion of the government. Accordingly, the committee of public welfare soon issued an ordinance commanding that it should be disbanded, and incorporated with other corps. Kléber was to have the management of this latter operation. Although this measure was pointed against himself and his companions in arms, he cheerfully lent himself to it, for he was fully sensible of the dangerous consequences of the spirit of rivalry and animosity which subsisted between the garrison of Mentz and the remainder of the troops, and he felt moreover, that there was a great advantage in forming good advance guards of columns, which, if skillfully distributed, might communicate their own firmness to the entire army.

During these transactions at Angers, the Vendéans, who were freed at Laval from the republicans, and seeing nothing to oppose their march, knew not what course to take, or what was to be the future theatre of the war. Two courses, each possessing the like advantages, presented themselves: they had to choose between the extremity of Brittany and that of Normandy. The remotest part of Brittany had been completely fanaticised by the priests and nobles; the population would hail them with delight, and the country, extremely intersected and mountainous, would furnish them with very simple means of defence; lastly, they would be on the sea coast and in communication with the English. The extremity of Normandy, or peninsula of Cotentin, was rather more remote but much easier to protect; for by making themselves masters of Port Beil and Saint-Cosme, they could completely prevent all access of the enemy. They would there find the important town of Cherbourg, easily accessible to them on the land side, abounding in supplies of every kind, and above all, well adapted for communication with the the Vendéans, in which the republicans are worsted.

English These two plans then each presented great advantages, and but few impediments intervened to prevent their being fully carried out. The road to Brittany was guarded only by the army of Brest, under the command of Rossignol, consisting at most of five or six thousand men badly disciplined. The road to Normandy was defended by the army of Cherbourg, composed of levies en masse, ready to disperse at the first musket shot, and of a few thousand men solely belonging to the regular troops that had not yet quitted Caen. Thus it was that neither of these two armies was to be much dreaded by the Vendean mass. Nay, with a little celerity they might even avoid meeting them. But the Vendéans were ignorant of the nature of the localities. They had not a single officer with them who could give them any information respecting Brittany and Normandy, what military advantages, and what fortresses they possessed. They believed, for instance, that Cherbourg had been fortified on the side next the land; they were therefore incapable of expediting their movements, of gaining information during their march, or indeed of executing any thing with any degree of vigour and precision.

Although numerous, their army was in a distressing state. All the principal leaders were either dead or wounded. Bonchamps had expired on the left bank of the Loire, d'Elbée had been conveyed in a wounded state to Noirmoutiers; Lescure, struck by a ball on the forehead, was drawn dying in the train of the army. Larochefacquelein alone remained, and he had been called to the chief command. Stofflet commanded under him. The army, now compelled to put itself in motion, and to abandon its own country, ought to have been organized; but it marched confusedly (pêle mêle), like a horde, having the women, the children, and the waggons in the centre. In a regular army, the brave, the weak, and the cowardly, interlaced the one with the other, must perforce hold together, and mutually support one another. A few courageous men are quite sufficient to impart their energy to the entire mass. Here, on the contrary, no rank was kept, nor was any division into companies or into battalions observed, but every one marched where he pleased; the bravest men had ranged themselves together, and formed a corps of five or six thousand, always ready to be the first to advance. Next to these came a troop, not so much to be relied upon, and whose only efficiency might be displayed in deciding a struggle by throwing themselves upon the flanks of an enemy already in confusion. In the wake of these two bands, the mass, ever ready to turn their backs upon the first musket-shot, confusedly drew itself along.

Thus the thirty or forty thousand armed men reduced themselves to a few thousand brave fellows, who were from mere temperament always disposed to fight. The absence of all sub-divisions prevented their forming detachments, their directing a corps to bear on this or that point, or making any kind of settled arrangement whatever. Some followed Larochefacquelein, others Stofflet, and were followers of them only. It was impossible to issue general orders; all that could be done with them, was to get them to follow at a given signal. Stofflet had merely a few trusty peasants, who went to communicate his directions to their comrades.

They had scarcely two hundred wretched horse soldiers, and about thirty pieces of cannon, ill served and ill kept. The baggage encumbered the march; the women and the old men strove, for the sake of greater safety, to stick themselves in the midst of the most courageous troop, and by thus overcharging their ranks, embarrassed their movements. A certain distrust began to gain ground on the part of the soldiers with respect to the officers. They said, that all that the latter were anxious about, was to get to the coast, so that they might embark and abandon the unfortunate peasants whom they had torn from their homes. The council, whose authority had become absolutely illusory, was divided; the priests were dissatisfied with the military leaders; nothing, in short, would have been easier than to have destroyed such an army, if the utmost confusion in regard to command had not prevailed among the republicans.

The Vendéans were, therefore, incapable alike of conceiving and executing any plan whatever. It was twenty-six days since they quitted the Loire, and in so long a space of time they had done nothing whatever. After so much indecision, they at last came to a determination. On the one hand, they were told that Rennes and Saint-Malo were protected by a considerable number of troops; on the other, that Cherbourg was strongly defended on the side next the land; they resolved, therefore, to besiege Granville, seated on the coast between the boundary line of Brittany and Normandy. This plan in particular possessed the advantage of bringing them near to Normandy, which had been described to them as extremely fertile, and abounding in provisions. They marched, in consequence, upon Fougères. There had been raised upon the very road the Vendéans were taking fifteen or sixteen thousand men of the levy en masse, who dispersed without striking a blow. They reached Dol on the 10th November, and arrived at Avranches on the 12th.

On the 14th of November (24th Brumaire) they bent their steps towards Granville, leaving half their men and all their baggage at Avranches. The garrison having attempted to make a sortie, they repulsed it, and in driving it back they made their way into the suburb. The garrison had time to enter and close the gates; but the suburb remained in their possession, and they thus possessed great facilities for the attack. They advanced from the suburb up to the palisades which had been recently erected; without caring to destroy them, they confined themselves to keeping up a fire of musketry against the ramparts, until they were in turn replied to by grape-shot and cannon-halls. At the same time, they placed some pieces on the surrounding heights, and fired to no purpose against the tops of the walls, and on the houses of the town. At night they dispersed, and abandoned the suburb, where the fire of the place allowed them no rest. They went beyond the range of the cannon to seek lodging, provisions, and above all, fuel, for the weather began to be extremely cold. The leaders could with difficulty retain a few hundred men in the suburb, to keep up the fire of musketry from that quarter.

On the following day, their inability to take a walled town was still more clearly demonstrated; they still made another trial of their batteries, but without success. They again opened a fire of musketry along the palisades, but were soon completely disheartened. One of them all at once conceived the idea of taking advantage of the ebb tide to cross a low beach, and to attack the town on the side next to the harbour. They were preparing for this new attempt, when the suburb was set on fire by the representatives shut up in Granville. The Vendéens were then obliged to evacuate it, and take measures for effectuating a retreat. The attempt on the side next the harbour was entirely relinquished, and on the following day they all returned to Avranches to rejoin the rest of their force and the baggage. From this moment their discouragement was extreme. They complained more bitterly than ever of the leaders who had torn them from their country, and now wanted to abandon them, and insisted, with great outcries, on returning to the Loire. In vain did Larochejacquelein, at the head of the bravest of their force, make a new attempt to lead them into Normandy; in vain did he march to Ville-Dieu, of which he made himself master, he was followed by scarcely a thousand men. The remaining portion of the column regained the road to Brittany by marching to Pontorson, by which it had come. This column gained possession of the bridge at Beaux, which, as being thrown over the Selune, was absolutely necessary to enable them to reach Pontorson.

While these occurrences were taking place at Granville, the republican army had been re-organized at Angers. Scarcely had the time necessary for giving it a little rest, and restoring it to order elapsed, when it was conveyed to Rennes, to be there incorporated with six or seven thousand men of the Brest army, under the command of Rossignol, and it was there that in a council of war, measures had been resolved upon in order to follow up the pursuit of the Vendean column. Chalbos, being ill, had obtained permission to retire upon the rear, to recruit his health; and Rossignol had been invested by the representatives with the chief command of the army of the West and that of Brest, now making in all twenty or twenty-one thousand men. It had been settled that these two armies should proceed forthwith to Antrain; that General Tribut, who was at Dol with three or four thousand men, should repair to Pontorson; and that General Sèphier, who had six thousand soldiers of the army of Cherbourg, should follow at the rear of the Vendean column. Thus, placed between the sea, the post of Pontorson, the army of Antrain and Sèphier, who had got to Avranches, this column could not fail to be pent up and destroyed.

All these arrangements came into operation at the very moment when the Vendéens were leaving Avranches, and were taking possession of the bridge at Beaux, in order to get to Pontorson. This was on the 18th of November (28th Brumaire). General Tribut, a mere declaimer without any practical knowledge of war, had, in order to protect Pontorson, merely to occupy a narrow pass across a marsh, which covered the town, and round which they could not get. With such an advantageous position as this was, he could have prevented the Vendéens from stirring a single step. But the moment he saw the enemy, he abandoned the defile and moved forward. The Vendéens, encouraged by the taking of the bridge at Beaux, charged him vigorously, obliged him to fall back; and profiting by the disorder of his retreat, rushed after him into the pass that crosses the marsh, and thus made themselves masters of Pontorson, which they ought not to have been suffered to approach.

Owing to this unpardonable blunder, an unexpected passage was opened for the Vendéens. They could now march to Dol; but from Dol they would be obliged to go to Antrain, and to encounter the main republican army. However, they evacuated Pontorson, and advanced to Dol, and Westermann lost no time in pursuing them.

Impetuous as ever, he hurried Marigny and his grenadiers along with him, and had the hardihood to follow the Vendéens as far as Dol with a mere advanced guard. In fact he came up with them, and drove them confusedly into the town; but they soon recovered themselves, and sallied forth from Dol, and by that destructive mode of firing which they managed so expertly, they compelled the republican advanced guard to retire to a great distance.

Kléber, who still governed the army by his counsels, although another was the commander-in-chief, proposed that in order to complete the destruction of the Vendean column it should be pent up, and thus made to perish by famine, disease, and misery. Desertions were so frequent among the republican troops, that an attack by main force might be attended with dangerous risks. On the contrary, by fortifying Antrain, Pontorson, and Dinan, they would enclose the Vendéens between the sea and three entrenched points; and by harassing them every day with the troops under Westermann and Marigny, they could not fail to destroy them. The representatives approved of this plan; and the necessary orders were issued. But all at once, there came an officer from Westermann, who said that if the intention were to support his general, and attack Dol on the Antrain side, while he was to make the attack from the Pontorson side, it would be all over with the Catholic army, and that it would be utterly destroyed. The representatives took fire at this proposal. Priem, of La Marne, quite as impetuous as Westermann, raised the plan at first adopted to be changed, and it was decided that Marceau at the head of a column, should march to Dol simultaneously with Westermann.

On the morning of the 21st, Westermann moved forwards to Dol. In his impatience he never thought of ascertaining whether Marceau's column, which was to come up from Antrain, had already reached the field of battle, and he began the attack off-hand. The enemy answered his assault by their effective mode of firing. Westermann extended the line of his infantry and gained ground; but cartridges now began to fail; he was thereupon obliged to make a retrograde movement, and managed to make good his position upon a level eminence in his rear. The Vendéens made the most of this, for they fell upon his column and dispersed it. In the meantime, Marceau at length came in sight of Dol; the victorious Vendéens came in a body upon him; he defended himself with heroic firmness for a whole day, and succeeded in keeping his ground on the field of battle. But his position was extremely perilous; he sent to Kléber to afford him advice and assistance. Kléber hastened to him, and advised him to assume a retrograde, but, for all that, a very strong position in the environs of Trans. While some hesitation was being felt as to following Kléber's advice, the Vendean riflemen made their appearance, and made the troops fall back. They were at first thrown into disorder, but soon rallied upon the position pointed out by Kléber. That general then resorted to the first plan which he had proposed, and which consisted in fortifying Antrain. It was adhered to; but the army was not to return to Antrain, but remain at Trans, and fortify itself there, in order to be nearer to Dol. All of a sudden, with that fickleness which characterized all our resolutions, this plan was once more changed, and it was again resolved to take the offensive, notwithstanding the experience afforded by the preceding day. A reinforcement was sent to Westermann, with orders to make the assault on his side, at the same time that the main army should attack on the side next to Trans.

It was to no purpose that Kléber objected that Westermann's troops, completely out of spirits from the event of the preceding day, would not stand their ground. The representatives insisted, and the following day was appointed for the attack. In point of fact, the movement was made the following day. Westermann and Marigny were anticipated, and attacked by the enemy. Their troops, though supported by a reinforcement, dispersed. They made unheard-of exertions to keep them together; it was to no purpose that they rallied around them a few brave men, who were soon hurried along by the rest. The victorious Vendéans abandoned that point, and moved upon their right towards the army which was advancing from Trans.

They had hardly obtained this advantage, and were preparing themselves to gain a second, when the report of the artillery struck terror into the town of Dol, as well as into those who had not as yet gone out to battle, women, aged men, children, and cowardly folks ran off on all sides, and fled in the direction of Dinan and towards the sea. Their priests, with crucifixes in their hands, made useless efforts to bring them back. Stofflet and Larochejaquelein ran from rank to rank to stop them and bring them back into action. At length they contrived to rally them, and get them into the road to Trans, in the train of the brave fellows who went foremost.

Not less confusion prevailed in the principal camp of the republicans. Rossignol and the representatives, commanding all at once, could neither agree together nor act. Kléber and Marceau, suffering under the most intense vexation, had gone forward to reconnoitre the ground, and to interpose themselves to the assault of the Vendéans. When he had come up and faced the enemy, Kléber desired to extend the line of the advanced guard of the army of Brest, but it deserted at the first discharge. He then ordered Canuel's brigade, chiefly composed of Mentz battalions, to advance; and these latter adhering to their wonted bravery, made a good stand during the whole day, and were left alone on the field of battle, abandoned by the rest of the troops. But that Vendean band that had beaten Westermann, took them in flank, and compelled them to retreat. The Vendéans made the best of this, and pursued them even to Antrain. At length their quitting Antrain could no longer be delayed, and the entire republican army retired to Rennes.

Now it was that the prudence of Kléber's advice became to be fully appreciated. Rossignol, under the influence of one of those generous impulses of which he was capable, notwithstanding his prejudice against the generals of the Mentz army, appeared at the council of war with a paper containing his resignation. "I am not qualified," said he, "to command an army. Let me have a battalion and I will do my duty; but I am not competent to undertake command-in-chief. Here, then, is my resignation, and they who refuse it are enemies to the republic." "Away with resignation!" cried Prieur of La Marne, "thou art the eldest child of the committee of public welfare. We will give thee generals who shall advise thee, and shall be responsible in thy stead for the events of the war." Nevertheless, Kléber, who was extremely vexed at witnessing so misconducted an army, proposed the only plan that could recover the state of things, but which was far from being in accordance with the arrangements made by the representatives. "You ought," said he to them, "assuming that you allow Rossignol to retain the generalship, to appoint a commander-in-chief of the infantry, a commander of the cavalry, and a commander of the artillery." This suggestion was adopted. He then had the boldness to propose Marceau as commander-in-chief of the infantry, Westermann of the cavalry, and Debilly of the artillery, all three of them suspected as members of the Mentz faction. A momentary dispute took place in discussing the qualifications of the individuals; but they afterwards gave in to the ascendancy of that able and generous officer, who was vehemently attached to the republic, not from an extravagant imagination but from principle, who served with admirable sincerity and disinterestedness, who possessed an attachment for, and had a genius peculiarly adapted to his profession in a very rare degree. Kléber had caused the nomination of Marceau, because he possessed great influence over that brave young soldier, and because he could rely upon his absolute devotion to him. He felt assured, that if Rossignol's authority remained in abeyance, he could then manage every thing himself, and so bring the war to a successful termination.

The Cherbourg division, which had come from Normandy, and was incorporated with the armies of Brest and the West, now quitted Rennes, in order to proceed to Angers, where the Vendéans intended to cross the Loire. The latter, after securing the means of return by their twofold victory on the road to Pontorson and on that of Antrain, thought of retiring to their own country. They passed, without striking a blow, through Fougères and Laval, and designed to make themselves masters of Angers, so as to pass the Loire at the bridge of Cé. The last experiment which they had made at Granville had not wholly convinced them of their inability to take walled towns. On the 3rd of December, they rushed into the suburbs of Angers, and began to fire upon the front of the town. They remained there all the following day; but anxious as they were to open for themselves a passage to their own country, from which they were separated only by the Loire, they soon saw the impracticability of its performance. The advanced guard of Westermann coming up on this same day, the 4th, completely disheartened them, and caused them to abandon their enterprise. They then put themselves in marching order, going up the Loire, and not knowing at what point they should be able to cross it. Some considered that they should go as high as Saumur, others to Blois; but while they were in the act of deliberation, Kléber came up with his division along the causeway of Saumur, and forced them to retreat once more into Brittany. Thus these unfortunate creatures, destitute of provisions, of shoes, of vehicles to convey their families, afflicted by an epidemic disease, were again wandering in Brittany, without finding either an asylum or outlet whereby to escape. The roads were strewn with their remains; and at the bivouac before Angers were found women and children who had died of hunger and cold. They already began to imagine that the convention only wanted their leaders, and many of them threw away their arms, in order to conceal their flight across the country. At length the reports made to them concerning Mans, the plenty they should find there, and the inclinations of the inhabitants, induced them to proceed thither. They passed through La Fleche, of which they made themselves masters, and entered Mans after a slight skirmish.

The republican army followed them. Fresh disputes had taken place amongst the generals. Kléber had intimidated the brawlers by his firmness, and compelled the representatives to send back Rossignol to Rennes with his division of the Brest army. An ordinance of the committee of public welfare then conferred on Marceau the title of commander-in-chief, and discharged all the Menthz generals, but allowed Marceau to avail himself temporarily of Kléber's services. Marceau declared that he would not command, unless Kléber were at his side to order every thing. "In accepting the dignity," said Marceau to Kléber, "I am personally subject to the annoyance and responsibility, and I shall relinquish for thee the actual command and the means of saving the army." "Hold thy peace, my friend," said Kléber, "we will fight together, and we will be guillotined together."

The army marched immediately, and from that moment every thing was conducted with unanimity and vigour. Westermann's advanced guard arrived on the 12th at Mans, and instantly charged the Vendéens. They were soon routed, but some few thousand brave men, headed by Larochejaquelein, formed before the town, and forced Westermann to fall back upon Marceau, who was coming up with a division. Kléber was still behind with the rest of the army. Westermann was for losing no time in making the assault, although it was night. Marceau, impelled by his constitutional impetuosity, but yet fearing to be censured by Kléber, whose cool and tranquil energy never suffered itself to be hurried away, at first hesitated; but at last subdued by the importunities of Westermann, he decided in accordance with him, and attacked Mans. The tocsin was rung, and dismay pervaded the town. Westermann and Marceau dashed forward in the dark, carrying all before them; and in spite of a destructive fire from the houses, they contrived to drive a great number of the Vendéens into the great square of the town. Marceau cut them off from the streets running into this square on his right and left, and thus pent up the Vendéens. After all, his position was by no means without danger; for having ventured into a town in the middle of the night, the enemy might easily get at his rear, and surround him. He therefore sent a dispatch to Kléber, urging him to come up as speedily as possible with his division. The latter arrived at day-break. The greater part of the Vendéens had fled; the bravest of them only remained to cover the retreat: they were charged with the bayonet, broken, and dispersed, and a horrible carnage began in every part of the town.

Never had the flight of a defeated enemy been accompanied with greater horrors. A considerable number of women, left behind, were made prisoners. Marceau saved a young female who had lost her relatives, and who, in her despair, begged to be put to death. She was modest and beautiful. Marceau, full of kindness and delicacy, took her into his carriage, treated her with respect, and caused her to be conveyed to a place of safety. The country was covered far and wide with the relics of this defeat. The indefatigable Westermann harassed the fugitives, and strewed the roads with dead bodies. The unhappy Vendéens, not knowing whither to flee, entered Laval for the third time, and left it again immediately, to transport themselves once more to the Loire. Their intention was to cross at Ancenis. Larochejaquelein and Stofflet conveyed themselves to the other side, with the intention, it was said, of procuring boats, and bringing them to the right bank. They did not come back. Indeed, it is asserted that their return was impracticable. The passage over could not be effected. The Vendean column, deprived of the presence and support of its two leaders, continued to descend the Loire, still pursued, and still vainly seeking a passage across. At length, reduced to despair, not knowing which way to turn, it resolved to flee to the extremity of Brittany, to the Morbihan. The column proceeded to Blain, where it once more obtained an advantage by its rear-guard; and from Blain to Savenay, from whence it hoped to be able to effect a passage into the Morbihan.

The republicans had followed the Vendean column without intermission, and they arrived at Savenay on the evening of the very day that it had entered that place. Savenay had the Loire on the left, marshes on the right, and a wood in front. Kléber felt the importance of occupying the wood the same day, and of making himself master of all the heights, so that he should not fail to crush the Vendéens on the following day in Savenay, before they had time to quit the place. In point of fact, his advanced guard fell impetuously upon them; and he himself, seizing the moment when the Vendéens were debouching from the wood, to repulse this advanced guard, boldly threw himself into the wood with a corps of infantry, and completely cleared it of them. They therefore fled to Savenay, and shut themselves up there, keeping up, however, a continual fire during the whole of the night. Westermann and the representatives proposed to make the assault without further delay, and to destroy the Vendéans that very night. Kléber, however, who was by no means desirous that any miscarriage of his should deprive him of a certain victory, declared positively that he would not make the assault, and then shrouding himself under an air of imperturbable indifference, he suffered them to say what they pleased, without replying to any provocation. He thus effectually prevented any operation being conducted without his concurrence.

Next morning, December the 23rd, before it was light, he was on horseback with Marceau, passing along his line, when the Vendéans, driven to desperation, and determined not to survive that battle, rushed first upon the republicans. Marceau marched with the centre, Canuel with the right, Kléber with the left. They all three fell upon, and drove the Vendéans back into the town. Marceau and Kléber effected a junction of each other's forces in the town, made prisoners of all the cavalry they could find, and dashed forth in pursuit of the enemy. The Loire and the marshes prevented these unfortunates from making any retreat. A great number perished by the bayonet; others were made prisoners; and scarcely any of them found means to escape. On that day the column was utterly destroyed, and the great war of La Vendée might then be said to have been actually brought to a close.

Thus this unfortunate people, conveyed from their own country through the imprudence of their leaders, and reduced to the necessity of seeking a seaport as a place of refuge in the direction of England, had in vain dipped their foot in the water of the ocean. Not having been able to capture Granville, they had been brought back to the Loire, and being unable to cross that river, they had been a second time driven into Brittany, and from Brittany again to the Loire. At length, finding it impossible to pass that fatal barrier, they came at last to perish in a body between Savenay, the Loire, and the marshes. Westermann was despatched with his cavalry to pursue the fugitive remnant of La Vendée. Kléber and Marceau returned to Nantes—received on the 24th by the people of that city, they obtained a sort of triumph, and the Jacobin club complimented them with a civic crown.

If we consider this memorable campaign of 1793, with respect to its general results, we cannot regard it in any other light than as the greatest effort ever made by a nation threatened on every side. In the year 1792, the league of the allied powers, which was then far from being perfect, had acted without unity and without vigour. The Prussians had attempted a ridiculous invasion in Champagne; the Austrians had done no more in the Netherlands than bombard the town of Lille. The French, in their first transports of enthusiasm, had repulsed the Prussians beyond the Rhine, and the Austrians beyond the Meuse, they had conquered the Netherlands, Mentz, Savoy, and the Comté de Nice. The great year 1793, opened in a far different manner. The League was strengthened by three powers, who up to that time had remained neutral. Spain, provoked beyond endurance by the event of the 21st of January, had at length sent fifty thousand men to the Pyrenees; France had obliged Pitt to declare himself; and England and Holland had entered at once into the League, now doubly fortified, and which, better informed of the means of the enemy with which it had to cope, augmented its forces, and prepared for a decisive effort. Thus, as in the time of Louis XIV. France had to make a stand against the attack of all Europe; and in the present instance she had not drawn down upon herself this combination of enemies by her ambition, but by exhibiting the just indignation which the interference of the powers in regard of her domestic relations had called forth.

So early as the month of March, Dumouriez commenced by engaging in a rash enterprise, and purposed the invasion of Holland by hastily crossing over in boats. In the meantime, Cobourg surprised the lieutenants of that general, drove them beyond the Meuse, and even obliged him to return and put himself at the head of his army. Dumouriez was compelled to fight the battle of Neerwinden. That terrible battle was won, when the left wing gave way and recrossed the Gette; it became necessary to beat a retreat, and we lost the Netherlands in a few days. Our reverses at that time embittered the public mind; Dumouriez broke with his government, and went over to the Austrians. At the same time, Custine, beaten at Frankfurt, brought back to the Rhine, and cut off from Mentz, gave the Prussians an opportunity to blockade and commence the siege of that famous fortress; the Piedmontese repulsed us at Saorgio; the Spaniards effected a passage over the Pyrenees; and lastly, the provinces of the west, already deprived of their priests, and excited beyond all endurance by the levy of the three hundred thousand men, began to rise in open rebellion in the name of the throne and of the altar. It was at this time that the Mountain party, exasperated by the defection of Dumouriez, the defeats experienced in the Netherlands, on the Rhine, at the Alps, and above all, by the insurrection of the west, no longer restrained themselves, but tore the Girondists by force from the body of the convention, and thus got rid of all those who still had the power to have talked to it of moderation. This new excess created it new enemies. Sixty-seven departments, out of eighty-three, rose against the government, which had then to struggle with Europe, royalist La Vendée, and three-fourths of federalized France. It was at this period that we lost the camp of Famars and the brave Dampierre, that the blockade of Valenciennes was completed, that Mentz was closely pressed, that the Spaniards crossed the Tech and threatened Perpignan, that the Vendéans took Saumur and laid siege to Nantes, and that the federalists made preparations for proceeding from Lyons, Marseilles, Bordeaux, and Caen to fall upon Paris.

From all these points, the experiment of a bold march to the capital might well have been attempted, the revolution itself might have been terminated in a few days, and European civilization suspended for a long period. Fortunately for us, the insurgents laid siege to the fortified towns. The reader will recollect with what firmness the convention recalled the departments to their duty, by simply exhibiting her authority, and by dispersing the misconducted people who had advanced as far as Vernon; with what success the Vendéans were repulsed from Nantes, and how the march of their victorious career was checked; but while the convention gained a triumph over the federalists, her other enemies were making alarming progress. Valenciennes and Mentz were taken after memorable sieges; the war of federalism brought in its train two most unfortunate events, the siege of Lyons and the treasonable practices at Toulon; lastly, La Vendée itself, surrounded by the enclosure of the Loire, the sea, and Poitou, had, by the successful defence of Nantes, recently driven back the columns of Westermann and Labarolière, who had attempted to force a passage into the heart of the country. Never were circumstances more critical. The allies were no longer detained in the north and on the Rhine by besieging towns; Lyons and Toulon presented effective support to the Piedmontese; La Vendée appeared invincible, and presented a footing for the English. It was then that the convention summoned to Paris the deputies of the primary assemblies, gave them the constitution of the year III. to swear to and defend, and decided with them that the entire of France, men and things, were at the disposal of the government. Then it was that the levy en masse was decreed generation by generation, together with the power of requiring whatever was needful for the war. Then was it that the Great Book was instituted, as well as the forced loan from the rich, so as to withdraw part of the assignats from circulation, and to effect compulsory investment in the national property. Then were two large armies despatched to La Vendée; the garrison of Mentz was conveyed thither by post; it was resolved that this unfortunate country should be laid waste, and that its population should be transported elsewhere. Lastly, Carnot became a member of the committee of public welfare, and began to introduce order and unity into our military operations.

We had lost Caesar's camp, but Kilmaine had, by a lucky retreat, saved the remains of the army of the North. The English advanced to Dunkirk, and laid siege to that town, while the Austrians attacked Le Quesnoy. A mass was rapidly moved from Lilly upon the rear of the duke of York. If Houchard, who on this occasion commanded sixty thousand French, had comprehended Carnot's plan, and had proceeded to Furnes, not an Englishman would have escaped. Instead of placing himself between the army of observation and the besieging army, he pursued a direct course, and at least caused the rising of the siege, by fighting the successful battle of Hondschote. This was our first victory: it saved Dunkirk, deprived the English of all the fruits of this war, and joy and hope were ours once more.

Fresh reverses soon converted this rejoicing into new alarms. Le Quesnoy was taken by the Austrians; Houchard's army was seized with a panic terror at Menin, and dispersed; the Prussians and the Austrians, whose progress nothing could stop after the reduction of Mentz, advanced upon the two slopes of the Vosges, threatened the lives of Weissenburg, and beat us in several encounters. The Lyonnese made a vigorous defence; the Piedmontese had recovered Savoy, and had descended towards Lyons, so as to place our army between cross fires; Ricardos had crossed the Tet, and had advanced beyond Perpignan; lastly, the division of the troops in the West into two armies, that of La Rochelle and that of Brest, had prevented the success of the plan of campaign as settled at Saumur on the 2nd of September. Caneaux, inefficiently assisted by Rossignol, had found himself alone, in advance, in the heart of La Vendée, and had fallen back upon Nantes. New efforts were then demonstrated. The dictatorship was completed and proclaimed by the institution of the revolutionary government; the power of the committees of public welfare was proportioned to the danger; the levies were effected, and the armies augmented by a multitude of recruits; the new recruits filled the garrisons, and took the place of the organised troops, who were transferred to the line; lastly, the convention ordered the armies to conquer within a specified time.

The means which she had brought into action produced their natural effects. The armies of the north, being reinforced, concentrated themselves at Lille and at Guise. The allies had proceeded to Maubeuge, which they purposed to capture before the end of the campaign. Jourdan, marching from Guise, fought the Austrians at Watignies, and forced them to raise the siege of Maubeuge, in precisely the same manner that Houchard had obliged the English to raise that of Dunkirk. The Piedmontese were driven back beyond the Saint-Bernard by Kellermann. Lyons, inundated by the levies en masse, was carried by assault; Ricardos was driven beyond the Tet; lastly, the two armies of La Rochelle and Brest, incorporated under one commander, Léchelle, who permitted Kléber to act for him, crushed the Vendéans at Cholet, and obliged them to cross the Loire in confusion.

One single reverse detracted from the exultation such events must naturally have produced. The lines of Weissenburg were lost. But the committee of public welfare resolved not to terminate the campaign before they were retaken. Young Hoche, general of the army of the Moselle, unsuccessful yet brave at Kaiserslautern, met with encouragement, although defeated. Unable to break the lines of Brunswick, he threw himself on the flank of Wurmsier. From that moment, the united armies of the Rhine and the Moselle drove the Austrians beyond Weissenburg, compelled Brunswick to concur in this retrograde movement, raised the blockade of Landau, and encamped in the Palatinate. Toulon was retaken, in consequence of a felicitous suggestion, and by a prodigy of boldness. Lastly, the Vendéans, whom every body supposed were destroyed, but who, in their desperation, had, to the number of eighty thousand, conveyed themselves beyond the Loire, and sought a seaport, so that they might throw themselves into the arms of the English,—these Vendéans were driven back, alike from the sea-coasts as from the banks of the Loire, and thus were crushed between these two barriers, which they could by no possibility pass. At the Pyrenees alone our arms had not met with success; but yet we had lost no more than the line of the Tech, and we were still encamped before Perpignan.

Thus this grand and awful year exhibits to our eyes Europe bearing down the revolution with its whole weight, making it alone for its first successes in 1792, driving back its armies, and penetrating into France by all the frontiers at the same time; and a portion of France rising in rebellion, and adding its efforts to those of the hostile powers. The revolution then became incensed. Her wrath was kindled on the 31st of May; she created new enemies by the events of that day, and almost appeared on the point of again succumbing to Europe and the three-fourths of her revolted provinces. But she soon recalled her domestic enemies to their duty, raised a million of men at once, beat the English at Hondtschoote, was beaten in her turn, but immediately increasing her exertions, gained a victory at Watignies, recovered the lines of Weissenburg, drove the Piedmontese beyond the Alps, took Lyons and Toulon, and on two occasions crushed the Vendéans, the first time in La Vendée, and finally in Brittany. Never was there exhibited a more elevated object of attention, or one more worthy to be held forth to the admiration and the imitation of nations. France had recovered all that she had lost excepting Condé, Valenciennes, and some fortresses in Roussillon; on the contrary, the powers of Europe, who had all of them contended against an individual nation, had gained nothing, were accusing one another, and reproached each other with having occasioned the disgraceful failure of the campaign. France had accomplished the organisation of her means, and must necessarily appear still more formidable in the ensuing year.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE EVENT OF THE CONTEST BETWEEN THE HÉBERTISTS AND DANTONISTS.—CAMILLE-DESMOULINS PUBLISHES "THE OLD CORDÉLIER."—THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC WELFARE IS PLACED BETWEEN THE TWO DOMINANT PARTIES, AND FIRST STRIVES TO SUPPRESS THE HÉBERTISTS.—DEATH IN PARIS.—IMPORTANT REPORTS OF ROBESPIERRE AND SAINT-JUST.—MOVEMENT ATTEMPTED BY THE HÉBERTISTS.—ARREST AND DEATH OF RONSIN, VINCENT, HÉBERT, CHAUMETTE, MOMORO, ETC.—THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC WELFARE NEXT SUBJECTS THE DANTONISTS TO THE SAME FATE.—ARREST, TRIAL, AND EXECUTION OF DANTON, CAMILLE-DESMOULINS, PHILIPPEAU, LACROIX, HÉNAULT-SÉCHILLES, FABRIE-D'ÉGLANTINE, CHABOT, ETC.

THE convention had begun to exercise some severities against the turbulent faction of the Cordeliers, and against the ministerial agents. Ronsin and Vincent were in prison. Their partisans outside were bestirring themselves. Momoro at the Cordeliers, and Hébert at the Jacobins, were striving to excite the interest of the fervid revolutionists in favour of their friends. The Cordeliers presented a petition, and asked, in a tone far from respectful, whether it was intended to punish Vincent and Ronsin for having courageously prosecuted Dumouriez, Custine, and Brissot; they declared that they considered those two citizens as excellent patriots, and that they should still retain them as members of their club. The Jacobins presented a petition framed in more cautious terms, and merely prayed that the report concerning Vincent and Ronsin should be speeded, in order that they might be punished if guilty, or restored to liberty if they were innocent.

The committee of public welfare still preserved silence. Collot-d'Herbois alone, though a member of the committee and a compulsory partisan of the government, displayed the warmest zeal in behalf of Ronsin. The motive of this was natural enough. The cause of Vincent did not affect him, but that of Ronsin, who was sent with him to Lyons, and who moreover carried his sanguinary ordinances into execution, touched him very nearly. Collot-d'Herbois had, with Ronsin, maintained that not more than a hundredth part of the Lyonnese were patriots; that it was necessary to transport or sacrifice the rest, to commit their dead bodies to the Rhône, so as to dismay the entire south by this spectacle, and to strike terror into the rebellious city of Toulon. Ronsin was in prison for having repeated these horrible expressions in a placard. Collot-d'Herbois now summoned to render an account of his mission, was deeply interested in justifying the conduct of Ronsin, that he might secure the approval of his own. At this very time there came a petition signed by some Lyonnese citizens, who presented a most heart-rending picture of the calamities inflicted upon their city. They represented the fact of the discharges of grape shot succeeding the executions by the guillotine, an entire population threatened with extermination, and a wealthy manufacturing city demolished, not with the pickaxe but by mining explosions. This petition, which four citizens had possessed resolution enough to sign, produced a most painful impression upon the convention. Collot-d'Herbois lost no time in making his report, and in the drunkenness of his revolutionary guilt, he exhibited those awful executions precisely as they appeared to his imagination, that is, as indispensable, and as perfectly a matter of course. "The Lyonnese," according to the purport of what he said, "were conquered, but they loudly declared that they would soon have their revenge. It was necessary to strike terror into those yet unsubdued rebels, and not them only, but into all those who were disposed to imitate their examples: a prompt and terrible example was required. The ordinary instrument of death did not work with sufficient despatch; the pickaxe demolished but slowly. Grape shot has destroyed the men. Mining explosions have destroyed the buildings. Those who are now dead had all of them imbrued their hands in the blood of the patriots. A popular commission selected them with prompt and discerning eye from among the multitude of prisoners; and there was no reason to regret any of those who had been stricken." Collot-d'Herbois obliged the amazed convention to approve of what appeared to him so much a matter of course than, he then proceeded to the Jacobins to complain to them of the difficulty he had experienced in justifying his conduct, and of the compassion which the Lyonsese had excited. "This morning," said he, "I was forced to employ circumlocutions in order to cause the death of titutors to be approved of. They wept, they wished to know whether they were killed by the first blow—the first blow—indeed—the counter-revolutionists! and was Chalier killed by the first blow?" Yes, pray inquire, said I to the convention, how those men died who were covered with the blood of our brethren? If they were not dead you would not be deliberating here! Well, they could hardly comprehend this language, they could not bear to hear mention made of dead men, they knew not how to defend themselves from shadows." Then adverting to Ronsin, Collot d'Herbois added, that this general had shared every danger with the patriots in the south, that he had there braved with him the dusters of the aristocrats, and displayed the greatest firmness in making the authority of the republic respected, that at this very moment all the aristocrats were rejoicing at his arrest, as they regarded this occurrence as a source of hope for themselves. "What then has Ronsin done to be arrested?" exclaimed Collot, "I have asked every body this question, but none could tell me." On the day after this sitting, the 3rd Divise, Collot returning to the charge, communicated the death of Gullud the patriot, who seeing that the convention seemed to disapprove of the energy displayed at Lyons, had died by his own hand. "Was I wrong," exclaimed Collot, "when I told you that the patriots would be driven to despair, if the public spirit were to fall to so low an ebb as this?"

Thus, while the two leaders of the ultra revolutionists were imprisoned, their partisans were bestirring themselves in their behalf. The clubs and the convention were annoyed by appeals in their favour, and even a member of the committee of public welfare, involved in their sanguinary system, defended them in order to justify himself. Then adventures began, on their part, to infuse the greatest energy into their attacks. Philippeau, returned from La Vendée, in the plenitude of his indignation against the staff of Sumin, desired that the committee of public welfare, identifying itself with his anger, should prosecute Rossignol, Ronsin, and others, and imagined that he saw a treasonable intention in the failure of the plan of the campaign of the 2nd of September. We have already seen what a jumble there was of mutual reproaches, misconceptions, and incompatibilities of character, in the conduct of that war. Rossignol and the staff of Sumin had been retorted by ill temper, but had not committed treason. The committee, in expressing disapproval of their conduct, could not visit them with a condemnation which would have been neither just or politic. Robespierre recommended an amicable explanation, but Philippeau, in the irritability of his temper, published a virulent pamphlet, in which he gave a narrative of the whole war, in which were numerous errors, mixed up with no small share of truth. This publication could not fail of producing the most lively sensation, for it attacked the most decided revolutionists, and charged them with the most odious treasons. "What has Ronsin done?" said Philippeau. "He has been party to many an intrigue, he has committed many a robbery, and uttered many a falsehood. His only expedition is that of the 18th of September, when he overwhelmed forty five thousand patriots by three thousand brigands. It is that fatal battle of Coron, when, after placing our artillery in a narrow pass at the head of a column having a flank of six leagues, he hid himself in a stable, like a cowardly rascal, two leagues from the field of battle, while our unfortunate comrades were mowed down by their own guns." In this pamphlet, Philippeau, it is very evident, was not very delicate in his expressions. Unfortunately for him, the committee of public welfare, whom he ought to have engaged in his interests, was not treated with very great consideration. Philippeau, dissatisfied at not seeing his own indignation responded to by the public, seemed to impute to the committee some of those faults with which he reproached Ronsin, and even made use of this offensive expression. If ye have been no more than mistaken.

This pamphlet, as we have just observed, produced a great sensation. Camille Desmoulins was not acquainted with Philippeau, but pleased to find that in La Vendée the ultra revolutionists had been quite as much abused as in Paris, and not suspecting that anger had so blinded Philippeau as to make him convert faults into treason, he read his pamphlet with avidity, admired his courage, and, in his natural but pointed manner, he said to every body, "Have you read Philippeau? you must read Philippeau." Every body, in his opinion, ought to have read that publication, which demonstrated the perils to which the republic had been subjected at the hands of the revolutionary exaggeratists.

Camille had a great regard for Danton, and Danton for him. Both of them conceived that, as the republic was saved by the late victories, it was time to put an end to cruelties no longer necessary, that these barbarities, if persevered in, would certainly compromise the revolution, and that no one, save the foreign foe, could desire or promote their continuation. Camille conceived the idea of publishing a new journal, which he entitled The Old Cordelier, for he and Danton were the elders of that celebrated club. His paper was directed against all the new revolutionists who wished to overthrow and go beyond the oldest and most tried revolutionists. Never had this writer, the most remarkable the revolution produced, and one of the most natural and witty in our language, displayed such grace, originality, and even eloquence. His first number (15th Frimaire) commenced thus. "O Pitt! I pay homage to thy genius! What new arrivals from France into England have given thee such excellent advice, and furnished thee with such sure means of running my country? Thou hast seen that thou shouldst unceasingly fail of succeeding against her, if thou didst not do thy very utmost to run in the public opinion those who for these five years have been thwarting all thy projects. Thou hast been brought to understand that it is those who have already conquered thee that it would behoove thee to conquer; that it would behoove thee to accuse of corruption those very persons whom thou hast never been able to corrupt, and of lukewarmness those whom thou never couldst render lukewarm. I have opened my eyes," added Desmoulins; "I have seen the number of our enemies; their multitude tears me from the Hôtel des Invalides, and hurries me back to the fight. I am forced to write; I must throw aside the slow pencil of the history of the revolution, which I was tracing by the fireside, to take up the rapid and panting pen of the journalist, and to follow at full gallop the revolutionary torrent. A consulting deputy, whom nobody has consulted since the 3rd of June, I sally forth from my closet and my arm-chair, where I have had abundant leisure to follow even into the minutest details the new system adopted by our enemies."

Camille extolled Robespierre to the skies for his conduct at the Jacobins, and for the generous services which he had rendered to the old patriots; and he expressed himself as follows relative to religion and the proscriptions.

"The human mind diseased," said he, "finds relief from the bed haunted by the dreams of superstition; and when one sees the festivals and the processions that are ordained, the altars and the shrines that are raised, it seems as if it were only the bed of the sick person that is changed,—it is merely taking the pillow of the hope of another life from under him. For my part, I said the same thing on the very day that I saw Gobel come to the bar, with his crucifix and his crossier, which were borne in triumph before the philosopher Anaxagoras*. If it were not a crime of lese-majesty to suspect a president of the Jacobins and a procurator of the commune, such as Cloutz and Chaumette, I should be tempted to believe that, when intelligence was received from Barrère, La Vendée is no more! the king of Prussia exclaimed with sorrow, All our efforts, then, will fail against the republic, since that nucleus, La Vendée, is destroyed! and that the crafty Lucchesini, in order to console him, made this reply: Invincible hero, I have hit upon an expedient. Let me do it. I will pay some priests to confess themselves impostors. I will inflame the patriotism of others to make a similar declaration. There are in Paris two famous patriots, who will be well adapted, by their talents, their exaggeration, and by their notorious opinions of religion, to second us and to receive our impressions. Doubtless all we have to do is to make our friends in France act in concert with the two great philosophers, Anacharsis and Anaxagoras; to stir up their bile, and to dazzle their vision by the rich spoil of the sacrifices. (I hope that Chaumette will not complain of this number; the Marquis de Lucchesini could not speak of him in more distinguished terms.) Anacharsis and Anaxagoras will imagine that they are putting their shoulders to the wheel of the chariot of reason, whereas it will be to that of counter-revolution; and presently, instead of leaving popery ready to draw its last breath, to expire in France of old age and inanition, I pledge myself, by the aid of persecution and intolerance against those who are determined to mass and to be massed, to send off abundance of recruits to Lescaure and Larochejaquelein."

Camille then relating what occurred in the time of the Roman emperors, and pretending to give nothing else than a translation of Tacitus, made a terrific allusion to the law of the suspected. "In old time," said he, "there was at Rome, according to Tacitus, a law declaratory of those crimes of state and of lese-majesty that were capital. These crimes of lese-majesty, under the republic, can be classed under four denominations. Where an army had been abandoned in an enemy's country; where seditions had been excited; where the members of the constituted bodies misconducted the public administration or the public money; or where the majesty of the Roman people had been brought into contempt. The emperors needed but a few additional articles to this law to involve the citizens, nay, whole cities, in a proscription. Augustus was the first to stretch this law of lese-majesty, by including therein publications which he termed counter-revolutionary. These forced interpretations soon became illimitable. So soon as words had become state offences, there was but one step more to convert mere looks, sorrow, compassion, sighs, even silence itself, into criminal acts.

* The name that Chaumette had adopted.

"Soon afterwards it was considered a crime of lese-majesty, or of counter-revolution, in the city of Nursia to have erected a monument to those inhabitants who had fallen during the siege of Modena; a crime of counter-revolution in Libo Drusus to have asked the fortune-tellers whether he should not some day possess great wealth; a crime of counter-revolution in Crenutius Cordus, the journalist, for having called Brutus and Cassius the last of the Romans; a crime of counter-revolution in one of the descendants of Cassius to have in his house a statue of his ancestor; a crime of counter-revolution in Marcus Scaurus, to have written a tragedy containing a certain verse to which a double sense might be applied; a crime of counter-revolution in Torquatus Silius to live in an expensive style; a crime of counter-revolution in Petreius to have dreamt of Claudius; a crime of counter-revolution in Pomponius, because a friend of Sejanus had sought an asylum in one of his villas; a crime of counter-revolution to complain of the calamities of the time, for that was bringing the government in question; a crime of counter-revolution not to invoke the Divine Spirit of Caligula. For having failed in the observance of these articles, a great number of citizens had their flesh torn with rods, were condemned to the mines, or exposed to wild beasts, and some even were sawed asunder; lastly, it was a crime of counter-revolution in the mother of Fusius Germinius, the consul, to have wept for the melancholy death of her son.

"It was absolutely necessary to manifest joy at the death of a friend, or a relative, unless one wished to be exposed to the same fate.

"Every thing gave umbrage to the tyrant. If a citizen possessed popularity, he was a rival of the prince, and might stir up civil war: studia civium in se verteret, et si multi idem audeant, bellum esse. SUSPECTED.

"If, on the contrary, any one shunned popularity, and kept to his chimney corner; this secluded life has made you remarkable. It has given you consideration. Quanto metu occultior, tanto plus famâ adeptus. SUSPECTED.

"Were you rich, there was imminent danger that the people might be corrupted by your largesses. Auri rim aliquo opes Plauti, principi infensus. SUSPECTED.

"Were you poor; how then? invincible emperor! That man must be the more closely watched. No one is so enterprising as he that hath nothing to lose: Syllum inopem, unde præcipuum audaciam. SUSPECTED.

"Were you of a gloomy, melancholy disposition, or carelessly dressed; the cause of your distress was because public affairs went well. Hominem publicis bonis næstum. SUSPECTED."

Camille-Desmoulins thus pursued this masterly enumeration of suspected persons, and sketched a terrific picture of what was doing at Paris, by what had been done in Rome. If the letter of Philippeau had excited a strong sensation, the journal of Camille-Desmoulins produced a much greater. Fifty thousand copies of each of his numbers were sold in a few days. The provinces took large quantities of them. The prisoners procured them by stealth, and read with delight, and perhaps with some feeling of hope, the writings of that revolutionist who had formerly been so hateful in their eyes. Camille, without desiring that the prisons should be thrown open, or the revolution be stayed in its progress, called for the institution of a committee, to be called the committee of clemency, who should review the cause of detention of every prisoner, and should set at liberty those citizens who were confined without sufficient cause shown, and should stop the further effusion of blood in that quarter where it had flowed too freely already.

The publications of Philippeau and Desmoulins irritated the zealous revolutionists in the highest degree, and were disapproved of by the Jacobins. Hébert denounced them there with the utmost rage; he even moved that the names of their authors should be struck off the list of the club. Moreover, he named Bourdon of the Oise, and Fabre d'Eglantine, as the accomplices of Camille-Desmoulins, and Philippeau. We have already observed, that Bourdon had attempted, in concert with Goupilleau, to displace Rossignol: he was involved in a quarrel with the staff of Saumur, and had never ceased, when in the convention, to accuse Rousin's party. It was this that caused him to be associated with Philippeau. Fabre was accused of being art and part in the affair of the fabricated decree, and people were disposed to believe this, though he had been justified by Chabot. Being fully sensible of his perilous situation, and having every thing to fear from the over-severe system that prevailed, he had spoken twice or thrice, advocated a more indulgent system, had broken off with the ultra-revolutionists, and been treated as an intriguer by the Péro Duchesne newspaper. The Jacobins, without adopting the violent motion of Hébert, resolved that Philippeau, Camille-Desmoulins, Bourdon of the Oise, and Fabre d'Eglantine, should appear at the bar of the club, to explain themselves in regard to their publications, as well as their speeches in the convention.

The sitting at which they were to appear drew an immense concourse of people. Seats were violently contended for, and some seats were even sold as high as twenty-five francs. Philippeau, though he was not a member of the society, did not refuse to appear at its bar, and repeated the charges which he had already publicly avowed, whether it were in his correspondence with the committee of public welfare, or in his pamphlet. He was no more sparing of individuals on the present occasion than he had been before, and on two or three occasions he deliberately and provokingly gave Hébert the lie. These bold personalities of Philippeau began to agitate the society, and the sitting was becoming stormy, when Danton observed that it required the closest attention and the greatest composure to judge of so serious a question; that he himself had not formed any opinion concerning Philippeau and the truth of his accusations; that he had already said to him himself, "Thou must either prove thy charges, or lay thy head down on the scaffold;" that perhaps there was nothing in fault here but the events themselves; but that, at any rate, it was right that every one should be heard, and above all, he listened to.

Robespierre, speaking after Danton, said that he had not read Philippeau's pamphlet, indeed all he knew was, that in that pamphlet the committee were made responsible for the loss of twenty thousand men; that the committee had no time to answer libels and to engage in a paper war; that he nevertheless did not conceive Philippeau to be guilty of any bad intentions, but was hurried away by his passions. "I do not pretend," said Robespierre, "to impose silence on the conscience of my colleague; but let him commune with himself, and judge whether he hath not in himself vanity or some other petty passion. I dare say he is hurried along as much by patriotism as by passion; but let him reflect! let him consider the conflict in which he is about to engage! He will see that the moderatists will take up his defence; that the aristocrats will range themselves on his side; that the convention itself will be divided; that there will perhaps arise an opposition party, (in itself a most disastrous circumstance,) who will again embroil the fray from which it has sprung, and give new life to the conspiracies which it has cost us so much trouble to put down." He therefore exhorted Philippeau to examine his secret motives, and the Jacobins to listen to him in silence.

Nothing could be more reasonable and more appropriate than Robespierre's observations, with the exception of the tone, which was always emphatic and magisterial, particularly ever since he had borne away at the Jacobins. Philippeau again resumed his declaration, renewed the same personalities, and caused the same confusion. Danton, who had lost all patience, exclaimed that the best way would be to cut short such quarrels, and to appoint a commission to examine into the particulars of the allegations. Couthon said that even before resorting to that measure, it would be worth while to ascertain whether the question was worth that trouble, and whether it might not be merely a question between man and man; and he moved that Philippeau should be interrogated whether in his soul and conscience he believed that there had been treason. He then addressed Philippeau. "Dost thou believe," said he, "in thy soul and conscience that treason has been committed." "Yes," imprudently replied Philippeau. "In that case," rejoined Couthon, "there is but one course left. A commission ought to be appointed to hear both the recusers and the recusers, and to make its report to the society." The motion was carried, and the commission appointed to examine not only into the charges made by Philippeau, but also into the conduct of Boudon of the Oise, of Fabre d'Églantine, and of Camille Desmoulins.

This was the 3rd of Nivose (23rd of December). In the interval of the time employed by the commission in drawing up its report, the paper war and the recriminations continued without interruption. The Cordeliers expelled Camille Desmoulins from their society. They prepared fresh petitions on behalf of Ronsin and Vincent, and laid them before the Jacobins, for the purpose of inducing the latter to support them in the convention. That host of adventurers and vile charlatans with which the revolutionary army abounded, now presented themselves every where, in the public walks, the taverns, the coffee houses, and places of public amusement, with woollen epaulettes, and moustaches, and made a great noise in favour of Ronsin, then, general, and Vincent, their ministers. They were nicknamed the epauletiers, and were much dreaded in Paris. Ever since the passing of that enactment which forbade the sections to meet more than twice a week, they were converted into very turbulent popular societies. There were even two of these societies to a section, and it was to them that all the parties who had any interest in stirring up a popular commotion sent their agents. The epauletiers had not been deficient in their attendance on them, and the tumult that prevailed in almost all these assemblies was solely attributable to their presence.

Robespierre, who on every occasion returned his strong position at the Jacobins, caused the petition of the Cordeliers to be rejected, and what was more, caused the affiliation of all the popular societies formed since the 31st of May to be withdrawn. These were acts proceeding from a discreet and laudable energy. However, it was highly expedient that the committee, at the same time that it was making the greatest exertions to repress the turbulent faction, should cautiously abstain from holding out the slightest appearance of weakness and moderation. In order that it should retain its popularity and its strength, it was necessary that it should display the like severity against the contrary faction. This was the reason that on the 5th Nivose (25th December), Robespierre was commissioned to make a new report upon the principles of the revolutionary government, and to propose measures of severity against certain illustrious prisoners. As he was invariably induced, as well from political feeling as from misinformation, to cast [the blame of] all disorders upon the supposed foreign faction, so on this occasion he imputed it to the faults both of the moderatists and the exaggeratists. "The foreign courts," said he, "have vomited upon France the clever scoundrels whom they keep in their pay. They deliberate in our administrations, they introduce themselves into our sectional assemblies and our clubs, they have even sat in the national representation: they direct and for ever will direct the counter-revolution upon the same plan. They continually haunt us, they make themselves masters of our secrets, they flatter our passions, nay, they even seek to direct our very opinions." Robespierre, pursuing this train of ideas, exhibited them as alternately urging the people either to exaggeration or folly, as exciting a persecution against divine worship in Paris, and in La Vendée a rebellious fanaticism; as sacrificing Lepelletier and Marat, and then munging in every company to decree divine honours to them, for the very purpose of exposing them to ridicule and odium, as alternately giving to or withholding bread from the people, causing space to appear or disappear, and in short, taking advantage of every incident, with a view to apply them against the revolution and France. After having thus summed up all our calamities, Robespierre, who did not wish that they should seem the natural consequence of the state of things, imputed them to the foreign foe, who no doubt had reason to congratulate himself in that respect, but who in insuring their appearance, availed himself of the vicious propensities of human nature, and could not have attained the same object by mere conspiracies. Robespierre, regarding all the illustrious prisoners still in confinement as coadjutors of the allied powers, proposed to send them immediately before the revolutionary tribunal. Thus Dietrich, mayor of Strasbourg, Custine's son, Brion, and all the officers who were either friends of Dumouriez, Custine, or Houchard, were to be brought to trial without further delay. Most assuredly there was little need for a decree of the convention to ensure the sacrifice of these victims by the revolutionary tribunal, but this solicitude to hasten their execution was a proof that the government was not growing weaker. Robespierre proposed moreover to increase, by one third, the rewards in kind promised to the defenders of the country.

After this report, Barrère was directed to prepare a further report upon the arrests, which, as it was said, every day were becoming more and more numerous, and to propose means for adjudicating upon the causes of these arrests. The object of this report was to reply, but without appearing so to do, to the "Old Cordelier" of Camille Desmoulins, and to his proposal for a committee of clemency. Barrère animadverted with great severity upon translations of the orators of old, but nevertheless suggested the appointment of a commission to adjudicate upon the causes of the arrests, which very nearly resembled the committee of clemency devised by Camille. However, upon the observations of some of the members, the convention deemed it right to adhere to its previous decrees, which required the revolutionary committees to furnish the committee of general welfare with the causes of the arrests, and allowed prisoners to make their petitions to this latter committee.

The government thus steered its course between the two parties that were now forming, secretly inclining to the moderate party, but constantly apprehensive lest this tendency should be too perceptible. In the meantime, Camille published a number still more severe than the former, and which was addressed to the Jacobins. It was intitled, "My Defence," and it was the boldest and most terrible recrimination against his adversaries.

On the subject of the erasure of his name from the Cordeliers, he said, "Pardon, brethren and friends, if I still venture to take the title of Old Cordelier, after the resolution of the club, which forbids me to deck myself with that name. But in truth it is a piece of insolence so unheard of, that of a grand-child revolting against its grand-sire, and forbidding him to use his own name, that I must plead this cause against those ungateful sons. I should like to know to whom the name ought to belong, whether to the grand-papa or to the children whom he has begotten, not a tenth part of whom he has ever acknowledged, or even known, but who assume to drive him from the paternal home?"

He then enters into an explanation of his opinions. "The vessel of the republic is being navigated between two sunken rocks, the rock of exaggeratism, and the sandbank of moderatism. Seeing that Père Duchêne and almost all the patriotic sentinels were on deck, glass in hand, solely occupied on the look out, and shouting, 'There! avast! you are running aground upon moderatism!' it suited well with my position as an old Cordelier and elder of the Jacobins, that I should take upon myself to keep a careful watch, and which none of the younger men would undertake, lest they should injure their popularity, that of crying out, 'There! avast! you will strike upon exaggeratism!' and this is the obligation which all my colleagues in the convention ought to feel that they owe me, that of having risked my popularity itself, in order to save the ship in which my cargo was not greater than their own."

He then justified himself for this expression, with which he had been so frequently reproached: Vincent Pitt goes on George Bouchotte, "I certainly did," said he, "in 1787 call Louis XVI 'my fat booby of a king,' without being bastilled (embastillé) for it. Could Bouchotte be a more important personage?"

He then reviewed his adversaries; to Collot-Dherbois he said, that if he, Desmoulins, had his Dillan, he, Collot, had his Brunet and his Prou, both of whom he had defended. He said to Barère, "People no longer know one another at the Mountain, if it had been an old Cordelier, like myself, an upright (rectiligne) patriot, Billaud-Varennes for example, who had scolded me so severely, sustinuissent utique, I would have said, it is the box on the ear given by the impetuous St Paul to the good St Peter, who has transgressed. But thou, my dear Barrière, thou, the happy guardian of Pamela* thou, the president of the Feuillants! thou who hast proposed the committee of twelve! thou who, on the 2nd of June, didst in the committee of public welfare, move the question whether Danton should be arrested! thou, many more of whose faults I could reveal, if I were to rummage the old sack, (le vieux sac), that thou shouldst all at once shout out Robespierre! Robespierre! and that I should be so hardly apostrophized by thee!"

"All this is but a domestic squabble," adds Camille, "between my friends, the patriots Collot and Barrière, but I shall in my turn put myself into a thundering passion (bouffement en colère)*, with Père Duchêne, who styles me a paltry villain, intriguer, a scoundrel who would bring me to the guillotine, a conspirator who wishes the prisons to be opened in order to make a new Vendée of them, a spy in the pay of Pitt, a long eared jack ass: WAIT FOR ME, HÉBERT, AND I WILL BE WITH THEE IN A MOMENT. Here it is not with coarse abuse and mere words that I shall attack thee, it is with facts."

Camille, who had been accused by Hébert of having married a wealthy woman, and of dining with aristocrats, then narrated the circumstances of his marriage, which had brought him an income of four thousand livres, and he drew a picture of his simple, retired, and easy life. Then, returning again to Hébert, he called to mind his former occupation of check taker, and his thefts, which had driven him from the theatre, his sudden and well-known source of wealth, and covered him with the most deserved opprobrium. He narrated and showed how Bouchotte had paid Hébert out of the funds of the war department, first one hundred and twenty thousand francs, then ten, then sixty thousand, for the copies of Père Duchêne distributed among the armies; that these same copies were not worth more than sixteen thousand francs, and that consequently the nation had been defrauded of the surplus.

"Two hundred thousand francs!" exclaimed Camille, "to that poor sans culotte Hébert, for supporting the motions of Prou and of Clootz! two hundred thousand francs for calumniating Danton, Landet, Cuzon, Thuriot, Lucioir, Philippeau, Boudon of the Osse, Barrias, Fréron, d'Eglantine, Legendre, Camille-Desmoulins, and almost all the commissioners of the Convention! for inundating France with his writings, so well adapted to form the mind and the heart! two hundred thousand francs from Bouchotte! Can any body, after this, be surprised at Hébert's final exclamation at the sitting of the Jacobins To dare to attack Bouchotte! — Bouchotte, who has placed sans culotte generals at the head of the armies! — Bouchotte, so pure a patriot! All I am astonished at is, that in the transports of his gratitude, Père Duchêne did not exclaim Bouchotte, who has given me two hundred thousand livres since the month of June."

"Thou talkest to me," proceeds Camille, "of my associations, but does not every body know that it is with Kock the banker, the intimate friend of Dumouriez, and with the wife of Rochecouart, the agent for the emigrants, that Hébert, this patriot of note, after having slandered in his paper the purest men of the republic, goes, to his great delight, both himself and his Jacqueline, to spend the most pleasant part of summer in the country, to drink Pitt's wine, and to drink bumpers to the ruin of the reputation of the founders of liberty?"

Camille next reproaches Hébert with the style of his paper. "Knowest thou not, Hébert, that when the tyrants of Europe wish to make their slaves believe that France is covered with the darkness of the barbarous ages, that Paris, that town so celebrated for its attic wit and its taste, is peopled with Vandals; knowest thou not, wretch, that it is but cuttings from thy papers that they insert in their gazettes? as if the people were as ignorant as thou wouldst make Mr. Pitt believe, or as if they could not be addressed except in language so gross; as if that were the dialect of the convention and of the committee of public welfare; or as if thy obscenities were identified with the nation; or as if a sewer of Paris were the Seine."

Camille then accuses him of having advocated, through the numbers of his publication, the horrible scandal of the worship of reason, and afterwards exclaims: "Is it, then, this base sycophant, who has for his wages two hundred thousand livres, that shall reproach me with my wife's income of four thousand livres? Is it this intimate friend of the Kocks, the Rochechouarts, and a score of other rascals, that shall reproach me with my associations? Is it this insensate or perfidious scribbler that shall reproach me with my aristocratic writings?—he, too, whose papers I will prove to be the delight of Coblenz and the only hope of Pitt! Shall that man, struck out of the list of the servants of the theatre for his robberies, cause to be struck off the list of the Jacobins, for mere matter of opinion, those deputies who are the immortal founders of the republic? Is this writer for the shambles to be the arbiter of opinion—the mentor of the French people?"

"Let them despair," adds Camille-Desmoulins, "of ever intimidating me by the terrors and the rumours of my arrest, which they are disseminating around me! We know that there were villains who conspired on the 31st of May against the most energetic members of the Mountain! O my colleagues, I shall say to you, as Brutus did to Cicero: We have too great a fear of death, exile, and poverty. Nimum timeamus mortem et exilium et paupertatem. What! when twelve hundred thousand Frenchmen are every day boldly storming redoubts bristling with the most murderous artillery, and fly from victory to victory, shall we deputies to the convention—we who can never fall like the soldier, in the obscurity of night, shot in the dark, and without a witness of his bravery—we, whose death in the cause of liberty cannot be other than glorious and solemn, as suffered in the face of the whole nation, of Europe, and of posterity—shall we be more cowardly than our soldiers? shall we be afraid to look Bouchotte in the face? shall we not dare to brave the fierce wrath of Père Duchêne, so that we should also obtain that victory which the people expect from us, the victory over the ultra-revolutionists as well as over the counter-revolutionists; the victory over all the intriguers, all the rogues, all the ambitious, and over every one of the enemies of the common weal.

"Does any one believe that even upon the scaffold, supported by that intensity of feeling with which I have passionately loved my country and the republic, and that crowned with the esteem and the regret of all true republicans, I would put my fate in comparison with the fortune of that miserable wretch Hébert, who in his paper is urging twenty classes of citizens to revolt and to despair; who in order to escape from his remorse and his slanders, must fly to some intoxication greater than wine can induce, and be incessantly licking the blood at the foot of the guillotine! What is then the scaffold for a patriot any thing else than the pedestal of the Sidneys and the John de Witts? What is it in this time of war, wherein I have had my two brothers cut to pieces in the cause of liberty—what else is the guillotine more than the stroke of a sabre, and the most glorious of all for a deputy, the victim of his courage and of his republicanism?"

These pages will convey an idea of the manners of the time. The roughness, the sternness, the eloquence of Rome and Athens had re-appeared among us together with democratic liberty.

This new number of Camille-Desmoulins' paper caused a still greater ferment than its predecessors. Hébert did not cease to denounce him at the Jacobins, and to call for the report of the commission. At length, on the 16th Nivose, Collot d'Herbois addressed the Assembly upon that report. The concourse was as great as on the day when the discussion was first opened, and seats were sold at quite as high a price. Collot showed more impartiality than one could have expected from a friend of Ronsin. He reprimanded Philippeau for implicating the committee of public welfare in his accusations; for evincing the most favourable inclinations towards suspected persons; for speaking of Biron in an enlogistic manner, while he assailed Rossignol with abuse; and lastly, for exhibiting precisely the same preferences as the aristocrats. He brought forward another charge against him, which, under the circumstances, had some weight; and this was, that in his last publication, he had withdrawn the accusations pointed against General Fabre-Fond, the brother of Fabre d'Eglantine. Philippeau, who in point of fact had no acquaintance with either Fabre or Camille, had denounced the brother of the former, whom he conceived he had found deficient in his duty in La Vendée. Once brought into contact with Fabre by his position, and accused with him, he had, from a very natural regard, suppressed the allegations relative to his brother. This alone would prove that they had been led separately, and without knowing one another, to act as they had done, and that they formed no substantive faction. But party spirit came to a different conclusion; and Collot insinuated that there existed a secret intrigue, and a communication between the persons accused of moderation. He ransacked the past, and reproached Philippeau with his votes upon Louis XVI. and upon Marat. As for Camille, he treated him much more favourably. He represented him as a good patriot, led astray by evil associations, whom they ought to forgive, provided he at the same time promised not to indulge in any such exuberance of wit for the future. He therefore proposed the expulsion of Philippeau, and the simple and mere reprimand of Camille.

At this moment Camille, who was present at the sitting, caused a letter to be handed to the president, declaring that his defence was contained in his last number, and requesting that the society would permit the contents to be read. On this proposition, Hébert, who dreaded the reading of that number, wherein the shameful actions of his past life were publicly stated, addressed the society, and said that there was an evident intention to confuse the discussion by calumniating himself, and that to divert attention, it had been alleged that he had robbed the treasury, which was an atrocious falsehood. "I have the evidences in my hands," exclaimed Camille. These words caused a great disturbance. Robespierre the younger then said, that all personal discussions should be excluded; that the society had not met to enter into matters that merely concerned private character, and that if Hébert had been a thief, the society could not notice that fact; that those who had reason to reproach themselves, ought not to interrupt the general discussion. At these expressions, which were far from satisfactory, Hébert exclaimed, "I have nothing to reproach myself with!" "The disturbances in the departments," resumed Robespierre the younger, "are thy work; it is thou who hast contributed to excite them by impugning religious toleration." To this charge Hébert made no reply. Robespierre the elder then spoke, and keeping himself more within bounds than his brother, but without being a whit more favourable to Hébert, said that Collot had put the question in its proper point of view; that an unfortunate incident had disturbed the dignity of the discussion; that every one was to blame, not only Hébert, but all those who had replied to him. "What I am about to say," added he, "is not pointed against any one individual. He who is himself a calumniator, comes with a very bad grace to make his complaint against those who calumniate him. Those, therefore, who have condemned others in haste and with precipitation and rage ought not to complain of injustice. Let every one tax his own conscience, and apply these reflections to himself. I had wished to prevent the present discussion. It was also my desire, that in private interviews, and in friendly conferences, each one should explain himself, and confess his errors. Then folks can understand one another, and scandal can be dispensed with. But there is nothing of the sort here. Pamphlets have been issued the day after, with the express purpose of creating a sensation. Now, all that concerns us in all these personal quarrels, is not to know whether angry feelings and injustice have not been exhibited on all sides; but whether the charges preferred by Philippeau against the men to whom the most important of our wars are confided are well founded. This is what ought to be ascertained, for the benefit, not of the individuals, but of the republic."

Robespierre, in fact, thought that there was no object in discussing the charges of Camille against Hébert, for everybody knew how capable they were of proof; moreover, they contained nothing that the republic had an interest in verifying; but that, on the contrary, it was of great importance to throw some light upon the conduct of the generals in La Vendée. In point of fact, the debate relative to Philippeau was continued. The sitting was entirely devoted to the examination of a great number of eye-witnesses; but amidst their contradictory affirmations, Danton and Robespierre declared that they did not see their way; and that they did not know what to think of the matter. The discussion, which was already very protracted, was adjourned to the next sitting.

On the 18th the sitting was resumed. Philippeau was absent. As every body was jaded with the discussion concerning him, and which disclosed nothing; the society next went upon the affair of Camille-Desmoulins. He was called upon to explain himself as to the praises he had bestowed on Philippeau, and his connexion with him. Camille professed that he was utterly unacquainted with him; Camille had been at first induced to believe from facts adduced to him by Goupilleau and Bourdon, that Philippeau had stated nothing but what was true, and these facts had raised his indignation, but on the present occasion, when he saw upon discussing the matter, that Philippeau had distorted the truth, (an impression which universally obtained,) he retracted his approbation, and declared that he had no longer any opinion on this subject.

Robespierre, again speaking upon the question as concerned Camille, repeated what he had already said concerning him, that although he bore a high character, yet that this generally approved character did not justify him in writing against the patriots; that in fact, his publications were, as it were, devoured by the aristocrats, who were delighted with them, and consequently they had a great sale in every one of the departments; that he had translated Tacitus without understanding him; that he ought to be treated like a thoughtless child playing with edge tools and making bad use of them; that he must undertake to quit the aristocrats and the bad company that had seduced him; and that, although they forgave him, they ought at least to burn his publications. Camille, throwing aside those terms of conventional respect which he ought in prudence to have kept towards the haughty Robespierre, then cried out from his place: "Burning is not answering."—"Well then," resumed the irritated Robespierre, "we won't burn, but we'll answer. Let Camille's publications be immediately read, more especially as he will have it so; let him be covered with ignominy; let not the society restrain its indignation, since he persists in maintaining his diatribes and his dangerous principles. The man who so pertinaciously adheres to his perfidious writings is perhaps more than misled. Had he meant well, if he had written in the simplicity of his heart, he would not have ventured to stand up any longer in favour of works condemned by the patriots, and sought after by the counter-revolutionists. His is but an assumed courage; it reveals the anonymous persons under whose dictation Camille has written his newspaper; it demonstrates that he is the organ of a villainous faction, that has borrowed his pen to circulate its poison with greater boldness and certainty." Camille in vain begged to be allowed to speak, that he might pacify Robespierre; but they refused to hear him, and immediately began to read his papers. Whatever conventional forms of good breeding individuals observe towards one another in political squabbles, it is not long before self-esteem is involved. With the susceptibility of Robespierre, and the simple unreflecting disposition of Camille, the division of opinions was not long before it became a conflict between self-esteem and hatred. Robespierre despised Hébert and his partisans too much to ever embroil himself with them; but he was well enough inclined to contend with a writer so celebrated in the revolution as Camille-Desmoulins; and the latter did manage matters so adroitly as to prevent an open rupture.

The reading of Camille's numbers took up two entire sittings. They next proceeded to deal with Fabre. They interrogated him, and called upon him to say what part he had had in the new publications recently circulated. He replied, not one single stroke, and that so far as concerned Philippeau and Bourdon of the Oise, he could safely say he knew them not. At length they desired to declare themselves with respect to the four denounced individuals. Robespierre, although no longer disposed to deal gently with Camille, moved that the debate should not be further proceeded with, and that the society should next consider a far more important matter, a subject more worthy of its attention, and of greater service to the public feeling, namely, the vices and crimes of the English government. "That atrocious government," said he, "conceals, under some appearance of liberty, the principles of despotism and an atrocious Machiavelism; we ought to denounce it to its own subjects, and to reply to its calumnies by demonstrating its faulty organization and its misdeeds." This subject was completely according to the taste of the Jacobins, as it opened so vast a field to their accusing imagination; but some of them had rather that the names of Philippeau, Camille, Bourdon, and Fabre, were first struck off the list. One voice even accused Robespierre of arrogating to himself a sort of dictatorship. "My dictatorship," he exclaimed, "is that of Marat and Lepelletier; it consists in being exposed every day to the daggers of the tyrants. But I am weary of the dissonance daily exhibited in the body of the society, and which can produce no beneficial result. Our real enemies are the foreign powers; they are the parties we ought to pursue, and whose plots it behoves us to unveil." Robespierre consequently renewed his motion, and thereupon it was amidst applauses carried, that the society, setting aside the disputes which had arisen between individuals, should devote the succeeding sittings, without interruption, to the discussion of the vices of the English government.

This was indeed most seasonably turning the restless imagination of the Jacobins from their purpose, and directing their attention to a subject that was likely to occupy them for a considerable period. Philippeau had already gone away, without troubling himself about their decision. Camille and Bourdon were neither excluded or confirmed, their names were no longer mentioned, and they contented themselves by withdrawing themselves from the club. As for Fabre d'Eglantine, notwithstanding Chabot had justified him, the facts which daily came to the knowledge of the committee of general welfare, left no doubt whatever of his guilty knowledge. The committee was therefore obliged to issue a warrant for his arrest, and to include him with Chabot, Bazire, Delaunay, and Julien of Toulouse.

All these discussions created an injurious impression against the new moderatists. There was not the slightest intelligence between them. Philippeau, at one time almost a Girondist, was not acquainted with either Camille, Fabre, or Bourdon; Camille was the only one who was upon an intimate footing with Fabre; as for Bourdon, he was an utter stranger to the other three. But an idea began now to gain ground, that there was a secret faction, of which these persons were either the necessities or the dupes. The happy disposition and the epicurean habits of Camille, and the circumstance of his twice or thrice dining with some of the wealthy financiers of the time, the evident participation of Fabre with the tricky stock-jobbers, and his recent wealth, caused it to be supposed that they were connected with the so-called corrupting faction. People durst not yet designate Danton as being its leader; but if he was not accused in a public manner, if Hébert in his paper, and the Cordeliers in their tribune, dealt gently with this powerful revolutionist, they said freely to one another what they dared not openly publish.

The person most injurious to the party was Lacroix, whose malversations in Belgium were so evident, that any one might well impute them to him without being deemed a libeller, and without his daring to reply. Common report associated him with the moderatists on account of his former connexion with Danton, and he was the cause of their being involved in his disgrace.

The Cordeliers, who were dissatisfied that the Jacobins had discharged the order of the day with respect to the denounced persons, resolved, 1, that Philippeau was a libeller; 2, that Bourdon, the pertinacious accuser of Ronsin, Vincent, and of the war-offices, no longer possessed their confidence, and in their eyes was none other than an accomplice of Philippeau; 3, that Fabre, who identified himself with the sentiments of Bourdon and Philippeau, was no more than an astute intriguer; 4, that Camille, already struck off their list, no longer possessed their confidence, although he had in former times rendered essential services to the revolution.

After Ronsin and Vincent had been for some time detained in prison, they were set at liberty, as they could not be committed for trial upon any distinct charge. There was no possibility of prosecuting Ronsin for his conduct in La Vendée, for the events of that war were covered by a thick veil; or for what he had done at Lyons, for that would raise a dangerous question, and at the same time accuse Collot d'Herbois, and the entire system of government as it then existed. It was quite as impossible to prosecute Vincent for certain despotic proceedings in the war offices. There was no bringing either of them to any other than a political trial, and the time had not arrived for their being subjected to such a procedure. They were therefore enlarged*, to the great joy of the Cordeliers, and of all the épauletiers of the revolutionary army.

Vincent was a young man of twenty and some odd years, a sort of madman, whose illusions were of a morbid character, and in whom insanity, or rather personal ambition, was predominant. One day when his wife, who was visiting him in his confinement, told him the news respecting himself, being highly irritated at what she told him, he pounced upon a piece of raw meat, and said while he devoured it, "I will in this way devour all those wretches!" Ronsin, who had been at difficult times a second rate pamphleteer, a contractor, and general, combined with considerable intelligence, remarkable courage and great activity. Naturally disposed to amplify every thing, he was the most distinguished of those adventurers who had offered themselves as instruments of the new government. As commander of the revolutionary army, he considered how to make the best of his situation, either as offering advantages to himself, his friends, or in aid of the triumph of that state of things to which he belonged. He and Vincent, when in prison together, had always talked with an air of superiority, they were always saying that they should triumph over intrigue, that they should be released by the aid of their patriots, that they, themselves, should go and enlarge the imprisoned patriots, and should send all the other prisoners to the guillotine. They had craved great usefulness to those unfortunate men who were then fellow prisoners, and left them in utter consternation.

They had scarcely been set at liberty, when they loudly declared that they would be revenged, and that they would demand satisfaction of their enemies. The committee of public welfare could scarcely have done otherwise than release them, but the committee was soon made aware that they had let loose two fiends, and that they must be put out of the power of committing mischief. There now remained at Paris four thousand men belonging to the revolutionary army. Among these were to be found adventurers, thieves, and *Septembriseurs, who assumed the mask of patriotism, and who had much rather stay at home and commit spoils in the interior, than go to the frontiers to lead a life of privation, hardship, and danger. These petty tyrants, with their moustaches and their enormous sabres, practised the most intolerable arrogance in places of public resort. Being provided with artillery, ammunition, and an enterprising commander, they were in a situation to become dangerous. With these were associated the bravos who filled the offices in Vincent's department. The latter was then civil, as Ronsin was then military commander. There was a constant intercourse maintained between them and the commune through Hébert, and the deputy Chrumette, as well as Pache the mayor, who was ever ready to pay his court to every party, and to fawn upon those he dreaded. Momoro, one of the presidents of the Cordeliers, was their faithful partisan and advocate at the Jacobins. Thus Ronsin, Vincent, Hébert, Chrumette, and Momoro, all went together, and Pache and Bouchotte were added to the list, as time-serving adherents, who permitted them to usurp the two great authorities.

Already had these men shown their inability to express themselves in limited terms against those representatives who, as they said, designed to keep the supreme power for ever in their hands, and to spare the aristocrats. One day, when they were dining at Pache's, they there met with Legendre, a friend of Danton, formerly the imitator of his vehemence, and who now affected his reserve, and became the victim of following his example in that respect, for he became the object of the attacks which no one ventured to point at Danton himself. Ronsin and Vincent addressed offensive expressions to him. Vincent, who had been under obligations to him, embraced him, saying that he embraced the old, and not the new Legendre, that the new Legendre had become a moderatist, and merited no man's approbation. Vincent then asked him ironically, whether, when upon his missions, he had worn the costume of a deputy. Legendre having answered him by saying that he had worn it when with the armies, Vincent added that this dress was very pompous, but unworthy of genuine republicans, that he should dress up a lay figure in that very costume, and call the people together, and should say to them "These are the representatives you have chosen, they talk to you of equality, and yet cover themselves with gold and feathers." He said that he should then burn the lay figure. Legendre then reprimanded him for his folly and sedition. They were now upon coming to blows, to the great alarm of Pache. Legendre having expressed a desire to address himself to Ronsin, who showed less temper, and having called upon him to restrain Vincent, Ronsin answered that Vincent was indeed rather warm, but that his character was adapted to circumstances, and that such men were necessary in the times in which they lived. "You live," added Ronsin, "a faction in the bosom of the assembly, if you do not cast it out we shall call you to account." Legendre left the place in high dudgeon, and repeated all that he had seen and heard at the entertainment. The conversation became generally known, and furnished a new proof of the audacity and frenzy of the two men who had been released from confinement.

There was expressed a very great respect for Pache and for his virtues, as the Jacobins had formerly done when Pache was minister. Pache, some how or other contrived to soothe all violent men by his mildness and complaisance. They were delighted to see their passions recognized by a man who had every appearance of wisdom. The new revolutionists intended, as they said, to make him an influential personage in their government, for without having any methodized intention, without even having matured the plan of, or yet possessing sufficient courage for an insurrection, they were incessantly talking, as all those plotters do who begin by trying their strength and venting their impudence in words. They publicly said, other institutions were now required. The only thing that satisfied them in the present organization of the government was the revolutionary tribunal and army. They had therefore devised a constitution, consisting of a supreme tribunal, over whom a chief judge was to preside, and a military council, under the direction of a commander in chief. Under this form of government, every thing was to be made the subject of a military-judicial administration. The commander in chief of the armies and the chief judge were to be the greatest personages. There was to be attached to the tribunal a high ex officio accuser, who was to possess the title of censor, from whom all prosecutions were to emanate. Thus, in this scheme, conceived in a moment of revolutionary delirium, the two essential, nay, the only practical duties to be performed by government were those of condemnation

tion and war. It is not worth while inquiring whether this plan originated in the reveries of an individual, or whether it were the concoction of many; whether it existed otherwise than as a mere theoretical conversation, or whether it had been committed to writing; but this much is certain, that its model was to be traced in the revolutionary commissions established at Lyons, Marseilles, Toulon, Bordeaux, Nantes, and that, with their imaginations fully occupied with what they had done in those great cities, these terrible executioners proposed to govern all France on the same plan, and to make the violence of a day the model of a permanent government. As yet they had only designated one of the persons designed for filling the highest situations. Pache was wonderfully fitted for the place of a chief judge; the conspirators therefore said that he ought to be the chief judge, and that he should be so. Without knowing what was the nature of the design, or what this place of chief judge meant, many persons repeated as a piece of news, "Pache is to be appointed chief judge." This report went its round without being either explained or understood. As for the dignity of a commander-in-chief, although Ronsin was general of the revolutionary army, he durst not make any pretensions to it, and his partisans did not venture to propose him, as a much more distinguished name was required for such a dignity. Chaumette was also hinted at by some as likely to be censor; but his name had not been very frequently uttered in connection with this report. Indeed, amongst these various rumours, only one could be said to be generally diffused, and that was, Pache is to be the chief judge.

Throughout the whole revolution, when the long excited passions of a party were ready to explode, it was always a defeat, a treason, a dearth, in short, some public calamity or other, that served as a pretext for the explosion. It was precisely the same in the present instance. The second law of the maximum, which, going further back than the retail shops, estimated the value of commodities at the very place of their manufacture, settled the price of carriage, regulated the profits of the wholesale dealer, as well as the retail dealer, had been passed; but commerce yet contrived to escape the despotism of the law in a thousand ways, and evaded it chiefly in a most mischievous way, namely, by suspending its operations. The restriction on the sale of goods was quite as great as before, and although they were no longer to be refused in exchange for the assignat, yet they were concealed, or no longer changed hands, nor were they sent to the places where there was a demand for them. The dearth was therefore very great, owing to this general stagnation of commerce. However, the extraordinary efforts of the government, and the labours of the commission for provisions, had partially succeeded in diminishing the scarcity of corn, and above all, in lessening the apprehensions of scarcity, a matter quite as formidable as the dearth itself, by reason of the disorder and confusion which it inflicts upon commercial relations. But a new calamity was beginning to be perceptibly felt, namely, the want of meat. The numerous herds that La Vendée had been used to send to the neighbouring provinces, no longer found their way to Paris, after the rebellion had commenced. The departments of the Rhine had also ceased to send cattle ever since they had been the seat of war; there was consequently a substantial diminution in the quantity. Besides all this, the butchers who bought cattle at a high price, and who were compellable to sell them at the maximum price, endeavoured to evade the law. The best meat was reserved for the rich, or for the citizen in easy circumstances, who could afford to pay well for it. A great number of close markets were established, especially in the environs of Paris, and in the country; and nothing but the offal was left for the lower classes, or for the purchaser who went to the shops and bargained for the maximum price. Thus the butchers indemnified themselves by the inferior quality for the low price at which they were obliged to sell. The people complained bitterly of the weight, the quality, the *réjouissances, and the close markets established in the neighbourhood of Paris. As there was a scarcity of beasts, it had been found necessary to kill cows in calf. The populace then immediately said that the aristocrat butchers intended to destroy the species, and demanded the penalty of death against those who should kill cows in calf, and ewes in lamb. But this was not all. Vegetables, fruit, eggs, butter, and fish, were no longer brought to market. A cabbage cost twenty sous. People forestalled the waggons on the road, surrounded them, and bought their load at any price. Few of these waggons reached Paris, where the populace awaited them in vain. Wherever a thing is to be done, there are always plenty of persons ready enough to undertake it. People set about scouring the country, in order to forestall the farmers by the way as they brought vegetables to market. A multitude of men and women undertook this calling, and bought up provisions on account of the rich, by paying for them more than the maximum price. Were there a market better supplied than the others, these agents hurried thither and bore off the commodities at a higher rate than the fixed price. The populace were violently excited against those who followed this business. It was said, that among the number were many unfortunate women of the town, who had been deprived, by the measures adopted at the instigation of Chaumette, of their deplorable means of subsistence, and who, in order to earn a livelihood, had followed this new calling.

To remedy all those inconveniences, the commune had, on the reiterated solicitations of the sections, ordered that the butchers should no longer forestall the cattle, or go beyond the ordinary markets; that they should not kill anywhere but in the authorized slaughter-houses (abattoirs); that meat should be sold only in the shambles; that no person should any longer be permitted to forestall farmers by the way; that those who came in should be under the direction of the police, and should be equally distributed among the different markets; that people should go and take their stand at the butchers' doors before six o'clock, for it frequently happened that they rose at three for this purpose.

These multiplied regulations could not save the people from the evils which they were enduring. The ultra-revolutionists tortured their own imaginations to devise expedients. The last idea that had occurred to them, was, that the pleasure-grounds abounding in the suburbs of Paris, and particularly in the faubourg St. Germain, might be brought into cultivation. Thereupon the commune, who never refused them any thing, had immediately ordered that an account should be taken of these pleasure-grounds, and decided, that so soon as the list was made out, they should be planted with potatoes and culinary vegetables. They conceived, moreover, that as vegetables, milk, and poultry, were no longer brought to town, the cause of this was to be imputed to the aristocrats who had retired to their seats around Paris. In point of fact, a great number of persons who had taken the alarm, were concealed in their country houses. The sections came and proposed to the commune to pass a resolution, or to demand a law, compelling them to return. However, Chaumette feeling that this would be too odious a violation of personal liberty, contented himself with making a threatening speech against the aristocrats who had gone to reside in the neighbourhood of Paris. He merely exhorted them to return to town, and directed the village municipalities to keep an eye upon their motions.

In the meantime, the evil was at its height, and there was no restraining the irritation it produced. The confusion in the markets increased. Disturbances were raised there every moment. People waited their turn in the butchers' shops, and in spite of the prohibition to go thither before a certain hour, there was precisely the same anxiety exhibited to get before one another. They had there introduced a practice which had first been used at the doors of the bakers, and this was to fasten a cord that each one might lay hold of, and so secure his turn; but here, as it was at the bakers' shops, mischievous persons, or those who could not get a good place, cut the cord; in that case, a general confusion arose among the waiting crowd, and they were ready to come to blows.

After this, there was no knowing who was to blame. They could not, as before the 31st of May, complain that the convention refused a law of maximum, the thing of all most desired, for the convention did all that was required. In their inability to devise any thing, they no longer asked for anything; but still they could not help complaining. The épaulettiers, Bouchotte's clerks, and the Cordeliers, alleged that the cause of the dearth lay with the moderate faction in the convention; that Camille-Desmoulins, Philippeau, Bourdon of the Oise, and their friends, were the originators of the prevailing evils; that they could go on no longer, and that extraordinary means must be resorted to; and they added the old catch-word of all the insurrections, we want a leader. They then mysteriously whispered to one another: Paiche is to be chief judge.

However, though the new party had very considerable means at its disposal, though it could take advantage of the revolutionary army and a dearth, it had neither the government or public opinion in its favour, for the Jacobins were averse to it.

Ronsin, Vincent, and Hébert, were obliged to profess an apparent respect for the lawfully constituted authorities, to keep their designs secret, and to plot in the dark. At the period of the 10th of August, and the 31st of May, the conspirators being masters of the commune, of the Cordeliers, of the Jacobins, and all the clubs, and having numerous and energetic partisans in the national assembly, and in the committees, when they ventured to conspire openly, could publicly draw the populace along in their train, and avail themselves of masses for the execution of their plots. But this was far from being the case with the party of the ultra-revolutionists.

The reigning authority did not reject any one of the extraordinary means of defence or even of vengeance; reasonable practices now no longer impeached its vigilance; on the contrary, victories on all the frontiers attested its power, its abilities, and its zeal. Consequently, those who attacked this authority, and at the same time held out hopes of qualifications or energy superior to what it possessed, were intriguers who were evidently promoting some irregular or ambitious schemes. Such was the public conviction, and the conspirators could not flatter themselves that they could draw the people in their train. Thus, however formidable they might become if they were permitted to proceed, they were far from being of importance if their career was seasonably checked.

The committee kept its eye upon them; and it continued by a series of reports to make the two opposite parties of less importance. In the ultra-revolutionists, it considered that these were conspirators who were to be annihilated; and on the contrary, in regard to the moderatists, it simply recognised old friends, who held the same opinions with itself, and of whose patriotism there was no suspicion. But that it should not appear deficient in the article of strength to smite the ultra-revolutionists, it was obliged to condemn the moderatists, and to unceasingly appeal to the influence of terror. The latter were anxious to be heard. Camille published fresh numbers; Danton and his friends, in their private conversation, argued against the reasons of the committee, and a paper and wordy war was the consequence. A rancorous spirit supervened, and Saint-Just, Robespierre, Barrère, and Billaud, who at first had only repelled the moderatists from policy and to fortify themselves against the ultra-revolutionists, now began to persecute them from personal ill feeling and hatred. Camille had already, as we have noticed, attacked Collot and Barrère. In his letter to Dillon, he had addressed the dogmatic fanaticism of Saint-Just and the monkish austerity of Billaud in a tone of railery which had deeply wounded them. He had at last irritated Robespierre at the Jacobins; and though he had highly commended him, he had concluded by entirely alienating himself from him. Danton was far from being agreeable to them all, by reason of his high reputation; and at this time, now that he had retired from the conduct of public affairs, he remained in retirement, censuring the government, and appearing to excite Camille's caustic and babbling* pen, he could not fail to become more odious to them every day, and it was hardly to be supposed that Robespierre would again expose himself by denouncing him.

Robespierre and Saint Just, who were accustomed to draw up in the name of the committee the declarations of their principles, and were in some measure charged with the moral department of the government, while Barrère, Carnot, Dillaud, and others, took the management of the material and administrative department,—Robespierre and Saint Just made two reports, the one upon the moral principles which ought to guide the revolutionary government, the other on the imprisonments of which Camille had complained in The Old Cordelier. We must now see in what way these two gloomy minds conceived the form of the revolutionary government, and of the means of regenerating a state.

"The principle of democratic government is virtue," said Robespierre*, "and its mode of operation whilst it is gaining a firm footing is terror. We desire to substitute in this our country, morality for selfishness, probity for honour, principles for usages, duties for conventionalities, the empire of reason for the tyranny of fashion, the contempt of vice for the contempt of misfortune, honest pride for insolence, greatness of soul for vanity, the love of glory for the love of money, worthy prisons for good company, merit for intrigue, true genius for pretended wit, sterling truth for outward show, the charm of contented happiness for the languor induced by pleasure, the greatness of man for the littleness of the great, a magnanimous, powerful, and happy people for a giddy, frivolous, and wretched people, that is to say, all the virtues and all the miracles of the republic, for all the vices and all the follies of the monarchy. To attain this end, there was need of a rigorous and energetic government, which should surmount every obstacle whatever. There was, on the one hand, a brutal ignorance, together with a gross cupidity, which looked for nought else in the republic than convulsions; on the other hand, there existed a grovelling and abased corruption, anxious to enjoy all the gratifications of the former luxury, and which could never resolve itself into the energetic virtues of the democracy. Hence two factions: one who desired to carry every thing beyond reason, who pushed every thing to extremity, and in assailing superstition, sought to set aside God himself, and to spill torrents of blood, under the pretext of avenging the republic, the other, who, being weak and vicious, did not consider itself sufficiently virtuous in order to become so terrible, and bitterly deplored all the necessary sacrifices which the establishment of virtue demanded. One of these factions, said Saint Just†, would CONVERT LIBERTY INTO A BACCHANAL, THE OTHER INTO A PROSTITUTE."

Robespierre and Saint Just recapitulated the follies of some of the agents of the revolutionary government, and of two or three procurators of communes, who had assumed to renew the energy of Marat, and in so doing they alluded to all the extravagances of Hébert and his creatures. They then dwelt upon all the charges of weakness, acquiescence, and sensibility imputed to the new moderatists. They reproached them for sympathizing with the widows of generals, the intriguing females belonging to the old nobility, and the aristocrats, in short, for continually alluding to the severities of the republic, far inferior to the cruelties of monarchies. "You have," said Saint Just, "one hundred thousand prisoners, and the revolutionary tribunal has already condemned three hundred guilty persons. But under the monarchy you had four hundred thousand prisoners, fifteen hundred smugglers were annually hanged, three thousand were broken on the wheel, and at this very day there are in Europe four millions of prisoners, to whose cries you pay no attention, while your partial moderation is allowing the enemies of your government to triumph." We are now heaping reproaches on ourselves, while kings a thousand-fold more cruel than ourselves slumber amidst their crimes."

Robespierre and Saint Just, in conformity with the system agreed on, added that these two factions, although apparently conflicting, had but one common point on which they relied, and that was the foreign enemy, who set them in action, so as to ruin the republic.

We here see what a compound of enthusiasm, policy, and malice was identified with the system of the committee. Camille and his friends found that they were attacked by allusions, and even by expressions pointedly directed against them. In his Vieux Cordelier he advanced the system of virtue against that of worldly happiness. He said that he was attached to the republic because it must necessarily add to the general felicity, because commerce, industry, and civilization were more strikingly developed at Athens, Venice, and Florence, than in any monarchy whatever, because the republic could alone realize that deceitful wish of monarchy, the fowl in the pot (la poule au pot). "What will it matter to Pitt," exclaimed Camille, "that France were free, if her liberty served only to carry us back to the ignorance of the ancient Gauls, to their sages, to their *braves, to their mistletoe, and to their houses, which were but hovels of clay? So far from mourning over it, I dare say Pitt would give a great many guineas that such a liberty were established here. But that which would make the English government furious is, if it could be said of France, what Demetrius said of Attica: Nowhere in the world can one live more agreeably than at Athens, whether one has money or not. Those who are in easy circumstances, either by commerce or by their handiwork, can there procure all imaginable gratifications, and as for those who are striving to do so, there are so many workshops where they may earn what is needful to amuse themselves at their ANTHESTERIA†, and to lay by something besides, that they cannot possibly complain of their poverty, unless indeed they have to reproach themselves with idleness.

"I think, then, that liberty does not exist in an equality of privations, and that the highest eulogium upon the convention would be, if it could bear this witness to itself, I found the nation without breeches, (sans culottes) and I leave it breeched (culotté)

"An admirable democracy," adds Camille, "was that of Athens! Solon did not pass there for a cockcomb (muscardin *), he was not a whit the less considered the model of legislators, and proclaimed by the oracle the first of the seven sages, although he made no difficulty in confessing his inclinations for wine, women, and music, and he obtains so firm a reputation for wisdom, that at this day his name is never pronounced in the convention and at the Jacobins but as that of the greatest of legislators. But how many are there among us who have the character of aristocrats and Sardapah, who have not uttered such a similar confession of faith!

"And this divine creature, Socrates, one day meeting Alcibiades gloomy and thoughtful, apparently for no other reason than that he was annoyed at a letter from Aspasia, 'What is the matter with you,' said this most grave of Mentors, 'Have you lost your shield in battle? Have you been vanquished in the camp, in the race, or at the fencing school? Has any one been singing or playing upon the lyre at the table of the general better than yourself?' This trait delineates manners. What delightful republicans!"

Camille then complained of this, that no desire seemed to exist for engraving the habits and manners of Athens upon the liberty of speech which prevailed in that republic. Aristophanes there represented on the stage the generals, the orators, the philosophers, and the people themselves; and the people of Athens, sometimes personated by an old man, at other by a young one, instead of being irritated, proclaimed Aristophanes the champion of the games, and encouraged him by plaudits and crowns. Many of those comedies were directed against the ultra revolutionists of that day. The sarcasms in them were most cutting; "and if at this day," added Camille, "one were to translate any of those pieces performed four hundred and thirty years before Christ, when Sthenocles was archon, Hébert would maintain at the Cordeliers that it was a piece of yesterday, an invention of Fabre-d'Eglantine against himself and Ronsin, and that no one but the translator was the cause of the dearth.

"However, I am deceiving myself," proceeded Camille, in sober sadness, "when I say that men are changed; they have always been the same, liberty of speech enjoyed no more impunity in the ancient than in the modern republics. Socrates, accused of having maligned the gods, drank the hemlock. Cicero, for having attacked Antony, was proscribed†."

* In the sense in which this word was then and afterwards used, and as a revolutionary term, petit-maitre, macaroni, or dandy, would perhaps convey the identical meaning. Trans.

† There could not be a more pointed rebuke uttered against the then leaders of the revolution, than this allusion to Socrates, which reminded those to whom it was addressed

Thus this unfortunate young man seemed to predict that liberty of speech would no more be for given in him than in others. Those allusions, and the eloquence with which it was accompanied, irritated the committee, and while it was keeping a watchful eye upon Ronsin, Hébert, Vincent, and every one of the agitators, it conceived a violent hatred against that amiable writer who decried its systems, against Danton, who was supposed to prompt that writer, and, in short, against all those who were regarded as friends or partisans of those two leaders.

In order not to deviate from the straight course it had adopted, the committee presented two decrees, immediately after the reports of Robespierre and Saint Just, tending, it declared, to confer happiness upon the people at the expense of their enemies. By the tenor of these decrees, the committee of general welfare was alone invested with the power of investigating the complaints of detained persons, and releasing them if they were acknowledged patriots. On the other hand, all those who should be recognised as enemies of the revolution were to be kept in confinement till the peace, and should then be for ever exiled. Their property, which was to be provisionally sequestered, was to be divided among the indigent patriots, a list of whom was to be prepared by the communes*. Thus, we can clearly see, was an application of the agrarian law against suspected persons for the benefit of the patriots. These decrees, emanating from Saint-Just, were intended to act as a reply to the ultra-revolutionists, and enable the committee to preserve its reputation for energy.

Meanwhile the conspirators were bestirring themselves with more violence than ever. There is nothing to shew that their plans were methodized, or that they had engaged Pache and the commune in their plot. But they conducted themselves in the same manner as before the 31st of May: they excited the popular societies, the Cordeliers, and the sections, they diffused alarming reports, and sought to take advantage of the disturbances occasioned by the dearth, which every day increased and became more severely felt.

All at once there appeared in the markets and sale rooms placards and pamphlets, declaring that the convention was the cause of all the sufferings of the people, and that it was high time to rend from it that dangerous faction which wanted to revive the Brissotins and their mischievous system. Some of these publications even went so far as to say that the whole convention ought to be renewed; that a leader should be chosen, and that the executive power should be organised, &c. In a word, that the free city of Athens could less endure Socrates than the thirty tyrants, and had even put him to death whom those tyrants had spared—Numquid potes invenire urbem miseriorem quam Atheniensium fuit cum illum triginta tyranni divellerent? every one of the ideas which Vincent, Ronsin, and Hébert had been turning over in their minds filled these publications, and seemed to betray their originators. At the same time, the épauletiers, more blustering and fierce than ever, were observed loudly threatening to go and slaughter in the prisons those enemies whom the corrupted convention was so portinacious in sparing. They said that many patriots were to be found unjustly confounded in the prisons with aristocrats, but that they should go and select those patriots, and that they should give them liberty and arms at one and the same time. Ronsin, in full uniform as general of the revolutionary army, with a tri-coloured sash, and red plume, and accompanied by some of his officers, went through the prisons, ordered the gaol-books to be shown him, and extracted lists.

It was the 15th Ventôse. The section of Marat, presided over by Momoro, now assembled, and being indignant, as it said, at the machinations of the enemies of the people, it declared en masse, that it had turned out, that it would place a curtain before the declaration of rights, and that it should remain in that state until food and liberty had been secured to the people, and until its enemies were punished. The same evening, the Cordeliers tumultuously assembled. There it was that the sufferings endured by the public were vividly depicted; there it was that a recital was made of the persecutions recently undergone by the two renowned patriots, Vincent and Ronsin, who, it was said, had been lying ill at the Luxembourg, unable to procure the attendance of a surgeon to bleed them. Consequently, they declared that the country was in danger, and a curtain was suspended before the declaration of the rights of man. It was precisely in this way that all the insurrections had begun, namely, by a declaration that the laws were in suspension, and that the people had resumed the exercise of its sovereignty.

On the following day, the 16th, the section of Marat and the Cordeliers introduced themselves to the commune to acquaint it with their resolutions, and to engage it in the same measures. Pache studiously avoided being present. One Lubin presided at the general council. He replied to the deputation with visible embarrassment; he said that at the very time when the convention was taking such energetic measures against the enemies of the revolution, and for the relief of the indigent patriots, it was a matter of surprise that a signal of distress should be made, and that the declaration of rights should be veiled. Then, affecting to justify the general council, as though it had been accused, Lubin added that the council had used its utmost exertions to ensure supplies of provisions, and to regulate their distribution. Chaumette spoke in quite as uncertain a manner. He recommended peace, required the report on the cultivation of the pleasure-grounds, and on the supply of the capital, which in pursuance of the decrees was to be provisioned as a fortified town.

Thus it was that the heads of the commune faltered; and the movement, although tumultuous, was not strong enough to drag them along with it, and inspire them with sufficient hardihood and courage to betray the committee and the convention. The disturbance, however, was great. The insurrection began in the same manner as all those which had already gained their ends, and was equally calculated to excite similar apprehensions. By an unfortunate coincidence, the committee of public welfare was at this time deprived of its most influential members: Billaud-Varennes, and Jean-Bon Saint-André, were absent on official business; Couthon and Robespierre were ill, and the latter was unable to come and keep his faithful Jacobins in order. There only remained Saint-Just and Collot-d'Herbois to grapple with this commotion. They both of them repaired to the convention, whither the deputies had got together in a confused state, and were trembling with fear. At their suggestion, Fouquier-Tinville was immediately summoned; he was directed to make immediate search for the utterers of the incendiary publications distributed in the markets, for the agitators who were exciting the popular societies, in short, for all the conspirators who were threatening the public tranquillity. He was enjoined by a decree to apprehend them immediately, and in three days to make his report to the convention.

There was no great point attained by getting a decree of the convention, for that had never been withheld when called for against disturbers of the public tranquillity; indeed even the Girondists had not been suffered to ask twice for this remedy against the insurgent commune; but in order to ensure the execution of these decrees, public opinion had to be conciliated. Collot, who possessed great popularity at the Jacobins and at the Cordeliers, by his club eloquence, and still more by the well-known energy of his revolutionary sentiments, was commissioned to see that duty performed, and lost no time in getting to the Jacobins. They had scarcely met together, when he pictured to them the factions which threatened liberty, and the conspiracies they were contemplating. "A new campaign is about to open," said he; "the measures of the committee, which so happily terminated the last campaign, have been the means of ensuring new victories to the republic. Relying upon your confidence and your approbation, which it has always been its object to deserve, it devoted itself entirely to its labours; but all at once our enemies have endeavoured to embarrass its progress, they have raised the patriots around it for the purpose of placing them in opposition to it, and causing them to slaughter one another. They want to make us soldiers of Cadmus; they desire to make us fall by the hands of each other. But no! we will not be soldiers of Cadmus! thanks to your excellent feelings, we will continue friends, we will be soldiers of liberty alone! Supported by you, the committee will be enabled to make an energetic defence, to suppress the agitators, to expel them from the ranks of the patriots, and after this indispensable sacrifice, to prosecute its labours and your victories. The position in which you have placed us is perilous, adds Collot, but no one of us ever tumbles in the presence of danger. The committee of general safety accepts its arduous office of keeping a strict eye upon prosecuting all the enemies who are secretly plotting against liberty; the committee of public welfare omits nothing that can assist the performance of its immense task; but both of them need your support. In these days of danger we are but few. Billaud and Jean-Bon are away; our friends Couthon and Robespierre are ill. Our number is too small to enable us to combat the enemies of the public weal; you must therefore support us, or we must retire." "No, no!" cried the Jacobins. "Do not retire; we will support you." Numerous plaudits accompanied these encouraging words. Collot proceeded, and then related what had taken place at the Cordeliers. "There are men," said he, "who have not had the courage to be patient during a few days of confinement, men who have undergone nothing during the revolution, men whose defence we undertook when we deemed them oppressed, and who have attempted to excite an insurrection in Paris, because they had been imprisoned for a very short period. An insurrection, merely because two men have suffered, and because they had not a doctor, or been bled when they were ill! Cursed be those who want an insurrection!" "Yes, yes, curse them!" exclaimed the Jacobins all together. "Marat was a Cordelier," resumed Collot; "Marat was a Jacobin: well then, he also was persecuted, and certainly in a greater degree than these men of a day; he was dragged before that tribunal where none save aristocrats ought to appear: did he excite an insurrection? No. That hallowed insurrection, that insurrection which is charged with the liberation of the human race from all those who oppress it, takes root in more generous sensibilities than the grovelling notion into which an attempt is now making to draw us; but we will not fall into it. The committee of public welfare will not give way to intriguers. It is taking strong and vigorous measures; and were it to perish, it will not shrink from the performance of so glorious a task."

No sooner had Collot finished, than Momoro desired to address the club, in order to justify the section of Marat and the Cordeliers. He admitted that a curtain had been drawn over the declaration of rights, but disclaimed all knowledge of the other facts. He denied the design of insurrection, and maintained that the section of Marat and the Cordeliers were actuated by more worthy motives. Conspirators who justify themselves are lost. So soon as they are unable to openly avow the insurrection, and the mere announcement of the object does not call forth a burst of opinion in their favour, they can effect nothing more. Momoro was heard with marked disapprobation; and Collot was commissioned to go, in the name of the Jacobins, and fraternize with the Cordeliers, and to bring back those brethren, led astray by perfidious suggestions, to a sense of duty.

The night was now far advanced. Collot could not repair to the Cordeliers till the following day, the 17th; but the danger, though at first alarming, was now no longer formidable. It became evident that public opinion was not favourably disposed towards the conspirators, if that term may be applied to them. The commune had drawn back; the Jacobins had adhered to the committee and to Robespierre, although he was absent and ill. The Cordeliers, impetuous but badly advised, and, above all, deserted by the commune and the Jacobins, could not fail to yield to the eloquence of Collot d'Herbois, and to the honour of seeing among them so celebrated a member of the government. Vincent with his violent fury, Hébert with his disgusting newspaper, the numbers of which he circulated more and more, and Momoro with his resolutions of the section of Marat, could not produce a decisive movement. Ronsin alone, with his épauletiers and considerable stores of ammunition, might have made a bold stroke, for he possessed audacity enough; but whether it were that his friends were not possessed with the same spirit of hardihood, or whether he could not entirely depend on his troops, he made no stir; and from the 16th to the 17th, nothing beyond disturbances and threatening movements took place. The épauletiers, dispersed among the popular societies, occasioned a great tumult among them, but they durst not have recourse to arms.

In the evening of the 17th, Collot repaired to the Cordeliers, where he was received with great applause. He stated that secret enemies of the revolution were striving to mislead their patriotism; that they had desired to declare the republic in a state of distress, whereas at that very time it was royalty and aristocracy alone that were at the last extremity; that they had sought to divide the Cordeliers and the Jacobins, who ought, on the contrary, to form but one family, united in principles and intentions; that this insurrectionary design, this curtain drawn over the declaration of rights, was a source of the highest satisfaction to the aristocrats, who on the preceding night had all followed this example, and had in their withdrawing-rooms covered the declaration of rights; and that therefore, in order not to render the satisfaction of the common enemy complete, they ought to lose no time in removing the veil from the sacred code of nature. The Cordeliers were not able to refuse their assent, though there were among them a great number of Bouchotte's clerks. They lost no time in testifying their repentance; they removed the crape thrown over the declaration of rights, and handed it to Collot, charging him to assure the Jacobins that they would always follow their steps.

Collot d'Herbois hurried away to the Jacobins to proclaim their victory over the Cordeliers and over the ultra-revolutionists. The conspirators were thus abandoned in every quarter. They had no other resource left than making a bold stroke, which, as we have observed, was almost impossible. The committee of public welfare resolved to anticipate any movement on their part by causing the principal leaders to be apprehended, and by instantly sending them before the revolutionary tribunal. The committee enjoined Fouquier to set an inquiry on foot for the facts that would constitute treason, and to prepare forthwith an act of accusation. Saint-Just was directed at the same time to make a report to the convention against the united factions which threatened the tranquillity of the state.

On the 23rd Ventôse (13th March), Saint-Just presented his report. Following the generally adopted mode of thinking, he still represented the foreign powers as setting two factions to work; the one composed of seditious men, incendiaries, spoliators, libellers, and atheists, who were anxious to bring about the overthrow of the republic by extravagant impulses; the other consisting of corrupt men, stock-jobbers, and embezzlers of the public money, who having suffered themselves to be seduced by the snares of luxurious living, wanted to enervate the republic and thus dishonour it. He asserted that one of these factions had taken the initiative, that it had attempted to raise the standard of rebellion; but that its prospects had very recently been arrested, that he consequently now came to demand a decree of death against all those in general who had meditated the subversion of the supreme power, devised the corruption of the public mind and of republican manners, obstructed the arrival of provisions, and had in any way contributed to the plans framed by the foreign foe. Saint-Just added, that it behoved the convention from that moment to MAKE JUSTICE, PROBITY, AND ALL THE REPUBLICAN VIRTUES THE ORDER OF THE DAY.

This report, evidently dictated by a violent zeal, was equally directed against every one of the factions; but the only persons explicitly devoted to the vengeance of the revolutionary tribunal, were the ultra-revolutionist conspirators, such as Ronsin, Vincent, Hébert, &c., and the corrupt members, Chabot, Bazire, Fabre, and Julien, the fabricators of the forged decree. An ominous silence was observed respecting those whom Saint-Just termed the indulgents and the moderatists.

In the evening of the same day, Robespierre repaired to the Jacobins with Couthon, and both were received with applause. The members surrounded them, congratulated them upon their restoration to health, and promised an unbounded attachment to Robespierre. He required an extraordinary sitting to be appointed for the following day, in order to elucidate the mystery of the recently discovered conspiracy. The sitting was accorded. The subservience of the commune was equally great. Upon the motion of Chaumette himself, an application was made for the report which Saint-Just had made to the convention, and they sent to the printing-office of the republic for a copy in order to read it. Every body submitted cheerfully to the triumphant authority of the committee of public welfare. It was on this night between the 23rd and 24th, that Fouquier-Tinville arrested Hébert, Vincent, Ronsin, Momoro, Mazuel one of Ronsin's officers, and lastly, Kock, the foreign banker, a stock-jobber and ultra-revolutionist, at whose house, Hébert, Ronsin, and Vincent frequently dined and there concocted their plans. It was in this way that the committee laid hold of two foreign bankers, to persuade the world that the two factions were set in motion by the allied powers. Baron de Datz was the medium of proof of this fact against Chabot, Julien, Fabre, and all the corruptionists and moderatists; while Kock was to afford the same proof against Vincent, Ronsin, Hébert, and the ultra-revolutionists.

The denounced parties suffered themselves to be arrested without resistance, and were sent on the following day to the Luxembourg. The prisoners with joy hastened to witness the arrival of those furious men, who had alarmed them so much by their threats of inflicting upon them another September. Ronsin displayed great firmness and indifference; the cowardly Hébert was downcast and dejected; Momoro was in evident consternation, and Vincent repeatedly fainted. The report of these arrests flew quickly throughout Paris, and caused universal satisfaction. Unfortunately, report added that this was not all, and that a blow was to be struck against all those who identified themselves with any one of the factions. The same was repeated in the extraordinary sitting of the Jacobins. After every one had related what he knew of the conspiracy, of its authors, and their designs, it was further stated that all their plots would be discovered, and that a report would have to be made against other persons, besides those who were actually under prosecution.

The war office, the revolutionary army, and the Cordeliers, had received a blow in the persons of Vincent, Ronsin, Hébert, Mazuel, Momoro, and their associates. A desire was expressed to proceed also against the commune. Nothing was talked of but the dignity of chief judge reserved for Pache; but it was well known how incapable he was of joining in a conspiracy, always obedient as he was to the superior authority, and respected by the people; and the committee did not wish to be too severe by associating him with the others. The commune therefore preferred issuing an order for the arrest of Chaumette, who was not a whit more audacious or a more dangerous character than Pache, but who from vanity and extravagant prejudices, had been the originator of the most imprudent resolutions of the commune, as also one of the most zealous apostles of the worship of reason. The unfortunate Chaumette was therefore apprehended and sent to the Luxembourg with the bishop Gobel, the most prominent character in the grand abjuration scene, and accompanied by Anacharsis Clootz, who had been already expelled from the Jacobins and the convention, on account of his foreign origin, his noble birth, his fortune, his scheme of an universal republic, and his atheism.

When Chaumette arrived at the Luxembourg, the suspected persons ran to meet him, and overwhelmed him with sarcastic remarks. This unhappy man, with a great fondness for declamation, possessed none of the boldness of Ronsin, or the fury of Vincent. His smooth hair and his timid look gave him the appearance of a missionary; and such he had actually been of the new worship. He was reminded of his proclamations against prostitutes, against the aristocrats, against the famine, and against the suspected persons. One prisoner said to him, with a low bow, "Philosopher Anaxagoras, I am suspected, thou art suspected, we are suspected," (je suis suspect, tu es suspect, nous sommes suspects.) Chaumette justified himself in an abject and tremulous tone; but from that moment he did not venture to leave his cell, or appear in the prisoners' court-yard.

The committee, after having apprehended those unfortunate persons, drew up, by the assistance of the committee of general safety, the act of accusation against Chabot, Bazire, Delaunay, Julien of Toulouse, and Fabre. All five were put upon their trial, and taken before the revolutionary tribunal. At this time, also, information was obtained that a female emigrant, under prosecution by a revolutionary committee, had found an asylum at the house of Hérault-Séchelles. Already had this celebrated deputy, who possessed the advantages of a large fortune, with high birth, with a handsome person, and a cultivated and elegant mind, the friend of Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and Prou, and who often shuddered to find himself associated with those terrible revolutionists, become suspected: indeed, it was quite forgotten that he had been the principal author of the constitution. The committee lost no time in ordering him to be arrested; in the first place because it disliked him, and in the next to prove that it would, without distinction or respect of person, punish those moderatists who were detected in any breach of obedience, and that it would not be more indulgent to them than to other culprits. Thus the blows of this formidable committee were directed at one and the same time against individuals of all ranks, of all opinions, and of every qualification.

On the 1st of Germinal (20th of March), the proceedings against one portion of the conspirators commenced. In the same indictment were included Ronsin, Vincent, Hébert, Momoro, Mazuel, Kock the banker, the young Lyonnese Leclerc, who had been a chief clerk in Bouchotte's office, Ancar and Dueroquet, commissaries of the victualling department, and some other members of the revolutionary army and of the war-office. In order to keep on foot the notion of a connivance between the ultra-revolutionary faction and the foreign faction, Prolli, Dubuisson, Percyrn, and Desfieux were included in the same indictment, although they had never had any connexion with the other accused persons. Chaumette was kept back, to figure at a future time with Gobel and the other authors of the scenes of the worship of reason; and lastly, if Clotz, who ought to have been associated with these latter, was joined with Prolli, it was in his quality of foreigner. The accused were nineteen in number. Ronsin and Clotz exhibited the greatest firmness of demeanour. "This," said Ronsin to his co-accused, "is a political process; of what use are all your papers, and your preparations for justifying yourselves? you will be condemned. When you should have bestirred yourself, you talked; you must now learn to die. For my part, I swear that you shall not see me quail. Strive to do the same." The wretched Hébert and Momoro bewailed their fate, and said that liberty was undone. "Liberty undone!" exclaimed Ronsin, "because a few wretched individuals are about to perish! Liberty is immortal. Our enemies will fall in their turn, and liberty will survive them all." As they accused one another, Clotz exhorted them not to aggravate their misfortunes by mutual reproaches, and he recited the celebrated apologue:

"Je rêvais cette nuit, que de mal consumé, Côte à côte d'un gueux on m'avait inhumé," &c.

[I dreamt one night that I returned to clay,
And close beside a beggar's corpse I lay.]

This recitation had the desired effect, and they no longer reproached one another with their misfortunes. Clotz, still full of his philosophical opinions to the very scaffold, continued his arguments against what little of deism still remained in them, and incessantly discoursed upon nature and reason with an animated fervour, and exhibiting an inconceivable contempt for death. They were carried to the tribunal amidst an immense concourse of spectators. We have seen, in the account of their conduct, in what their conspiracy consisted. Clubbists of the lowest class, intriguers belonging to public offices, cut-throats enlisted in the revolutionary army, they had the self-sufficiency of inferior officials, mere bearers of orders, who always exceed their office. Thus it was that they had desired to drive the revolutionary government so far as to convert it into a mere military commission, the abolition of superstitious practices into a persecution of religion, republican manners into grossness, liberty of speech into the most disgusting vulgarity, and lastly, democratic jealousy and severity with regard to individuals to the most atrocious scandal against them. Their conspiracies consisted merely in abusive expressions against the convention and the committee, mere conversations as to a plan of government, motions at the Cordeliers and at the sections, disgusting pamphlets, and a single visit by Ronsin to the prisons to see whether patriots were not confined in them, as he had just been, and lastly, a few vague threats, with an attempt at commotion upon pretext of the dearth. In all this there was nothing observable beyond the folly and the depravity of loose characters. But a conspiracy deeply laid and correspondence with foreign powers was far above these unhappy men. It was nothing else than a perfidious suggestion of the committee, which the infamous Fouquier-Tinville was charged to demonstrate to the tribunal, and which the tribunal had orders to adopt.

The offensive language which Vincent and Ronsin had applied to Legendre, when dining with him at Pache's, their reiterated proposals for organising the executive power, were alleged as evidencing the design of annulling the national representation and the committee of public welfare. Their dinners with Kock the banker were held out as proof of their correspondence with foreign powers. To this proof was added another. Letters sent from Paris to London, and inserted in the English newspapers, intimated that, from the agitation which prevailed, popular disturbances might be expected. These letters, said they to the accused, demonstrate that foreigners were in your confidence, since they calculated as to the effect of your plots beforehand. The dearth, the blame of which they had made a subject of reproach to the government, in order to excite the people, was imputed to them alone; and Fouquier-Tinville, returning scandal for scandal, maintained that they were the cause of that dearth, by causing the roadside pillage of the market-carts laden with vegetables and fruit. The military stores collected at Paris for the revolutionary army were charged to their account, as preparations for a conspiracy. Ronsin's visit to the prisons was adduced as a proof of a design to arm the suspected persons, and to let them loose upon Paris. Lastly, the papers and publications distributed in the markets, and the curtain thrown over the declaration of rights, were considered as a commencement of the execution of their conspiracy. Hébert was put to open shame. They hardly cared to charge him with his political acts and his newspaper; they contented themselves with proving that he was guilty of stealing shirts and handkerchiefs.

But let us quit these disgraceful discussions between these base accused, and the base accuser, of which a terrific government sought to avail itself, in order to accomplish the sacrifices it had ordained. Retired within its elevated sphere, this government pointed out the unfortunate creatures who were obnoxious to it, and left Fouquier, as its attorney-general, to satisfy the forms of law with falsehoods. If in this mean herd of victims, sacrificed to the public tranquillity, some few deserved to be set apart, they were those unfortunate foreigners, Proll and Anacharsis Clootz, condemned as agents of the allied powers. Proll, as we have already observed, being well acquainted with Belgium, his native country, had censured the ignorant violence of the Jacobins in that country. He had admired the talents of Dumouriez, and this he admitted to the tribunal. His acquaintance with foreign courts had on two or three occasions rendered him serviceable to Lebrun, and this he still avowed. "Thou hast blamed," said they to him, "the revolutionary system in Belgium; thou hast admired Dumouriez; thou hast been a friend of Lebrun; thou art, therefore, an agent of the foreign powers;" no other fact was alleged against him. As for Clootz, his system of an universal republic, his doctrine of reason, his income of one hundred thousand livres, and some exertions he had made to save a female emigrant, were sufficient to ensure his conviction. The proceedings of the third day had hardly commenced when the jury declared that they had made up their minds without distinction, and condemned (pêle mêle) these intriguers, agitators, and unfortunate foreigners, to suffer death. One only was acquitted, a man named Laboureaux, who in this affair had been made use of as a spy for the committee of public welfare. On the 4th Germinal, at four in the afternoon, the condemned were conveyed to the place of execution. The concourse was quite as great as on any preceding occasion. Standings on carts, on tables, were to be let near the scaffold. Neither Ronsin or Clootz ever winced (hunchèrent) to use their own terrible expressions. Hébert, overcome with shame, and disheartened by contumely, took no pains to collect himself. He fell fainting every moment, and the populace, vile as himself, followed the fatal cart, repeating the cry of the hawkers of his own newspaper. Il est b—t en colère le Père Duchêne.

Thus these wretched men were sacrificed to the indispensable necessity of establishing a firm and vigorous government; and here the necessity of order and obedience was not one of those sophistries to which governments sacrifice their victims. All Europe threatened France, agitators of every degree wanted to grasp the supreme authority; and were endangering the safety of the commonwealth by their contentions. It became indispensable that some men more energetic than others should possess themselves of this disputed authority, should keep it to the exclusion of all others, and should thus be enabled to use it for the purpose of making a stand against all Europe. If we could experience any sympathy, it would be when we see falsehood arrayed against these wretches, to discern amongst them a man of firm courage in Ronsin, an offensive maniac in Clootz, and perhaps an intriguer, but not a conspirator, and certainly a foreigner of superior merit in the unfortunate Proll.

The Hébertists had scarcely suffered, before the indulgents manifested great joy, and said that they were not wrong in denouncing Hébert, Ronsin, and Vincent, since the committee of public welfare and the revolutionary tribunal had just sent them to the scaffold. Of what, then, do they accuse us? said they. All that we have done was to charge those factious men with a design to overthrow the republic, to destroy the national convention, to supplant the committee of public welfare, to unite the peril of religious with that of civil wars, and to bring about general confusion. This is precisely what saint-Just and Fouquier-Tinville have laid to their charge in sending them to the scaffold. In what then can we be deemed conspirators, or enemies of the republic?

Nothing could be more just than these reflections, and the committee was of precisely the same opinion with Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, Philippeau, and Fabre, respecting the danger of that anarchical turbulence. The proof of this is, that Robespierre had, since the 31st of May, never ceased to defend Danton and Camille, and to accuse the anarchists. But, as we have already observed, in striking the blow at the latter, the committee exposed itself to being considered as favouring the moderatists, and it was therefore necessary that it should display the greatest severity against the other party, so that the revolutionary reputation should not be compromised. Therefore it followed as a consequence, that although it was entirely of the same opinion with Danton and Camille, it should nevertheless censure their notions, condemn them in its promulgations, and appear not to favour them a whit more than the Hébertists themselves. In the report against the two factions, saint-Just had threatened one as much as the other, and preserved an ominous silence with respect to the indulgents. At the Jacobins, Collot had said that all was not yet over, and that a report was in preparation against other persons than those who were arrested. These threats were accompanied by the apprehension of Hérault-Séchelles, a friend of Danton, and one of the most respected men of that time. Such facts indicated no intention of giving over, and yet it was still said in all quarters that the committee was about to retrace its steps, that it was about softening the severity of the revolutionary system, and to severely punish murderers of every degree. Those who were anxious for this return to a more humane policy, the prisoners, their families, in short, all the peaceful citizens persecuted under the name of indifferents, indulged themselves in hopes not likely to be realized, and loudly asserted that the system of the laws of blood was about to have an end. This soon became the general opinion; it obtained in every one of the departments, and especially in that of the Rhône, where such terrible vengeance had for some months past been inflicted, and where Ronsin had caused such dreadful consternation. People breathed more freely for a moment at Lyons, and ventured to look their oppressors in the face, and seemed to predict to them that their cruelties were approaching their termination. But the patriots were highly indignant on hearing these reports, and being made acquainted with these hopes of the middle and peaceful classes. The Jacobins of Lyons wrote to those of Paris, that aristocracy had raised its head again, that they should not be able to hold out against them much longer, and that unless they afforded them force and countenance, they should be reduced to the necessity of putting a period to their own existence, as the patriot Gaillard had done, who on receiving intelligence of the first arrest of Ronsin had stabbed himself.

"I have seen," said Robespierre to the Jacobins, "letters from some of the Lyonnese patriots. They are all expressive of the same despair, and if the most speedy remedy be not applied to their complaints, they will not find relief from any recipe but that of Cato and Gaillard. That perfidious faction which, affecting a perfidious patriotism, wanted to sacrifice the patriots, has been exterminated; but the foreign foe cares little, for that there is one more still left. Had Hébert triumphed, the convention would have been overthrown, the republic would have resolved itself into chaos, and tyranny would have gained its ends; but with respect to the moderatists, the convention is relaxing her energy, the crimes of the aristocracy pass unpunished, and the tyrants triumph. The foreign enemy has therefore as much hope with one as with the other of these factions, and he must keep them all in pay without attaching any of them to himself. What does it matter to him, that Hébert expired on the scaffold, so long as he has traitors of another kind left, to enable him to accomplish his projects? You have done nothing, then, if there is still left a faction for you to destroy; and the convention is resolved to immolate all, even to the very last of them."

Thus it was that the committee had felt the necessity of freeing itself from the imputation of moderation by a new sacrifice. Robespierre had defended Danton, when a daring faction was about to strike by his side one of the most renowned of the patriots. Then it was that policy, a danger to which they were both exposed, in fact everything induced him to defend his old colleague; but now this bold faction was no more. Were he to continue to defend this depopularised colleague, he might probably compromise himself. Besides, the conduct of Danton could not fail to awaken many reflections in his jealous mind. What could Danton be doing so far away from the committee? Associating with Philippeau and Camille-Desmoulins, he appeared to be the chief promoter and the leader of that new association, which was assailing the government with censures and bitter satire. For some time past, seated opposite to that tribune where the members of the committee took their places, Danton had somewhat of a threatening, and at the same time a contemptuous air. His gesture and his expressions, repeated by every one, and his connexions, every thing in fact showed that he had detached himself from the government, he had made himself its censor, and that he kept himself aloof, as if for the purpose of obstructing it by his extended renown. This was not all. Although depopularised, Danton still possessed a reputation for boldness, and for an extraordinary political genius. If Danton were sacrificed, there would not be left out of the committee a single influential name; and in the committee there would remain only men of second-rate reputations, such as Saint-Just, Couthon, and Collot d'Herbois. By consenting to this sacrifice, Robespierre would at the same stroke destroy a rival, restore to the government its reputation for energy, and above all, heighten his reputation for integrity, by striking down a man accused of having been hot in the pursuit of riches and pleasure. He was, moreover, called upon to make this sacrifice by all his colleagues, who were still more jealous of Danton than he himself was. Couthon and Collot d'Herbois were by no means ignorant that they were the subject of contempt to that celebrated tribune. Billaud, cold, vulgar, and sanguinary, found in him something grand and overwhelming. Saint-Just, dogmatic, austere, and proud, felt an antipathy to an active, generous, and good-natured revolutionist, and he plainly saw that if Danton were dead, he should become the second personage in the republic. Lastly, all of them knew that Danton, in his plan for remodeling the committee, did not intend that any one save Robespierre should be retained. They therefore beset the latter, and had no very great exertions to make before they could wring from him a determination so flattering to his pride. It is not known what explanations led to this resolution, or on what day it was taken; but all at once they became lowering and mysterious. Nothing more was said as to their designs. In the convention, and at the Jacobins, they preserved an absolute silence. But sinister reports secretly got wind. It was said that Danton, Camille, Philippeau, and Lacroix, were about to be sacrificed to the power of their colleagues. The mutual friends of Danton and Robespierre, alarmed at these reports, and seeing that after such an act, no man's head could be safe, that Robespierre himself could not expect to be in certainty, wanted to bring Robespierre and Danton together again, and requested them to explain themselves. Robespierre, intrenching himself in an obstinate silence, refused to reply to these overtures, and maintained a cold reserve. When allusion was made to the friendship he had formerly testified for Danton, he hypocritically replied that he could not do any thing either for or against his colleague; that justice was there to defend innocence; that for his part, his whole life had been a continual sacrifice of his affections to his country; and that if his friend were guilty, he should sacrifice him, certainly with regret, but he still should sacrifice him as he had done all the others to the republic.

It was plainly perceptible that his mind was made up, and that this hypocritical rival would not take any decided part against Danton, and that he reserved to himself the liberty of delivering him up to his colleagues. In fact, the rumours of the approaching arrests became more confirmed. Danton's friends visited him more than ever, and urged him to rouse himself from this kind of lethargy; to shake off his indolence, and to show once more that revolutionary front which he had never yet shown in vain amidst the storm. "I am aware," said Danton, "that they want to arrest me. But no," he added, "they will not dare." Besides, what could he do? To fly was impossible. What country would have given an asylum to this formidable revolutionist? Was it for him to justify by his flight all the calumnies of his enemies? And more than that, he loved his country. "Does a man," he exclaimed, "carry away his country on the soles of his shoes?" On the other hand, remaining in France, he would have but slender means at his disposal. The Cordeliers belonged to the ultra-revolutionists, the Jacobins to Robespierre. The convention was any thing but firm. On what support could he rely? This then is what has not been sufficiently considered by those who, having seen this mighty man fulminating against the throne on the 10th of August, and stirring the people against foreign allies, have not yet been able to conceive how he should have fallen without defending himself. Revolutionary genius does not consist in reviving a lost popularity, in creating forces which do not exist, but in boldly directing the affections of the people, when once they have been gained. The generosity of Danton, and his secession from public affairs, had almost alienated him from popular favour, or at least had not left him sufficient to enable him to overthrow the reigning authority.

In this conviction of his own incompetence, he lingered on, and repeated to himself, They will not dare. He indeed might be permitted to assume, that before so great a name and such great services his adversaries would pause. He then relapsed into his indolence, and into that thoughtlessness so characteristic of powerful men, who await the danger without taking much pains to withdraw themselves from it.

The committee still continued to preserve the utmost taciturnity, and sinister rumours were continually gaining ground. Six days had elapsed since the death of Hébert. It was the 9th Germinal. All at once, those peaceable men who had conceived ill-founded hopes from the fall of the furious party, were saying that they should soon be delivered from the two Saints Marat and Chabot, and that there had been quite enough discovered in their lives to metamorphose them, quite as expeditiously as Hébert was, from great patriots into mere scoundrels. This report, which clung to the idea of a retrograde movement, spread with extraordinary rapidity, and it was every where asserted that the busts of Marat and Chabot were about to be broken to pieces. The blundering Legendre denounced this language in the convention and at the Jacobins, as it were to protest, in the name of his friends, the moderatists, against such a scheme. "Be quiet," exclaimed Collet at the Jacobins, "these stories will be contradicted. We have hurled the thunderbolts at the infamous wretches who deluded the people; we have torn the mask from their faces, but they are not the only ones! We will tear off every mask that can be assumed. Let not the indulgents for a moment imagine that it is for them we have here held glorious sittings. We shall soon undeceive them."

Accordingly, on the following day, the 10th Germinal, the committee of public welfare called to its assistance the committee of general safety, and, to give greater weight to its measures, even the committee of legislation itself. As soon as all the members had assembled, Saint-Just addressed them, and in one of those violent and perfidious reports which he so well knew how to prepare he denounced Danton, Philippeau, Desmoulins, and Lacroix, and moved that they be taken into custody. The members of the two other committees, struck with consternation and trembling, durst not resist, and conceived that they were removing the danger from themselves by conferring their joint assent. The greatest secrecy was enjoined, and in the night between the 10th and the 11th Germinal, Danton, Lacroix, Philippeau, and Camille-

Desmoulins were unexpectedly arrested and conveyed to the Luxembourg.

The next morning the news was all over Paris, and produced there a kind of stupor. The members of the convention met and preserved a silence, in which terror had a great share. The committee, which always kept the convention waiting, and already possessed all the insolence of power, had not yet arrived. Legendre, who was not of sufficient importance to have been arrested with his friends, was anxious to address the assembly. "Citizens," said he, "four members of this assembly were last night arrested. I know that Danton is one of them, the names of the others I know not; but whosoever they be, I ask that they be heard at the bar. Citizens, I declare my belief that Danton is as pure as myself, and I do not believe that there is any thing that can be laid to my charge. I shall not attack any member of the committee of public welfare and of general safety, but I am justified in being apprehensive lest personal animosities and individual passions should deprive those men of liberty who have rendered her the greatest and the most essential services. The man who in September '92 saved France by his energy, deserves at least to be heard, and ought to be allowed to explain himself, since he is now accused of having betrayed the country."

To obtain Danton the liberty of addressing the convention, was the surest way to save him and to unmask his adversaries. Many members, in fact, considered that he ought to be heard, but at this moment Robespierre, who had got there before the committee came in, in the midst of the discussion ascended the tribune, and in an angry and threatening tone spoke in these terms: "From the disturbance, for a long time unknown, which prevails in this assembly, from the agitation produced by the preceding speaker, it is plainly evident that the question here is one of great interest, for it is to settle whether a few men shall this day get the upperhand of the country. But how can you so far forget your principles as to wish to grant this day to certain individuals what you have previously refused to Chabot, Delaunay, and Fabre-d'Églantine? Why this difference in favour of some men? What care I for the praise that people bestow on themselves and their friends? long and tried experience has taught us to distrust such praise. The question is not whether a man has performed this or that patriotic act, but what has been his whole career."

"Legendre seems to be ignorant of the names of the persons arrested. The whole convention is acquainted with them. His friend Lacroix is one of them. Why does Legendre feign ignorance of this? Because he knows that he cannot in candour defend Lacroix. He has named Danton, because he conceives, no doubt, that to his name is attached a privilege.—No, we want no privileges here; we will have no idols!"

At these last words there was a burst of applause; and the poltroons, trembling at the same time before one idol, nevertheless applauded the overthrow of another, now no longer to be worshipped. Robespierre continued. "In what respect is Danton superior to Lafayette, to Dumouriez, to Brissot, to Fabre, to Chabot, or to Hébert? What can be said of him that cannot equally apply to them? Nevertheless, you have borne with them. Men talk to you of the despotism of the committee, as if the confidence with which the people have entrusted you, and which you have assigned to these committees, were not a sure guarantee for their patriotism. They affect to have their fears, but I tell you, whosoever trembles at this moment is guilty, for innocence never dreads the public eye."

Here again were fresh applauses from the same politicians, who trembled themselves at the very time they were anxious to show that they were not afraid. "And for myself also," added Robespierre, "they have wanted to excite alarm in me. They have wished to make me believe, that in advancing against Danton, the danger might extend to myself. They have written to me, the friends of Danton have sent me letters, have beset me with their speeches, they have got it into their heads that the association of an old acquaintance, that a former reliance on feigned virtues, would induce me to slacken my zeal and my passion for liberty. Well, I declare that if Danton's dangers were even to become my own, that consideration would not stop me for a moment. It is here that we all ought to demonstrate some courage and some greatness of soul. Vulgar minds, or guilty men, are always afraid to see their fellows fall, because having no longer a barrier of culprits to shelter them, they are left exposed to the light of truth, but although there may be some vulgar minds, there is no deficiency of heroic spirits in this assembly, and they well know how to brave all false terrors. Besides, the number of the guilty is not so great, crime has found but few advocates among us, and by striking off a few heads, the country will be delivered."

Robespierre had acquired the assurance and the address to say exactly what it was he wanted, and never was he known to have exercised more adroitness, or exhibited more perfidy. To talk of the sacrifice he was making by abandoning Danton, to make a merit of it, to share the danger if there were any, and to comfort the politicians by alluding to the small number of the guilty, was the height of hypocrisy and adroitness. Thus all his colleagues unanimously decided that the four deputies arrested the previous night should not be heard by the convention. At this moment Saint Just arrived, and read his report. It was he who was now let loose against the victims, because he combined an extraordinary pointed and vigorous style, with that subtle reasoning so indispensable when facts are to be distorted, and a false construction put upon them. Never had he been more terrifically eloquent or more studiously false, for let his personal hatred have been as great as it may, it could not have persuaded him of the truth of all that he advanced. Having at considerable length calumniated Philippeau, Camille-Desmoulins, and Héault-Séchelles, and accused Lacroix, he came at last to Danton, and either devised the falsest charges, or distorted most artfully the plainest facts. According to him, Danton was a covetous, indolent, false, and even a cowardly person, who had sold himself to Mirabeau, and afterwards to the Lameths, and had in consequence, with Brissot, prepared the petition which led to the firing on the people in the Champ de Mars, not for the purpose of exploding royalty, but merely as a pretence for shooting good citizens.

He then went with impunity to take his recreations and to wallow at Arcis sur Aube in the produce of his perfidies. He kept out of the way till the 10th of August, and then only made his appearance to be elected a minister. He then connected himself with the Orleans party, and got Orleans and Labie elected deputies. In league with Dumoniez, and bearing only a simulated hatred to the Girondists, but still knowing how to be on good terms with them, he entirely disapproved of the events of the 31st of May, and had desired to have Hemiot arrested. When Dumoniez, Orleans, and the Girondists had been punished, he treated with the party who wanted to restore Louis XVII. Taking money from wherever it came, from Orleans, from the Bourbonns, from the foreign powers, dining with the bankers and aristocrats, mingling in every intrigue, holding out hopes to all parties, in short, a very Caligula*, rapacious, debauched, indolent and a corrupter of public morals, he went and secluded himself once more at Arcis sur Aube, to gloit over his spoils. At last he came back, and has recently been in correspondence with all the enemies of the state, with Hébert and his coadjutors, relying upon the common dependence on the foreign enemy to attack the committee, and those men whom the convention had invested with its confidence.

After hearing this iniquitous report read, the convention decreed the accusation of Danton, Camille Desmoulins, Philippeau, Héault-Séchelles, and Lacroix.

These unfortunate men had been conveyed to the Luxembourg. "Arrest Us—Us!" said Lacroix to Danton, "I never never even thought of such a thing!" "Not have even thought of such a thing?" replied Danton, "I knew it, I had been warned of it." "Didst thou know this, and yet hast not bestirred thyself?" exclaimed Lacroix. "This is the effect of thine usual indolence, it has undone us." "I did not believe," replied Danton, "that they would ever have dared to execute their design."

All the prisoners crowded to the gate, to look upon the celebrated Danton, and the interesting Camille, who had thrown a ray of hope into the prisons. Danton was, as usual, calm, haughty, and very jovial, Camille, astounded and melancholy; Philippeau, excited and elevated by the danger. Héault-Séchelles, who had preceded them at the Luxembourg by a few days, ran out to meet his friends, and cheerfully embraced them. "When men commit follies," said Danton, "they should learn to laugh at them." Then perceiving Thomas Paine, he said to him, "That which thou hast done for the happiness and the liberty of thy country, I have in vain attempted to do for mine. I have been less fortunate, but am not a whit more to blame. They are sending me to the scaffold well, my friends, we must go to it gaily."

On the next day, the 12th, the copy of the act of accusation was sent to the Luxembourg, and the accused were transferred to the Conciergerie, from whence they were to go before the revolutionary tribunal. On reading this act, full of contemptible falsehoods, Camille became furious. However, he soon composed himself, and he said in a tone of distress, "I am going to the scaffold for having shed a few tears over the fall of so many unfortun-

nates. My only regret in dying is that I could not have assisted them." All the prisoners, of whatever grade or opinion, felt a deep interest for him, and poured forth heartfelt prayers for him. Philippeau said a few words about his wife, and remained calm and serene. Hérault-Séchelles retained that grace of mind and manners which distinguished him even among persons of his own rank; he embraced his faithful servant, who had accompanied him to the Luxembourg, but who was not allowed to follow him to the Conciergerie, at the same time using words of consolation and encouragement. At the same time Fabre, Chabot, Bazire, and Delaunay were transferred to the Conciergerie, for these were to be tried together with Danton, in order to make the proceedings against him more degrading, by suggesting that he was an accessory with the forgers. Fabre was ill and almost dying. Chabot, who from his prison had never ceased writing to Robespierre to implore his good offices, and to lavish on him the basest flatteries, but without moving him, saw that his death was inevitable, and that the detection of his infamy was quite as certain as the scaffold. He therefore resolved to poison himself. He swallowed corrosive sublimate; but the pain he suffered having extorted from him some groans, he confessed what he had done, accepted medical aid, and was conveyed, quite as ill as Fabre, to the Conciergerie. A somewhat more generous feeling seemed to actuate him even amidst his torments, namely, a deep regret for having compromised his friend Bazire, who had no hand in the crime. "Bazire," he exclaimed, "my poor Bazire, what hast thou done?"

At the Conciergerie, the accused excited the same curiosity as at the Luxembourg. They occupied the place where the Girondists had been confined. Danton spoke with the same energy. "It was on this very day," said he, "that I caused the revolutionary tribunal to be instituted. I beg pardon for it of God and of man. My object was to prevent another September, and not to let loose a scourge upon mankind." Then, giving way to contempt for his colleagues who were murdering him, "These brother Cains," said he, "know nothing about government. I leave every thing in frightful disorder." He then adopted, in order to characterize the impotence of the paralytic Couthon and the cowardly Robespierre, some obscene but original expressions, which indicated an extraordinary gaiety of mind. For a single moment he exhibited a transient regret at having taken part in the revolution, saying, "It would be much better to be a poor fisherman than to have to govern men." This was the only expression of the kind that he uttered.

Lacroix appeared astonished, on looking into the cells, at the number and wretched state of the prisoners. "What!" said they to him, "did not cart-loads of victims teach you what was passing in Paris?" The astonishment of Lacroix was not feigned; and it affords a lesson for men, who in pursuing a political object do not sufficiently consider the individual sufferings of the victims, and seem not to believe they exist, because they do not witness them.

On the following day, 13th Germinal, the accused, to the number of fifteen, were arraigned before the tribunal. The committee had included in one indictment the five moderate leaders, Danton, Hérault-Séchelles, Camille, Philippeau, and Lacroix, the four persons accused of forgery, Chabot, Bazire, Delaunay, and Fabre d'Eglantine; Chabot's two brothers-in-law, Julius and Emanuel Frey, the contractor d'Espagnac, the unfortunate Westermann charged with having participated in the corruption and plots of Danton, and lastly, two foreigners, friends of the accused, Gusman the Spaniard, and Diederichs the Dane. The object of the committee in making this misjoinder, was to confound the moderatists with the corruptionists and with foreigners, by way of proving that moderation proceeded at once from a deficiency of republican virtue, and from the seduction of foreign gold. The crowd collected to see the accused was immense. A spark of that interest which Danton had once excited, was rekindled at his presence. Fouquier-Tinville, the judges, and the jurors, all subaltern revolutionists, raised from their original nothingness by his mighty hand, felt embarrassed in his presence: his assurance, his haughtiness, aided them, and he appeared rather to be the accuser than the accused. Herman, the president, and Fouquier-Tinville, instead of balloting the jurors, as the law required, packed them, and took such as they called solid men (les solides). The accused were then interrogated. When Danton was asked the usual questions as to his age and his place of abode, he proudly replied that he was thirty-four years old, and that his name would soon be in the Pantheon, and himself in nothingness. Camille answered that he was thirty-three, the age of the sans-culotte Jesus Christ when he died. Bazire was twenty-nine; Hérault-Séchelles and Philippeau were thirty-four. Thus talents, courage, patriotism, and youth, were all again included in this new holocaust, as in that of the Girondists.

Danton, Camille, Hérault-Séchelles, and the others, complained that their cause was confounded with that of several forgers. Nevertheless they proceeded. They first went into the charge preferred against Chabot, Bazire, Delaunay, and d'Eglantine. Chabot kept to his old story, and argued that if he could be said to have taken part in the conspiracy of the stock-jobbers, it was merely for the purpose of exposing it. He convinced nobody; for it was very strange, that when he engaged in it, he did not privately apprise some member of the committees of the fact, that he should have disclosed at so late a period, and that he should have kept the funds in his own hands. Delaunay was convicted; Fabre, notwithstanding his clever defence, in which he alleged, that in making the erasures and interlineations in the copy of the decree, he conceived that he was only altering the draught of the Bill (projet) which they had before them, was contradicted by the evidence of Cambon, whose open and disinterested deposition was overwhelming. He, in fact, convinced Fabre that the draughts (projets) of decrees were never signed, that the copy which he had erased was signed by all the members of the commission of five, and that consequently he could not have supposed that he was altering a mere projet.

Bazire, who was an accessory, because he had not informed against it, was scarcely heard in his defence, and was put upon the same footing as the others by the tribunal. The tribunal next went into the charge against d'Espagnac, who was accused of having bribed Julien of Toulouse to get his contracts allowed, and of having had a share in the intrigue of the East India Company. In this case, letters proved the facts, and all d'Espagnac's astuteness could not assist him against this mode of proof. Hérault-Séchelles was then examined. Bazire was declared guilty as a friend of Chabot; Hérault for having been a friend of Bazire; for having had some knowledge through him of the intrigue of the stock-jobbers; for having taken an interest in a female emigrant; for having been a friend of the moderatists; and for having caused it to be supposed by his mildness, his elegance, his fortune, his ill-disguised sympathies, that he himself was a moderatist. After Hérault, came Danton's turn. The utmost stillness pervaded the assembly when he rose to speak. "Danton," said the president to him, "the convention accuses you of having conspired with Mirabeau, with Dumouriez, with Orleans, with the Girondins, with the foreign enemy, and with that faction which seeks the restoration of Louis XVII." "My voice," replied Danton with his powerful organs of speech, "My voice, which has so often made itself heard in the cause of the people, will have no difficulty to repel that calumny. Let the cowards who accuse me show their faces, and I will cover them with shame. Let the committees come here; I will not answer but in their presence; I call for them as accusers, I have need of them as witnesses. Let them appear; for the rest, I care little for you and your judgment—I have already told you that nothingness will be soon my asylum. Life is a burden; take it from me—I long to be delivered from it." In giving utterance to these words, Danton was moved to the highest pitch of indignation, his heart felt a repugnance to make answer to such men. His demand that the committees should appear, and his declared determination not to reply but in their presence, had intimidated the tribunal, and caused great agitation. Such a confronting would in fact have been cruel for them, they would have been covered with confusion, and condemnation would perhaps have been rendered impossible. "Danton," said the president, "audacity is the attendant of guilt, calmness of innocence." At this expression, Danton exclaimed, "Individual audacity ought, no doubt, to be repressed; but that national audacity of which I have so often set the example, which I have so often shown in the cause of liberty, is the most meritorious of all the virtues. That audacity is mine; it is that which I have employed for the republic against the poltroons who accuse me. When I find that I am so basely calumniated, how can I contain myself! It is not from such a revolutionist as I that you must expect a cool defence. Men of my constitution are inappreciable in revolutions—it is upon their brow that the spirit of liberty is impressed." As he uttered these words, Danton shook his head and defied the tribunal. His gestures, so formidable in their import, made a deep impression. The crowd, who are always affected by a forcible address, could not restrain a murmur of approbation. "That I," continued Danton, "I should have been accused of having conspired with Mirabeau, with Dumouriez, with Orleans, of having crawled at the feet of vile despots! Is it myself that am summoned to make answer to inevitable inflexible justice? And thou, cowardly Saint-Just, wilt have to answer to posterity for thy accusation against the firmest supporter of liberty? In going through this catalogue of horrors," added Danton, holding up the act of accusation, "I feel my whole frame shudder." The president again exhorted him to be calm, and reminded him of the example of Marat, who replied respectfully to the tribunal. Danton resumed, and said that since it was desired, he would relate the history of his life. He then related what difficulty he had had in attaining to the municipal functions, the efforts made by the constituents to prevent him, the resistance which he offered to the designs of Mirabeau, and above all, what he did on that famous day, when, surrounding the royal carriage with an immense concourse of people, he prevented the journey to Saint-Cloud. He then referred to his conduct when he led the people to the Champ de Mars to sign a petition against royalty, and the motive of that celebrated petition; to the boldness with which he first proposed the overthrow of the throne in 92; to the courage with which he proclaimed the insurrection on the evening of the 9th of August; and to the firmness which he displayed during the twelve hours of that insurrection. At this point he was almost suffocated with indignation at the thought of the imputation that he had hid himself on the 10th of August: "Where," he exclaimed, "are the men who had occasion to urge Danton to show himself on that day? Where are the privileged beings from whom he borrowed energy? Let my accusers appear!—I am in my sober senses when I call for them.—I will expose the three senseless knaves who have surrounded and ruined Robespierre.—Why don't they show themselves here, that I may plunge them into that nothingness from which they ought never to have emerged——" The president would have again interrupted him, and rang his bell. Danton drowned the sound of it with his terrible voice. "Is it that you do not hear me?" asked the president. "The voice of a man who is defending his honour and his life," replied Danton, "ought to overpower the sound of thy bell." Wearied however from indignation, his voice began to falter; the president then prevailed upon him to rest himself, that he might resume his defence with more calmness and tranquillity.

Danton spoke no more. The tribunal went on to Camille, whose Vieux Cordelier was read, and who remonstrated in vain against the construction that was imputed to his writings. Lacroix next occupied their attention, whose conduct in Belgium was referred to with severe censure, and who, after the example of Danton, demanded the appearance of several members of the convention, and frequently urged his being allowed that advantage.

This first sitting had excited a general sensation. The concourse of people surrounding the palace of justice and extending to the bridges, had manifested extraordinary emotion. The judges were frightened. Vadier, Vouland, and Amar, the most malignant members of the committee of general safety, had been present during the proceedings, but were concealed from public observation in the printing office adjoining the hall of the tribunal, and communicating with it by means of a small opening. From thence they had witnessed with alarm the boldness of Danton, and the manifestations of the public towards him. They began to doubt whether condemnation were possible. Herman and Fouquier had repaired, as soon as the hearing was over, to the committee of public welfare, and informed them of the application of the accused, who required several members of the convention to come forward. The committee began to hesitate; Robespierre had gone home, Billaud and Saint-Just alone were present. They prohibited Fouquier from answering the application, enjoined him to prolong the proceedings, to let the three days elapse without coming to any explanation, and then cause the jurors to declare that they had sufficient evidence to enable them to come to a conclusion.

While this was taking place at the tribunal, at the committee, and in Paris, there was not less emotion called forth in the prisons, where a deep interest was felt for the accused parties, and where no hopes could be entertained for any one if such revolutionists were sacrificed. At the Luxembourg was to be found the unfortunate Dillon, the friend of Desmoulins, and defended by him; he had learned from Chaumette, who, involved in the same danger, made common cause with the moderatists, what had taken place at the tribunal. Chaumette had heard it from his wife. Dillon, a hot-headed man, and who as an old soldier, sometimes sought in wine a transient forgetfulness of his miseries, talked inconsiderately to a man named Laflotte, confined in the same prison; he said that it was high time for the good republicans to raise their heads against vile oppressors; that the people seemed to be awakening; that Danton insisted on making his defence in the presence of the committees; that his condemnation was far from being a settled affair; that the wife of Camille-Desmoulins might raise the people by distributing assignats; and that if he himself should contrive to escape, he would collect resolute men enough to save the republicans who were on the point of being sacrificed by the tribunal. This was nought else but idle discourse, uttered in the spirit of drunkenness and grief. There appears, however, to have been also a suggestion of sending a thousand crowns and a letter to Camille's wife. The basé Laflotte, thinking to obtain his life and liberty by denouncing a conspiracy, hastened to make a declaration to the keeper of the Luxembourg, in which he expressed his belief that a conspiracy was ready to break out within and without the prisons, for the purpose of liberating the accused, and assassinating the members of the two committees. We shall presently see what use was made of this fatal deposition.

On the following day, the concourse at the tribunal was just the same. Danton and his colleagues, equally resolute and obstinate, still required the personal appearance of several members of the convention and of the two committees. Fouquier, urged to make answer, said that he raised no impediment to the calling of necessary witnesses. But it was not merely sufficient, added the accused, that he threw no obstacle in the way, he ought to do more, in fact, should summon them himself. To this Fouquier replied, that he would summon all who should be named, the members of the convention excepted, as it belonged to that assembly to decide whether its members could be personally cited to appear. The accused again cried out against him, that they were refused the means of defending themselves. The tumult was at its height. The president went on examining some of the accused, namely, Westermann, the two Freys, and Gusman, and hastened to put an end to the sitting.

Fouquier immediately wrote to the committee, to apprise them of what had taken place, and to inquire what measure could be devised to enable him to answer the application of the accused. It was a nice point, and every one began to hesitate. Robespierre affected not to offer his opinion. Saint-Just alone, more bold and more decided, thought that they ought not to recede; that they ought to stop the mouths of the accused, and send them to death. At this moment he just received the deposition of the prisoner Laflotte, addressed to the police by the keeper of the Luxembourg. Saint-Just looked upon it as the germ of a conspiracy concocted by the accused, and as a good ground for a decree that should put an end to the struggle between them and the tribunal. In point of fact, on the following morning, he presented himself before the convention, and informed them that a great danger threatened the country, but that it was the last, and, if boldly met, it would soon be surmounted. "The accused," said he, "now before the revolutionary tribunal are in open revolt; they menace the tribunal itself; they carry their insolence so far as to throw balls made of crumbs of bread in the faces of the judges; they excite the people and may even lead them astray. But this is not all; they have contrived a conspiracy in the prisons. Camille's wife has been furnished with money to excite an insurrection; General Dillon is to sally forth from the Luxembourg, to put himself at the head of a number of conspirators, to murder the two committees, and to liberate the culprits." At this hypocritical and false statement, the acquiescent portion of the assembly cried out that it was horrible, and the convention unanimously voted the decree proposed by Saint-Just. By virtue of this decree, the tribunal was to continue, without adjournment, the trial of Danton and his accomplices; and it was authorized to deprive such of the accused as should show any disrespect to the court, or who endeavoured to excite disturbance, of the benefit of their arguments. A copy of the decree was immediately dispatched, Voulant and Vadier carried it to the tribunal, just as the third sitting had begun, and where the increased boldness of the accused was placing Fouquier in the most awkward situation.

On the third day, in fact, the accused had resolved to renew their applications. They all rose at once, and urged Fouquier to compel the appearance of the witnesses they required. They even demanded more; they wanted the convention to appoint a commission to receive the denunciations which they had to make against the scheme of dictatorship which manifested itself in the committees. Fouquier, perplexed, knew not what answer to give. At that moment, an officer of the court came to call him out. He stepped into the adjoining room, and there found Vadier and Vouland, who still quite out of breath said to him, "We have the villains fast. Here is what will relieve you from your awkward situation;" with these words, they handed him a decree which Saint-Just had just got passed. Fouquier seized it with joy, returned to the hearing, required to speak, and then read this infamous decree. Danton indignant, then rose to speak. "I call this audience to witness," said he, "that we have not insulted the tribunal." "That is true," said several voices in the hall. All the hearers were astonished, nay even indignant, at the denial of justice to the accused. The excitement became general. The tribunal was intimidated. "The truth," added Danton, "will one day be known. I foresee great calamities are about to light upon France. There is the dictatorship. It exhibits itself to the eye, and without disguise." Camille on hearing what was said concerning the Luxembourg, Dillon, and his wife, exclaimed in despair, "The wretches! not content with murdering me, they are determined to murder my wife!" Danton perceived at the further end of the hall, and in the corridor, Vadier and Vouland, who had placed themselves there out of public observation to witness the effect produced by the decree. He shook his fist at them. "Look," said he, "at those cowardly assassins, they follow us up; they will never leave us till we are dead!" Vadier and Vouland disappeared in evident alarm. The tribunal, instead of answering the applications of the accused, put an end to the sitting.

The next was the fourth day, and the jury had the power of closing the arguments on both sides, by declaring that sufficient evidence had been laid before them to enable them to come to a conclusion. Consequently, without giving the accused time to defend themselves, the jury demanded the closing of the proceedings. Camille was furious, declared to the jury that they were assassins, and called the people to bear witness to this iniquity. He and his companions in misfortune were then hurried out of the hall. He resisted, and was carried off by main force. Meanwhile, Vadier and Vouland talked warmly to the jurors, who, however, did not require any stirring up. The president, Hermanns, and also Fouquier followed them into their hall. Hermanns had the impudence to tell them that a letter addressed to the foreign enemy had been intercepted, which evidenced the identification of Danton with the allied powers. No more than three or four of the jurors ventured to speak up for the accused, but the majority carried it. Trinchard, the foreman of the jury, returned exhibiting a ferocious satisfaction, and with the air of a madman pronounced the iniquitous verdict of guilty.

The tribunal would not expose itself to a fresh explosion of the condemned, by bringing them back from the prison to the hall of the tribunal to hear their sentence; a registrar, therefore, went down to read it to them. They sent him away without suffering him to finish, desiring to be led to death immediately. When the sentence was once passed, Danton, who till then was boiling with indignation, became calm, and displayed all his former contempt for his adversaries. Camille, soon appeased, shed a few tears for his wife, and in his happy improvidence, never conceived that she too was threatened with death, an idea that would have rendered his last moments insupportable. Héralut was gay as usual. All the accused were firm, and Westermann showed himself worthy of the character he had acquired for intrepidity.

They were executed on the 16th Germinal (5th of April). The infamous rabble, paid to insult the victims, followed the carts. At this sight Camille, impelled by his feelings of indignation, addressed the multitude, and poured forth the most vehement imprecations against the cowardly and hypocritical Robespierre. The wretches employed to insult him replied by gross abuse. In the violence of his action he had torn his shirt, so that his shoulders were bare. Danton, casting a calm and contemptuous look on the mob, said to Camille, "Be quiet, take no notice of this vile rabble." On reaching the foot of the scaffold, Danton was going to embrace Héralut-Séeheles, who extended his arms towards him; the executioner preventing him, he uttered with a smile these terrible expressions; "What, canst thou then be more cruel than death! Be it so, thou canst not prevent our heads from embracing presently at the bottom of the basket."

Such was the end of Danton, who had shed so great a lustre upon the revolution, and had done so much in its cause. Bold, ardent, greedy of excitement and pleasure, he had thrown himself into the arena of disturbances, and was particularly calculated to make himself remarkable in the days of terror. Prompt and decisive, never losing his presence of mind, either from the difficulty or by the novelty of an extraordinary situation, he well knew how to apply the necessary means, and that without fear or scruple of any description. He conceived that it had become indispensably necessary to put an end to the contest between the monarchy and the revolution, and he effected it on the 10th of August. In the face of the Prussians, he deemed it necessary to keep France within certain bounds, and to engage her in the system of the revolution. He, therefore, it is said, brought about the horrible days of September, and in so doing saved a great number of victims. At the beginning of the great year 1793, when the convention was alarmed at the sight of all Europe in arms, he uttered these remarkable words, with an entire conviction of the deep reflection they conveyed; "a nation in revolution is more likely to conquer its neighbours than to be conquered by them." He considered that the twenty-five millions of men, they dared to set in motion, would have nothing to fear from the few hundred thousand armed by individual crowned heads. He proposed to make a rising of the entire population, and to make the rich pay; he in fact it was who devised all those revolutionary measures which left such terrible recollections, but which have saved France. This man, so powerful in action, relapsed during the space that intervened between dangerous emergencies into indolence, and the gratification of those enjoyments to which he had always been attached. He even indulged in the most innocent pleasures, such delights as the country, an adored wife, and friends afforded. Then it was that he forgot the vanquished, ceased to hate them, he could even do them justice, sympathize with and defend them. But it was during these intervals of repose, indispensable for his fervid imagination, that his rivals won from him step by step and by sheer perseverance the renown and influence he had acquired in the day of peril. The fanatics reproached him with his mildness and his good nature, and forgot that, in point of political cruelty, he had equalled them all in the days of September. While he was trusting to his renown, while he was indolently deferring the time, and was meditating grand designs for effecting a milder system of legislation, for confining the reign of violence to the days of peril, for distinguishing the exterminators irrevocably associated with blood from the men who had only yielded to circumstances, for organizing France and reconciling her with Europe, he was surprised by those of his colleagues to whom he had left the government. The latter, in striking a blow at the ultra-revolutionists, deemed it incumbent on them, that they might not appear to retrograde, to level another at the moderatists. Policy demanded victims; envy selected them, and sacrificed the most celebrated and the most formidable man of the time. Danton fell, notwithstanding his reputation and his services, before that fearful government he had contributed to organize; but at least, by his boldness, he made it for a short period appear doubtful whether he was to fall or not.

Danton's mind was uncultivated, but it was noble, contemplative, and, above all, possessed simplicity and firmness. He never availed himself of his mental resources, save for his own purposes, and never for the purpose of making a show; he likewise spoke but little, and disdained to write. According to a contemporary, he made no pretension, not even that of guessing what he was ignorant of, a pretension so common to men of his cast. He listened to Fabre d'Églantine, and was never tired of hearing his young and interesting friend, Camille Desmoulins, in whose wit he delighted, and whom he had the misfortune to involve in his own destruction. He died with his wonted fortitude, and imparted the same to his young companion. Like Mirabeau, he expired proud of himself, and like him considered that his faults and his life were sufficiently atoned for by his great services and his latest intentions.

The leaders of the two parties had now been sacrificed. The relics of these parties were soon associated with their leaders; and men most irreconcilable with each other were confusedly tried together, for the purpose of giving greater weight to the opinion that they were all privy to one and the same conspiracy. Chaumette and Gobel appeared by the side of Arthur Dillon and Simon. The Grammouls, father and son, the Lapallus, and other members of the revolutionary army, figured by the side of General Beyer; lastly, Hébert's wife, formerly a nun, appeared beside the young wife of Camille Desmoulins, scarcely twenty-three years of age, resplendent with beauty, grace, and youth. Chaumette, whose passive obedience and submission we have already observed, was accused of having conspired at the commune against the government, of having furnished the people, and endeavoured to urge them to rebellion by his extravagant motions. Gobel was considered as the accomplice of Anacharsis Clootz and of Chaumette. Arthur Dillon had wanted, it was said, to open the prisons of Paris, and then to slaughter the convention and the tribunal, in order to rescue his friends. The members of the revolutionary army were condemned as agents of Ronsin. General Beyer, who had so powerfully contributed to save Nantes jointly with Canclaux, and who was suspected of federalism, was considered to be an accomplice of the ultra-revolutionists. Every one can see what approximation was likely to exist between the staff of Nantes and that of Saumur. Hébert's wife was condemned as an accomplice of her husband. Seated on the same bench with the wife of Camille, she said to the latter, "You at least are fortunate; there is no charge got up against you; you will be saved." In fact, all that could be alleged against this young woman was, that of being passionately attached to her husband, and of constantly wandering with her children about the prison to see their father and to point him out to them. Both were nevertheless condemned, and the wives of Hébert and Camille perished as guilty participators in the same conspiracy. The unfortunate Desmoulins died with a courage worthy of her husband and of her own virtue. No victim since Charlotte Corday and Madame Roland had excited greater interest or more heartfelt sympathy.

CHAPTER XIX.

RESULTS OF THE RECENT EXECUTIONS AGAINST THE PARTIES OPPOSED TO THE GOVERNMENT.—DECREE AGAINST THE EX-NOBLES.—THE MINISTRIES ARE ABOLISHED AND REPLACED BY COMMISSIONS.—EFFORTS OF THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC WELFARE TO CONCENTRATE ALL THE AUTHORITIES IN ITS OWN HAND.—ABOLITION OF THE POPULAR SOCIETIES, THE JACOBINS EXCEPTED.—THE DISTRIBUTION OF POWER AND THE ADMINISTRATION, BETWEEN THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE.—THE CONVENTION, IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE REPORT OF ROBESPIERRE, ACKNOWLEDGES IN THE NAME OF THE FRENCH PEOPLE, THE EXISTENCE OF A SUPREME BEING AS WELL AS THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

The government had now sacrificed two parties at one blow. The first, that of the ultra-revolutionists, was really formidable, or likely to become so; the second, that of the new moderates, was not so. Its destruction, therefore, was not necessary, but it might be serviceable, in order to throw off all appearance of moderation. The committee attacked it without conviction, from mere hypocrisy and envy. This latter was a difficult blow to strike. The whole committee were seen to hesitate, and Robespierre retired to his house, as he was wont to do on days of peril. But Saint-Just, supported by his courage and by his jealous hatred, remained firm at his post, encouraged Hermann and Fouquier, terrified the convention, wrung from it the decree of death, and perfected the sacrifice. The last effort that any authority has to make in order to become absolute is always the most difficult; it requires its utmost strength to overcome the last obstruction; but this resistance once overcome, every thing else gives way, every thing falls prostrate before it; it has then but to reign undisputed master of all. Then it is that it displays its power, commits excesses, and destroys itself. While every mouth is closed, while outward submission appears in every face, hatred lurks in the recesses of the heart, and the act of accusation of the conquerors is being prepared during the height of their exaltation.

The committee of public welfare, having successfully sacrificed these two classes of men, so little identified with each other, who had presumed to thwart or merely to annoy upon its power, had now become irresistible. The winter was over. The campaign of 1794 (Germinal, year II.) was about to open with the spring. Formidable armies were to extend themselves all along the frontiers, and to cause that terrible power to excite that same sensation from without which was so cruelly experienced within. Whosoever had appeared to have opposed the committee, or had been supposed to feel any sympathy with those who had been put to death, had no time to lose in tendering their submission. Legendre, who had exerted himself on the day that Danton, Laëroix, and Camille Desmoulins were arrested, and who had endeavoured to influence the convention in their favour, Legendre considered that he ought to lose no time in atoning for his imprudence, and divesting himself of his sympathy for the recent victims. Many persons had written him anonymous letters, wherein he was exhorted to strike the tyrants, who, they said, had just thrown off the mask. Legendre repaired to the Jacobins on the 21st of Germinal (April 10), denounced the anonymous letters sent to him, and complained that people took him for a *Séide, whom they could arm with a dagger. "Well, then," said he, "since I am driven to it, I declare to the people, who have always heard me tell the truth, that I now consider it as openly demonstrated that the conspiracy, the leaders of which are now no more, really existed, and that I was the cat's-paw of the traitors. I have found proofs of this in various papers deposited with the committee of public welfare, especially in the criminal conduct of the accused before the national justice, and in the machinations of their accomplices, who wanted to arm an honest man with the dagger of the murderer. I was, before this plot was discovered, the intimate friend of Danton. I would have answered with my head for his principles and his conduct; but now I feel convinced of his guilt; I am persuaded that he wished to plunge the people into a very great error. Perhaps I should have fallen into it myself, had I not been timely enlightened. I declare to the anonymous scribblers who want to persuade me to stab Robespierre, and to make me the instrument of their machinations, that I was bred amongst the people, that I glory in remaining with them, and that I will die rather than abandon their rights. They will not write me a single letter that I shall not carry to the committee of public welfare."

The submission of Legendre soon became universal. From all parts of France there came a host of addresses, wherein congratulations were offered to the convention and the committee of public welfare on their assumption of energy. The number of these addresses was incalculable. They were couched in every possible kind of style, and under the most burlesque forms; every one of them exhibited the strongest desire to adhere to the acts of the government, and to acknowledge their propriety. Rhodéz dispatched the following address: "Worthy representatives of a free people, it is then in vain that the sons of the Titans have lifted their proud heads; the thunderbolt has overthrown them all!—What, citizens! would ye for base lucre sell your liberty. The constitution which ye have given us, has caused every throne to totter, and has struck terror into kings. Liberty advancing with giant steps, despotism crushed, superstition annihilated, the republic recovering its unity, the conspirators exposed and punished, representatives faithful to their trust and base and perfidious public functionaries falling under the axe of the law, and breaking of the fetters of the slaves in the new world: such are your trophies! If intrigues still exist, let them tremble! let the death of the conspirators attest your triumph! As for you, representatives, live happy under the wise laws which you have made for the welfare of all nations, and receive the tribute of our affection*."

It was not from any horror of sanguinary measures that the committee had stricken the ultrarevolutionists, but simply to confirm their authority, and to crush the opposition that impeded its action. Accordingly, it was afterwards seen constantly tending to a two-fold end; and to render itself still more formidable, and to still further concentrate power in its own hands. Collet, who had become the organ of government at the Jacobins, explained in the most energetic manner the policy of the committee. In a violent speech, wherein he pointed out to all the authorities the new track which they ought to pursue, and the zeal they ought to display in their functions, he said, "The tyrants have lost their strength; their armies tremble before ours, already are some of the despots seeking to withdraw from the coalition. In this state, they have but one source from whence they can derive hope, and that is internal conspiracies. We must not the less cease therefore to keep a vigilant watch over the traitors. Like our brethren, victorious on the frontiers, let us all make ready, present, and fire at once. While our external enemies fall beneath the strokes of our soldiers, let our internal enemies fall beneath the blows of the people. Our cause, defended by justice and energy, shall be triumphant. Nature does every thing this year for the republicans, she promises them a double harvest. The leaves bursting from their buds proclaim the fall of the tyrants. I report to you, citizens, let us keep close watch within, while our warriors are fighting from without, let the functionaries charged with the superintendence of the public concerns redouble their attention and zeal; let them be made thoroughly sensible of this reflection, that there is perhaps not a street, not a cross path where there is not a traitor meditating a new bad plot. Let this traitor meet with death, ay, and the most speedy death! If the administrators, if the public functionaries wish to create a place for themselves in history, now is there a favourable opportunity for so doing. The revolutionary tribunal has already secured for itself a distinguished place there. Let all the administrations imitate its zeal and its inexorable energy, let the revolutionary committees, in particular, redouble their vigilance and their activity, and let them know how to withstand the importunities with which they are beleaguered, and which would hurry them into an indulgence fatal to the cause of liberty."

Saint Just presented to the convention a formidable report upon the general police of the republic. He therein reported the fabulous history of all the conspiracies, he exhibited them as the rising of the vices against the austere system of the republic, he said that the government, so far from slackening its energy, ought to strike without ceasing, until it should have sacrificed all the wretches whose corruption caused an impediment to the establishment of virtue. He pronounced the accustomed eulogy on severity, and sought in his usual style, by every description of language to prove that great institutions should originate in terror. "What," said he, "would have become of an indulgent republic? We have set sword against sword, and the republic is founded. It has issued from amidst the storm, this origin it has in common with the world arising out of chaos, and man weeping as he comes into the world." As a consequence of these maxims, Saint Just proposed a general measure against the ex nobles. It was the first of the kind that was enacted. In the preceding year, Danton had, in a moment of impetuosity, caused all the aristocrats to be outlawed. This decree being impracticable on account of the magnitude of its operation, had been changed for another, which condemned all suspected persons to provisional detention. But no specific enactment against the ex nobles had yet been passed. Saint Just demonstrated them to be the irreconcilable enemies of the revolution. "Do what you will," said he, "you will never be able to satisfy the enemies of the people, unless you re-establish tyranny. Let them go elsewhere in search of slavery and kings. They cannot make peace with you, you do not speak the same language, you do not understand one another. Then drive them away. The world is not inhospitable, and with us the public welfare is the supreme law." Saint Just proposed a decree banishing all the ex-nobles, and all foreigners, from Paris, the fortresses, and the seaports, and which excluded from all benefit of the law those who should not have obeyed the decree within the space of ten days. Other ordinances contained in this day's decree made it the duty of all the authorities to redouble their zeal and activity. The convention approved of the proposition, as it always did, and voted it by acclamation. Collot d'Herbois, the reporter of the decree to the Jacobins, added his figures of speech to those of Saint Just. "We must," said he, "make the body politic throw out the foul sweat of aristocracy. The more copiously it shall have perspired, the better health it will enjoy."

We have seen what the committee did to manifest the energy of its policy, now let us see what further it did towards the still greater concentration of power. In the first place, it ordered the disbanding of the revolutionary army. That army, devised by Danton, had at first been made of use in carrying out the orders of the convention, while any remains of federalism were in existence, but now become the central rallying point of all the agitators and all the adventurers, and as it had been made serviceable as a point of support to the late demagogues, it was necessary to dissolve it. Besides, the government, being implicitly obeyed, had no need of these satellites to enforce the execution of its orders. Consequently, it was disbanded by decree. The committee next proposed the abolition of the different ministries. Ministries were powers which still possessed too great importance when placed in competition with the members of the committee of public welfare. Either they left every thing to be done by the committee, and in this case they were useless; or they would rather do things themselves, and then they were very troublesome competitors. The example of Boucchotte, who, under the direction of Vincent, had caused the committee so much trouble, was pregnant with instruction. The ministries were in consequence abolished, and in their stead the twelve following commissions were instituted.

- 1 Commission of civil administrations, the police and tribunals
- 2 Commission of public instruction
- 3 Commission of agriculture and the arts.
- 4 Commission of commerce and articles of consumption
- 5 Commission of public works.
- 6 Commission of public relief
7. Commission of conveyance, posts, and public vehicles
- 8 Commission of finances
- 9 Commission of organization and direction of the land forces
- 10 Commission of the navy and the colonies
11. Commission of arms, gunpowder, and the working of mines
- 12 Commission of foreign relations

These commissions, dependent upon the committee of public welfare, were neither more or less than twelve offices, (bureaux), among which they had distributed the practical part of the administration. Heimann, who was president of the revolutionary tribunal at the time of Danton's trial, was rewarded for his zeal by his being appointed chief of one of these commissions. They gave him the most important, that of civil administrations, the police, and tribunals.

Other measures were adopted for still further augmenting the centralization of power. According to the institution of the revolutionary committees, there was to be one for each commune or section of a commune. The rural communes being very numerous and far from populous, the number of committees was too great, and their functions were almost nullified. The mode of their formation presented a great inconvenience. The peasants being mostly determined revolutionists, but yet illiterate, the municipal functions had in most cases devolved upon landholders who had retired to their estates, and were by no means disposed to apply their influence in favour of the government; hence it arose that a bad look out was kept upon the country, and especially upon the mansions. To remedy this inconvenient state of things, the revolutionary committees of the communes were abolished, and none but the district committees were retained. By these means the police, in becoming more concentrated, became more active, and passed into the hands of the tradesmen of the districts, who were almost all staunch Jacobins, and very jealous of the old nobility.

The Jacobins were the principal club, indeed the only one recognized by the government. This club had invariably adopted the principles and the interests of the government, and had likewise taken a decided part against the Hébertists and Dantonists. The committee of public welfare was desirous that it should consolidate almost all the others in its own body, and that the entire force of public opinion should be concentrated there, in the same manner as the committee had concentrated in itself the entire power of the government. The expression of this desire flattered the ambition of the Jacobins in an extraordinary degree, and they made the greatest exertions to accomplish this suggestion. Ever since the meetings of the sections had been reduced to two a-week, so as to ensure the attendance of the people, who were there to effect the ascendancy of revolutionary motions, the sections had formed themselves into popular societies. The number of these societies in Paris was very great, indeed there were two or three of them to each section. We have already mentioned the complaints to which they became exposed. It was said that the aristocrats, that is to say, the commercial clerks and the lawyers' clerks, dissatisfied with the requisition, the old servants of the nobility, in short, all those who had any motive for offering opposition to the revolutionary system, met at these societies, and there demonstrated that opposition which they durst not manifest at the Jacobins or in the sections. The number of these secondary societies prevented their being kept under control, and persons sometimes uttered opinions at these societies which they would never have dared to broach in any other place. Their abolition had been already suggested. The Jacobins had no right to take this matter up, nor could the government have done so without appearing to check the privilege of meeting and deliberating in common, a privilege so highly lauded at that time, and considered as being unrestrained. On the motion of Collot, the Jacobins decided that they should no longer receive any deputation from societies formed in Paris since the 10th of August, and that the correspondence with them should no longer be continued. As to those formed in Paris before the 10th of August, and which had the privilege of corresponding, it was decided that a report should be made upon each, to inquire whether they ought to retain that advantage. This measure particularly concerned the Cordeliers, already stricken in the persons of their leaders, Ronsin, Vincent, and Hébert, and latterly considered as suspected. Thus all the sectionary societies were placed in a questionable position by this declaration, and the Cordeliers were to undergo the ordeal of a report.

It was not long before this measure produced the intended effect. All the sectionary societies, intimidated or forewarned, came one after another to the convention and to the Jacobins, to declare their voluntary dissolution. All congratulated alike the convention and the Jacobins, and declared that, having assembled for the public service, they voluntarily separated themselves, since their meetings had been deemed prejudicial to that cause they desired to serve. From that time there no longer remained in Paris any other than the parent society of the Jacobins, and in the provinces the affiliated [or corresponding] societies. That of the Cordeliers, indeed, still subsisted beside its rival. Instituted formerly by Danton, ungrateful towards its founder, and since wholly devoted to Hébert, Ronsin, and Vincent, it had given a momentary uneasiness to the government, and had put itself in competition with the Jacobins. It still comprehended the remnant of the officers of Vincent and the revolutionary army. They could not dissolve it; but the report concerning it was presented. It was by this report remarked, that for some time past it corresponded but very seldom and very negligently with the Jacobins, and that consequently it might be said there was no object attainable in continuing the correspondence. It was on this occasion proposed that an inquiry should take place as to whether there was any necessity for more than one popular society in Paris. Some even ventured to assert that a single central point of opinion should be established, and that it should be placed at the Jacobins. The society passed to the order of the day upon all these propositions, and did not even decide whether the privilege of correspondence should still be accorded to the Cordeliers. But this club, formerly so celebrated, had terminated its existence; entirely deserted, it was no longer of any importance, and the Jacobins, with their train of affiliated societies, remained sole masters and regulators of public opinion.

After centralizing, if we may be allowed the term, public opinion, the next thing thought of was to regulate the method in which its manifestation was to be allowed, so as to render it less tumultuous and less annoying to the government. The continual censure and the denunciation of the public functionaries, magistrates, deputies, generals, and administrators, had hitherto constituted the principal occupation of the Jacobins. This rage for incessantly attacking and persecuting the agents of authority had its inconveniences as well as its advantages, so long as their zeal and their opinions were questionable. But at this day, when the committee had vigorously seized upon the supreme power, when it exercised a vigilant control over its agents, and selected them in the most revolutionary spirit, the Jacobins could not have been any longer permitted to indulge their wonted suspicions, and to harass functionaries who for the most part were under efficient control, as well as judiciously selected. It would even have been dangerous for the state to have permitted it. It was on the occasion of Generals Charbonnier and Dugobert being both eliminated, while one was gaining advantages over the Austrians, and the other was dying in the Cerdagne, suffering from age and wounds, that Collet d'Herbois had complained at the Jacobins of this indiscreet manner of persecuting generals and functionaries of every degree. According to the habit of throwing all blame upon the dead, he imputed this rage for denunciation to the remnant of Hebert's faction, and persuaded the Jacobins to no longer tolerate these public denunciations, which, he said, wasted the valuable time of the society, and lowered the agents selected by the government in the public esteem. He therefore proposed, and in fact caused a vote to be made, that the society should appoint a committee from members chosen from its own body, whose duty should be to receive denunciations, and to transmit them secretly to the committee of public welfare. In this manner denunciations produced less inconvenience and became less tumultuous, and the regularity of administrative forms began to succeed to the confusion induced by popular friction.

Thus it was that the first concern of the committee, and the earliest fruit of the victory it had obtained over the factions, was to declare itself in a more energetic manner than ever against all the opponents of the revolution, and to centralize the administration, police, and public opinion. Ambition doubtless had begun to influence its determinations much more than in the first moment of its existence, but not in so great a degree as one might be led to suppose from the great mass of power which it had acquired. Instituted at the commencement of 1793, and under the pressure of extraordinary trials, it owed its existence to necessity alone. Once established, it had gradually assumed a greater share of power, in the same degree that the service of the state required it, and it had thus arrived at the dictatorship itself. Its position amidst that universal dissolution of all the authorities had been such, that it could not recognize itself without gaining power, or yet so well without indulging ambition. The last measures which it had adopted were no doubt advantageous, but they were in themselves prudent and useful. Most of them had even been suggested to the committee, for in a society which is reorganizing itself, every thing seems to present itself and submit itself to the executive authority. But the moment was at hand when ambition was to reign paramount, and when the interest of its own power was to supersede that of the state. Such is man; he cannot long remain disinterested, and he soon identifies himself with the object he is pursuing.

The committee of public welfare had still one more concern to attend to, that which always demands primary attention from the founders of a new society, namely, religion. Hitherto they had confined themselves to moral ideas, by making integrity, justice, and the virtues, the order of the day, they had now to direct their attention to religious ideas.

Let us here remark the singular progress of their systems among these sectaries. When they found it necessary to destroy the fanatics, they considered them as idolaters, and as inefficient republicans, they talked of putting the energy and the public welfare, and sacrificed them to these notions. When two new parties were formed, the one brutal, extravagant, and striving to overthrow and profane every thing, the other indulgent, easy, disposed to placidity of habit and voluptuousness, then next transition from ideas of patriotic energy was to those of order and virtue, they saw nothing else than fatal moderation enervating the vigour of the revolution, they beheld all the vices arrayed in force against the severity of the republican system, on the one hand, manly rejecting every notion of civil order, and on the other hand, effeminacy and corruption rejecting every conception of morals, a delirium of the mind rejecting all thought of God, then it was that the republic in their own minds became an imprisonment of virtue assailed by all the bad passions at once. The word virtue was every where, they made justice and integrity the order of the day. It yet remained for them to proclaim the belief in God, the immortality of the soul, all the moral convictions, it yet remained for them to make a solemn confession of faith, in a word, to declare the religion of the state. They resolved, therefore, to pass a decree on this subject. In this manner they should oppose order against the anarchists, faith in God against the atheists, and morals against the profligate. Their system of virtue would be complete. In particular, they considered it a most essential matter to wash away those reproaches of impiety with which the republic had been assailed throughout all Europe, they were desirous of saying what is always said to priests when they accuse you of impiety, because you do not put faith in their doctrines. WE BELIEVE IN GOD.

They had also other motives for adopting a decisive measure in regard to religion. The common sense of reason had been abolished, festivals (festes) were required for the decades (jours de l'été), and it was of importance, when attending to the moral and religious wants of the people, to consider how they should also satisfy their imagination and present them with an object for publicly meeting together. Besides, there could not be a more favourable opportunity than the present. The republic, victorious at the conclusion of the last campaign, began to be still more so at the commencement of the present. Instead of the great destitution of means in which it found itself the preceding year, it was, through the attention of its government, provided with powerful military resources. From the fruit of being conquered, the transition was now to the expectation of victory, instead of dawning insurrections, submission prevailed every where. Lastly, if owing to the assignats and the maximum, there was still some restriction upon the internal distribution of produce, nature seemed to have been desirous of freely imparting her bounties to France, by granting her the most abundant crops. From all the provinces tidings arrived that the harvest would be unusually full, and would be ripe a month before the usual time. This was therefore the time when thus liberated, victorious, and bountifully supplied republic should throw herself at the feet of the Almighty. The occasion was solemn and affecting for those who were believers. It was seasonable for those who merely complied with political notions.

Let us notice one remarkable circumstance. Sectaries, for whom there no longer existed any compact that was to be regarded, who, from their extraordinary contempt of all other nations, and the self-esteem in which they were absorbed, were proof against all opinion, and yet feared not wounding general belief; who, in matters of government had reduced every thing to nothing but what was absolutely necessary; who had admitted no other authority than that of a few citizens temporarily elected; who had thrown off all hierarchy of classified conditions of men, who had not hesitated to abolish that which of all is most ancient and of deepest root, sectaries such as these, paused before two ideas, morality and a God. After rejecting all those from which they thought they could deliver man, they remained under the sway of these two latter, and sacrificed a party to each of them. If all did not believe, still all felt the necessity of establishing order among men, and to support this human order, they necessarily recurred to the idea of distinguishing in the structure of the universe a generally and beautifully formed order. This is the first time in the history of the world that the dissolution of all authority left society a prey to the government of purely systematic minds (for the English believed in the traditions of Christianity), and those minds which had outstripped all adopted and generally recognized ideas, retained the ideas of morality and of a God. This example is unparalleled in the history of the world; it is singular, it is grand, it is beautiful; history should pause, that the observation should have its due weight.

Robespierre was the person who had to make the report on this solemn occasion; and to him alone this duty belonged, according to the distribution of the parts which had been made among the members of the committee. Prieur, Robert Lindet, and Carnot, were quietly occupied with the administrative and the war departments. Barrère made most of the reports, particularly those which related to the operations of the armies, and all those in general which had to be verbally delivered. Collot-d'Herbois, the declaimer, was despatched to the clubs and the popular meetings, as the bearer of the messages of the committee. Couthon, although paralytic, likewise went everywhere, spoke at the convention, at the Jacobins, and to the people, and possessed the art of exciting interest by his infirmities, and by the paternal tone he assumed in enunciating the most violent propositions. Billaud, not quite so active in his disposition, attended to the correspondence, and sometimes handled matters of general policy. Saint-Just, young, daring, and active, went to and fro between the fields of battle and the committee; and when he had impressed terror and energy on the armies, he returned to make murderous reports against the parties who were to be put to death. Lastly, Robespierre, their great leader, who was consulted on all matters, never spoke but upon great occasions. It was he who discussed high questions of morals and politics. These elevated subjects were reserved for him, as being more appropriate to his abilities and virtue. The duty of reporter on the question which was about to be discussed, thus of right belonged to him. None had so decidedly declared himself against atheism; no one was so venerated, no one had so high a reputation for purity and virtue; no one in short was so well qualified by his ascendancy and his dogmatism for this sort of pontificate as he was.

Never had so fair an occasion offered for his imitating Rousseau, whose opinions he professed, and whose style he made his continual study. The talent of Robespierre developed itself in a remarkable manner, during the protracted struggles of the revolution. That cold and prosy being began to speak in good extempore; and when he wrote it was with purity, brilliancy, and energy. In his style was to be found somewhat of the bitter and gloomy temper of Rousseau, but he had not been able to borrow either the grand ideas, or the generous and impassioned soul of the author of Emile.

It was on the 18th of Floréal, (May 7, 1794,) that he appeared in the tribune, with a speech most laboriously prepared. Profound attention was paid to him. "Citizens," said he, in his exordium, "it is in prosperity that nations, like individuals, should, as I may say, commune with themselves, and when the passions are still, hearken to the voice of wisdom." He then developed at considerable length the system adopted. The republic, according to him, was virtue; and all the adversaries which she had encountered were but vicious inclinations of every description, excited against her, and in the pay of kings. The anarchists, the corruptionists, and the atheists, were nothing else than the agents of Pitt. "The tyrants," added he, "satisfied with the hardihood of their emissaries, had been anxious to parade before their subjects the extravagancies which they had purchased; and affecting to believe that they in fact were a just representation of the whole French nation, seemed to say to their subjects, 'What will you gain by shaking off our yoke? The republicans, you see, are not a whit better than ourselves!'" Brissot, Danton, and Hébert, figured by turns in Robespierre's speech; but while he was launching out into declarations of hatred against the pretended enemies of virtue, declamations already threadbare, he excited but little enthusiasm. But he quickly abandoned that portion of the subject, and rose to ideas truly grand and moral, and expressed with talent. He then obtained universal acclamations. He observed, and with reason, that the representatives of the nation were not to discountenance atheism and to proclaim deism, in the character of originators of systems, but in the character of legislators endeavouring to ascertain what principles are most suitable to man in a state of society. "What signify to you, O legislators!" he exclaimed, "what signify to you the various hypotheses by which certain philosophers explain the phenomena of nature? you can leave all these subjects to their everlasting disquisitions; it is not either as metaphysicians or as theologians that you ought to view them; in the eyes of the legislator, all that is beneficial to the world and good in practice is truth. The idea of the Supreme Being and of the immortality of the soul is a continual appeal to justice, it is therefore social and republican"—"Who therefore," exclaims Robespierre, "hath given thee the mission to proclaim to the people that the Deity hath no existence? O thou who art in love with this unfruitful doctrine, and wast never in love with thy country! what advantage dost thou find in persuading men that an undistinguishing power presides over his destinies and strikes at random guilt and virtue? That his spirit is but a slight breath which is extinguished at the threshold of the tomb? Will the idea of his annihilation inspire purity and more exalted sentiments than the confidence of his immortality? Will it inspire him with more respect for his fellow creatures and for himself, more devotedness to his country, more courage to defy tyranny, more contempt of death and voluptuousness? Ye, who mourn a virtuous friend, you cherish the thought that the better part of him has escaped death. Ye who weep over the coffin of a son, or of a wife, are ye consoled by him who tells you that nothing remains of them but vile dust? Unfortunate ye who expire from the assassin's stroke, your last sigh is an appeal to eternal justice! Innocence on the scaffold makes the tyrant turn pale in his car of triumph. Would it possess this ascendancy, if the grave put the oppressor and the oppressed upon equal terms?"

Robespierre, still confining himself to the political side of the question, adds these remarkable observations "Let us," said he, "here take a lesson from history, let us remark, I beseech you, how the men who have exercised an influence on the destinies of states have been led into one or the other of two opposite systems by their personal character, and by the very nature of their political views. Recollect with what profound art Caesar, pleading in the Roman senate for the accomplices of Cato, wanders into a digression against the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, so well calculated did these ideas appear to him to extinguish in the hearts of the judges the energy of virtue, so closely does the principle (cause) of crime appear to him to be linked with the principle of atheism! Cicero, on the contrary, invoked the sword of the law and the thunderbolts of the gods against the traitors. The dying Socrates discoursed with his friends upon the immortality of the soul. Leonidas, at Thermopylae, supping with his companions in arms, the moment before executing the most heroic design that human virtue ever conceived, invited them for the next day to another banquet in a new life. Cato did not hesitate between Epicurus and Zeno. Brutus, and the illustrious conspirators who shared his dangers and his glory, belonged also to that sublime sect of the Stoics, which entertained such lofty ideas of the dignity of man, which carried the enthusiasm of virtue to such a height, and whose notions were extravagant solely in respect of heroism. Stoicism brought forth rivals of Brutus and of Cato, even in those frightful ages which succeeded the loss of Roman liberty; Stoicism saved the honour of human nature, degraded by the vices of the successors of Caesar, and still more so by the patience of the people."

Upon the subject of atheism, Robespierre expresses himself in a singular manner concerning the Encyclopaedists*, "in political matters," said he, "that sect were always perfectly indifferent to the rights of the people, in point of morality, they went far beyond the destruction of religious prejudices, the most distinguished leaders sometimes declaimed against despotism, and they were persecuted by despots, sometimes they wrote books against the court, at other times dedications to kings, speeches for courtiers, and madrigals for courtizans; they expressed themselves with highness in their works, and were cringing in the ante-chambers. This sect propagated with great zeal the opinion of materialism, which prevailed among the great and among the wits, we are partly indebted to it for that kind of practical philosophy, which reducing selfishness to a system, considers human society as a warfare of deceit, success as the standard of right and wrong, integrity as a matter of taste or decorum, and the world as the patrimony of clever scoundrels.

"Among those who, at the time of which I am speaking, distinguished themselves in the career of letters and philosophy, one man [Rousseau], by the moral elevation of his soul and the loftiness of his character, proved himself worthy of the office of preceptor of mankind, he attacked tyranny with all his soul, he spoke with enthusiasm of the Deity; his masculine and single hearted eloquence described in words that burn the chains of virtue, and defended those doctrines of consolation that reason affords as something on which the heart of man can rely. The purity of his doctrine, drawn from nature and from a deep hatred of vice, as well as his invincible contempt for the intriguing sophists who usurped the name of philosophers, drew upon him the enmity and the persecution of his rivals and of his false friends. Ah! if he had been a witness of this revolution, of which he was the precursor, who can doubt that his generous soul would have embraced with transport the cause of liberty and equality!"

Robespierre then strove to counteract the idea, that in proclaiming the doctrine of the Supreme Being, the government was labouring for the priests. "What have the priests in common with God? The priests are to morality what quacks are to medicine. How different is the God of nature from the God of the priests! I know nothing that so nearly resembles atheism as the religions which they have invented. By grossly misrepresenting the Supreme Being, they have annihilated him as far as lay in their power. They made him out at one time to be a ball of fire, at another an ox, sometimes a tree, sometimes a man, sometimes a king. The priests have created a God after their own image, they have made him jealous, capricious, greedy, cruel, and implacable; they have treated him as the majors of the palace formerly treated the descendants of Clovis, in order to reign in his name, and to put themselves in his place, they have banished him to heaven as to a palace, and have called him to earth in order to demand in his name for their own interest, tithes, wealth, honours, voluptuousness, and power. The real temple of the Supreme Being is the universe, his worship virtue; his feasts the joy of a great nation, assembled before him to knit closer the bonds of universal fraternity, and to pay him the homage of sensible and pure hearts."

Robespierre then said that the people must have festivals (fêtes). "Man," said he, "is the grandest object that can exist in nature, and the most magnificent of all sights is that of a great people assembled together." In consequence, he proposed schemes for a public meeting every decade. His report was closed amidst the warmest applause. At last he proposed the following decree, which was adopted by acclamation.

"Art. 1. The French people acknowledge the existence of the Supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul.

"Art. 2. They acknowledge that the worship most worthy of the Supreme Being is the practice of the duties of man."

Other articles declared that festivals (fêtes) should be instituted, in order to recall the mind of man to the contemplation of the Deity and of the dignity of his own being. These fêtes were to take their names from the events of the revolution, or from the virtues most beneficial to man. Besides the fêtes of the 14th of July, the 10th of August, the 21st of January, and the 31st of May, the republic was to celebrate upon every Decadi the following fêtes—to the Supreme Being—the human race—the French people—the benefactors of mankind—the martyrs of liberty—liberty and equality—the republic—the liberty of the world—the love of one's country—hatred of tyrants and traitors—truth—justice—modesty—glory—friendship—frugality—courage—good faith—heroism—disinterestedness—stoicism—love—conjugal fidelity—paternal affection—filial piety—infancy—youth—manhood—old age—misfortune—agriculture—industry—our ancestors—posterity—happiness.

A solemn festival was ordained for the 20th Prairial, [8th June], and its management was committed to David. It ought to be added, that in this decree religious toleration was proclaimed anew.

No sooner was this report finished, than it was sent to the printers. On the same day the commune and the Jacobins requesting that it should be read, showered down applauses upon it, and consulted as to their going in a body to the convention to testify their gratitude for the sublime decree it had just been passing. It had been observed that the Jacobins had made but few speeches after the sacrifice of the two parties, and had not gone to congratulate the committee and the convention. A member had remarked upon this, and said that an occasion now presented itself for evidencing the union of the Jacobins with a government that displayed such admirable conduct. An address was in fact prepared, and presented to the convention by a deputation of the Jacobins. That address concluded in these terms: "The Jacobins come this day to thank you for the solemn decree that you have passed; they will come and join themselves with you in the celebration of that great day when the fête of the Supreme Being shall summon together the virtuous citizens from all parts of France, to chant the hymn of virtue." The president made a pompous reply to the deputation. "It is worthy," said he, "of a society that fills the world with its renown, that enjoys so great an influence over public opinion, that has at all times identified itself with every thing that is most courageous in the defenders of the rights of man, to enter the temple of the laws to pay homage to the Supreme Being."

The president proceeded, and after a very long harangue on the same subject, allowed Couthon to speak. This man made a violent speech against the atheists and corruptionists, and passed a pompous eulogy upon the society. He proposed on that solemn day of joy and gratitude to perform an act of justice towards the Jacobins, which had long been due to them, namely, to declare that ever since the commencement of the revolution, they had constantly deserved well of the country. This proposal was adopted amidst the most uproarious applause. They broke up in a transport of joy, and in a sort of joyous intoxication.

Although the convention had received numerous addresses after the death of the Hébertists and the Dantonists, it received indeed many more after the decree which promulgated the belief in the Supreme Being. The communication of ideas and words spreads with extraordinary rapidity among the French. Among a prompt and communicative people, the idea that engages some few minds soon becomes the notion that absorbs the public opinion; the word that is in the mouths of some is soon in the mouths of every body. Addresses poured in from all parts, congratulating the convention on its sublime decrees, and thanking it for having established virtue, proclaimed the worship of the Supreme Being, and restored hope to man. All the sections came, one after another, to express the same sentiments. The section of Marat, presenting itself at the bar, and addressing the Mountain, spoke to it in these words: "O beneficent Mountain! our protecting Sinai! accept also our expressions of acknowledgment and congratulations for all the sublime decrees thou dost daily send forth for the happiness of the human race. From thy fiercely agitated bosom has issued the salutary thunderbolt, which in crushing atheism has imparted to all true republicans the consolatory idea of being free agents in the sight of the Supreme Being, and in expectation of the immortality of the soul. Long live the convention! long live the republic! long live the Mountain!" All the addresses besought the convention anew to retain the supreme power. One of the addresses even called upon it to sit till the reign of virtue should be established in the republic upon imperishable foundations.

From that day the words virtue and Supreme Being were in every body's mouth. Upon the principal facings of the temples, where had been inscribed, To Reason (À la Raison), there was now inscribed, To the Supreme Being. The remains of Rousseau were transferred to the Pantheon. His widow was presented to the convention, and received a pension.

Thus the committee of public welfare, triumphant over all the different parties, invested with all the authorities, placed at the head of an enthusiastic and victorious nation, who were proclaiming the reign of virtue and the doctrine of the Supreme Being, had arrived at the height of its authority, and to the furthestmost extension of its systems.

STATE OF EUROPE AT THE BEGINNING OF THE YEAR 1794 (YEAR II.)—UNIVERSAL PREPARATIONS FOR WAR—PITT'S POLICY.—PLANS OF THE ALLIES AND THE FRENCH.—THE STATE OF OUR ARMIES ON LAND AND AT SEA. ACTIVITY AND ENERGY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN OBTAINING AND BRINGING HER RESOURCES INTO ACTION.—OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN; OCCUPATION OF THE PYRENEES AND THE ALPS.—OPERATIONS IN THE NETHERLANDS—BATTLES ON THE SAMBRE AND THE LYS—VICTORY OF TURCOING—TERMINATION OF THE WAR IN LA VENDÉE—COMMENCEMENT OF THE WAR OF THE CHOUANS—EVENTS IN THE COLONIES—UNFORTUNATE OCCURRENCE IN SAINT-DOMINGO—LOSS OF MARTINIQUE—A NAVAL ACTION.

BOTH in Europe and in France the winter had been employed in making preparations for a new campaign. England was still the soul of the coalition, and urged the continental powers to advance and to destroy on the banks of the Seine a revolution that alarmed her, as also a rival that was most hateful to her. The implacable son of Chatham had this year made immense efforts to crush France. It was, however, not without opposition that he had obtained from the English Parliament means proportionate to his vast projects. Lord Stanhope in the upper house, Fox and Sheridan in the lower, were continually opposed to the conduct of the war. They denied all sacrifices demanded by the ministers; they were for granting no more than what was actually necessary for the defence of the coast, and above all, they would not allow this war to be termed just and necessary, as it was, in their opinion, unjust, ruinous, and punished with deserved want of success. The motives inferred from the opening of the Scheldt, the dangers of Holland, and the necessity of defending the British Constitution, had no real foundation. Holland had not been put in jeopardy by the opening of the Scheldt, and the British Constitution was not endangered. The object of the ministers was to destroy a people who had determined to be free, and to continually augment their own personal influence and authority, under the pretence of defending themselves from the machinations of the French Jacobins. This struggle had been kept up by unfair means. They had fomented civil war and wholesale murder; but a brave and generous nation had frustrated the attempts of its adversaries by unexampled courage and exertions. Stanhope, Fox, and Sheridan concluded that such a contest was discreditably and ruinous to England. They were mistaken on one point. The English opposition may frequently reproach ministers with waging unjust, but never disadvantageous wars. If the war carried on against France was not founded in justice, it possessed excellent motives of policy, as we shall presently see; and the opposition, misled by liberal notions, forgot the advantages that England was about to derive from this war.

Pitt affected alarm at the threats of invasion uttered in the tribune of the convention. He pretended that the labourers of Kent had said, "See, the French are coming to bring us the rights of man." He made these words (paid for, it is said, by himself,) an authority for assuming that the constitution was in danger; he had denounced the corresponding societies in England, which had become somewhat more active, following the example of the clubs of France; and he insisted that, under pretence of a parliamentary reform, their design was to establish a convention. In consequence of this, he called for the suspension of the habeas corpus, the seizure of the papers of these societies, and the prosecution of a few of their members. Moreover, he called for the power of enlisting volunteers, and of maintaining them by means of private donations or subscriptions, of increasing the land forces and the navy, and of raising a mercenary troop of forty thousand foreigners, French emigrants and others. The opposition made a spirited resistance; it contended that there was nothing that could warrant the suspension of the most valuable of the liberties of Englishmen; that the prosecuted societies deliberated in public; that their opinions, openly expressed, could not be deemed conspiracies; that these notions were common to all England, since they confined themselves to a parliamentary reform; that the immoderate increase of the land forces was inconsistent with the freedom of the English people; that if the volunteers could be armed and accoutred by private subscription, it would become allowable for the minister to raise armies without the authority of Parliament; that the pay of so great a number of foreigners would be ruinous, and that it had no other object than to pay those Frenchmen who were traitors to their country. In spite of the remonstrances of the opposition, which had never been either more eloquent or less numerous, for it could not reckon on more than thirty or forty votes, Pitt obtained all that he desired, and caused all the bills he had brought in to be passed.

As soon as these demands were accorded, he caused the militia to be doubled; he raised the land forces to sixty thousand men, and the marines to eighty thousand; he organized fresh corps of emigrants, and brought to trial several members of the corresponding societies. An English jury, a more solid guarantee than the parliament, acquitted the accused; but this mattered little to Pitt, who at this time had in his hands all the means of repressing the slightest political movement, and of displaying a colossal power before Europe.

This was the moment to take advantage of this universal war, so as to crush France, to ruin her navy for ever, and to take her colonies from her—a much more sure and desirable result in the eyes of Pitt, than the suppression of certain political and religious doctrines. He had succeeded in the preceding year in arming against France the two maritime powers which should always have continued in alliance with her, Spain and Holland; he was doing his utmost to support them in their political error, and to turn it to the best account against the French navy. England was able to send out of her ports at least one hundred sail of the line, Spain forty, and Holland twenty, without taking a multitude of frigates into the account. How was France, with the fifty or sixty ships left her after the conflagration at Toulon, able to defend herself against such a force? Thus, although no naval action had yet been fought, the English flag had the sovereignty in the Mediterranean, in the Atlantic Ocean, and in the Indian Seas. In the Mediterranean, the English squadrons threatened the Italian powers, who desired to preserve their neutrality, blockaded Corsica, in order to wrest it from us, and was only waiting for a favourable opportunity to land troops and ammunition in La Vendée. In America they surrounded our Antilles, and sought to make their account by the terrible dissensions prevailing between the whites, the mulattoes, and the blacks, in order to gain possession of them all. In the Indian Seas they perfected the establishment of British power and the ruin of Pondicherry. One campaign more, and our commerce would be destroyed, whatever might be the fate of our arms on the continent. Thus nothing could be more politic than the war waged by Pitt with France, and the opposition was evidently in the wrong to argue against it on the score of advantage. The opposition would have argued justly on only one point, but that point has never yet occurred; if the English national debt, continually increasing, and now become enormous, does really exceed the wealth of the country, and must some day ruin her, England will have exceeded her means, and will have done wrong in struggling for an empire at the expense of her own resources. But this is a mystery of the future.

Pitt never stopped at any injustice to augment his resources and to aggravate the calamities of France. The Americans, happy under Washington, freely traversed the seas, and began to engage in that vast freighting business which has enriched them during the long wars of the continent. The British squadrons stopped American ships, and pressed their seamen. More than five hundred vessels had already been subjected to this injustice, and it became the subject of warm and hitherto useless remonstrances on the part of the American government. This was by no means all: under cover of the neutrality, the Americans, the Danes, and the Swedes, frequented our ports, and imported thither relief in corn, which the dearth rendered extremely valuable, and many articles necessary for the navy; and exported in exchange the wines and other produce that the soil of France affords the world. Owing to this intermediate agency of neutrals, commerce was not entirely suspended, and provision was thus made for some of the necessary articles of consumption. England considering France as a besieged place, which should be furnished and reduced to extremity, was desirous of infringing these rights of neutrals, and addressed notes full of sophistry to the northern courts, in order to induce a violation of the law of nations.

While England was making use of these means in every possible way, she had still forty thousand men in the Netherlands, under the command of the Duke of York; Lord Moira, who had been unable to reach Granville in time, was lying at Jersey with his squadron and ten thousand marines; lastly, the English treasury held funds at the disposal of all the belligerent powers.

On the continent, the enthusiasm had somewhat cooled. The powers who had not the same stake in the war as England, and who only carried it on in support of doubtful principles, did not prosecute the war with the same ardour or with the same activity. England endeavoured to stir them all up. She still held Holland under her yoke by means of the prince of Orange, and compelled her to furnish her quota to the allied army of the north. Thus that unhappy nation had its ships and its regiments in the service of its most formidable enemy, and against its most steadfast ally. Prussia, in spite of the mysticism of her king, had in a great measure shaken off the illusory notions in which she had been instructed for upwards of two years. The retreat of Champagne, in 1792, and that of the Voges in 1793, afforded her no great encouragement. Frederick-William, who had been recently exhausting his treasury, and weakening his army, in a war which could not produce any favourable result to his kingdom, and which could at best serve the house of Austria, would have renounced it altogether. Besides this, a subject of far greater interest for him called him to the north; namely, Poland, who had put herself in motion, and whose dissevered members were inclined to re-unite. England, taking advantage of him in the midst of his indecision, prevailed upon him to continue the war by the all-powerful means of her gold. She concluded at the Hague in the name of herself and of Holland, a treaty by which Prussia engaged to furnish sixty-two thousand four hundred men for the service of the allies. This army was to have a Prussian for its commander, and its future conquests were to be in common with the two maritime powers, England and Holland. In return, those two powers undertook to furnish [the king of] Prussia with fifty thousand pounds sterling per month for the maintenance of his troops, and to pay him besides for bread and forage. Over and above this sum, they granted three hundred thousand pounds for the first expenses of taking the field, and one hundred thousand pounds for the expenses of his return to the Prussian states. It was at this price that Prussia continued the impolitic war which she had begun.

The house of Austria had no further cause for interference with France, since the queen, the wife Louis XVI. had expired on the scaffold. Austria had far less to dread the contagious principles of the revolution than any other country, since the political discussions of the last thirty years have not yet awakened the public mind in that kingdom. Her only motive then for making war upon us was pure revenge; her engagements, therefore, with the allies, and a desire of acquiring some few fortresses in the Netherlands, perhaps idle and vague expectations of acquiring a portion of our provinces, might have operated as an additional motive. She not only infused greater ardour in her operations than Prussia, but also a greater share of real activity ; for all she had to do was to make up and re-organize her regiments without increasing their number. A great part of her troops was in Poland, for she had, like Prussia, a powerful motive for looking behind her, and turning her thoughts in the direction of the Vistula, quite as much as to the Rhine. Galicia occupied her attention not less than the Netherlands and Alsatia.

Sweden and Denmark maintained a discreet neutrality, and replied to the sophistries of England, that the law of nations was immutable, that there was no reason that it should be violated in respect of France, in fact, nor that the laws of blockade should be applied to an entire country, such laws being in their nature applicable only to a besieged fortress ; that Danish and Swedish vessels were well received in France ; that they did not find there any barbarians, as they were termed, but a government that honourably discharged the claims of stranger merchants, and who conserved all the relations due to those nations with whom it was at peace ; that therefore there was no reason for breaking off such an advantageous intercourse. In consequence of this, although Catharine, in every way favourable to the designs of the English, seemed to declare herself against the rights of neutral nations, Sweden and Denmark persisted in their resolutions, preserved a prudent and firm neutrality, and concluded a treaty by which both of the two countries engaged to maintain the rights of neutrals, and to enforce the observance of a clause in the treaty of 1780, which closed the Baltic against the armed vessels of such powers as had no port in that sea. France, therefore, had reasonable expectation of importing corn from the north, as also the timber and hemp requisite for her navy.

Russia, always affecting great indignation against the French revolution, and holding out great hopes to the emigrants, thought of nothing but Poland, and was not so wrapped up in the policy of the English, but as a means of obtaining the adhesion of the English to the policy of the Russians. This accounts for the silence of England, in respect of an event of no less importance than the disappearance of a kingdom from the theatre of politics. At this moment of general spoliation, when England was acquiring so great a share of superiority in the south of Europe as well as at sea, it would hardly have been in good taste for her to have addressed the language of justice to the partitioners of Poland. Thus those allies who accused France of having fallen into barbarism, were committing in the north the most barefaced plunder (brigandage) that policy ever tolerated, and at the same time were contemplating a similar act against France, and were lending their mutual assistance to destroy for ever the liberty of the seas.

The German princes followed the movement of the house of Austria. Switzerland, protected by her mountains and exempted by her institutions from engaging in a crusade on behalf of monarchies, persisted in not espousing either party, and covered by her neutrality the eastern provinces, the most unprotected of all. She performed the same part upon the continent that the Americans, the Swedes, and the Danes, did at sea ; she rendered the same services to French commerce, and reaped the same benefit therefrom. She supplied us with the horses necessary for our armies, and with cattle, of which we had been deficient ever since the war had ravaged the Vosges and La Vendée ; she exported the produce of our manufactures, and thus became the intermediate agent of a most advantageous commerce. Piedmont continued the war, doubtless with regret, but she could not consent to lay down her arms, after having lost two provinces, Savoy and Nice, at this sanguinary and awkwardly played game. The Italian powers wished to be neuter, but in keeping to that intention they suffered great annoyance. The republic of Genoa had witnessed the English commit a disgraceful act, in fact a substantive breach of the law of nations. They had seized upon a French frigate that had cast anchor there under shelter of the Genoese neutrality, and had slaughtered the crew. Tuscany had been obliged to dismiss the French resident. Naples, who had recognized the republic when the French squadrons threatened her coasts, made great demonstrations against her now that the English flag was displayed in the Mediterranean, and promised to send eighteen thousand men for the relief of Piedmont. Rome, fortunately powerless, cursed us, and had allowed the French agent, Basseville, to be murdered within her walls. Lastly, Venice, though somewhat flattered by the democratical language of France, would not on any account engage herself in a war, and hoped under advantage of her remote situation to preserve her neutrality. Corsica was on the point of slipping out of our hands, since Paoli had declared for the English ; all that we now possessed in that island were Bastia and Calvi.

Spain, the least guilty of our enemies, continued an impolitic war, and persisted in committing the same indiscretion as Holland. The pretended obligations of thrones, the victories of Ricardos, together with English influence, decided her to try one more campaign, though she was greatly exhausted, in want of soldiers, and still more in want of money. The celebrated Alcedia caused d'Aranda to be disgraced for having advised peace.

Politics, therefore, had suffered but little change since the preceding year. Interests, errors, indiscretions, and crimes, were the same in 1794 as in 1793. England alone had increased her forces. The allies still had in the Netherlands one hundred and fifty thousand men, Austrians, Germans, Dutch, and English. Twenty-five or thirty thousand Austrians were at Luxembourg ; sixty-five thousand Prussians and Saxons in the environs of Meutz. Fifty thousand Austrians, intermixed with some emigrants, lined the Rhine from Mannheim to Bâle. The Piedmontese army still consisted of forty thousand men and seven or eight thousand Austrian auxiliaries. Spain had made some levies to recruit her battalions, and demanded some pecuniary aid of her clergy, but her army was not more considerable than in the preceding year, and never exceeded about sixty thousand men, distributed between the eastern and western Pyrenees.

It was in the north that the allies intended to direct their most decisive attacks against us, by supporting themselves upon Condé, Valenciennes, and Le Quesnoy. The celebrated Mack had prepared at London a plan from which great results were expected. On the present occasion, the German tactics, demonstrating a little more boldness, had caused a march to Paris to form part of his scheme of the war. Unluckily it was now too late for the display of any such foolhardiness, for the French could no longer be taken by surprise, and their forces were immense. The plan consisted in taking one more fortress, that of Landrecies, collecting in force at that point, bringing the Prussians from the Vosges towards the Sambre, and in marching forward, leaving two divisions on the wings, one in Flanders, the other on the Sambre. At the same time Lord Moira was to land his troops in La Vendée, and aggravate our own danger by a forced march upon Paris.

To take Landrecies, after they had got Valenciennes, Condé, and Le Quesnoy, was a puerile idea; to cover the communications towards the Sambre was most judicious; but to station a division to protect Flanders was very useless, when the intention was to form a powerful invading mass; to bring the Prussians upon the Sambre was very questionable, as we shall presently see; lastly, a diversion in La Vendée had been for upwards of a year impracticable, for the entire Vendée had perished. We shall soon perceive, from the comparison of the design with the event, the folly of all these plans of campaign dictated at London*.

The allies had not, we say, brought great resources into action. There were at this moment no more than three really active powers in Europe, England, Russia, and France. The reason is simple enough; England wanted exclusive possession of the seas, Russia to secure Poland, and France to save her existence and her liberty. There were no adequate motives beyond these three great interests: the only moral elevation existed on the part of France; and in furtherance of this interest she called into action the greatest exertions that history has ever recorded.

The permanent requisition, decreed in the month of August in the preceding year, had already procured reinforcements for the armies, and contributed to those successes which terminated the campaign; but this important measure could not possibly produce its full effect till the ensuing campaign. Owing to this extraordinary movement, twelve hundred thousand men had left their homes, and covered the frontiers, or filled the depôts of the interior. The formation of these fresh troops into brigades had already begun. One battalion of the line was incorporated with two battalions of the new levy, and excellent regiments were thus formed. On this plan they had organized seven hundred thousand men, who were immediately sent off to the frontiers and distributed among the fortresses. There were, including the garrisons, two hundred and fifty thousand in the north; forty thousand in the Ardennes; two hundred thousand on the Rhine and the Moselle; one hundred thousand at the Alps; one hundred and twenty thousand at the Pyrenees; and eighty thousand from Cherbourg up to La Rochelle. The means adopted for the equipment of these forces had been neither less prompt or less extraordinary than the mode of getting them together. The manufactures of arms established in Paris and in the provinces, had soon attained that degree of activity which it had been intended they should have, and produced amazing quantities of cannons, swords, and muskets.

The committee of public welfare adroitly availing itself of the French character, had contrived to bring into use the manufacture of saltpetre. Already had the committee, in the preceding year, ordered a visitation to be made of all the cellars, for the purpose of extracting from them the mould impregnated with saltpetre. It soon did more; it drew up directions, a model of simplicity and clearness, so as to inform the citizens how to lixiviate the mould of the cellars. The committee, moreover, paid some operative chemists to instruct them in the preparation. The practice soon became generally introduced; people handed to one another the instructions which they had received, and each house furnished some pounds of this valuable salt. Some of the quarters of Paris assembled for the purpose of carrying with pomp to the convention the saltpetre they had manufactured. A fête was appointed, on which every one was to come and deposit his offering on the altar of the country. Emblematic forms were given to the salt; all sorts of epithets were lavished upon it; they called it the attinging salt, the liberating salt (sel vainqueur, sel libérateur). The people amused themselves with it, but they also produced considerable quantities of it; and the government had attained its object. Some slight confusion naturally occurred amongst all this. The cellars were dug out, and the mould, after it had been lixiviated, lay in the streets, which it obstructed and spoiled. An ordinance of the committee of public welfare put an end to this nuisance, and the lixiviated earth was replaced in the cellars. There was a deficiency of saline substances; the committee ordered that all herbs not used either as food for cattle, or for domestic or rural purposes, should be immediately burned, in order to be employed in the making of saltpetre, or converted into saline substances.

Government possessed the tact of introducing another fashion that was not less serviceable. It was easier to raise men and to manufacture arms than to find horses, of which both the artillery and the cavalry were very much in want. The war had rendered them scarce, and the demand and the general rise in the prices of all commodities had increased their value. It became necessary to recur to the grand expedient of requisitions, that is to say, to take by force what an indispensable necessity required. In each canton, one horse out of twenty-five was taken, and paid for at the rate of nine hundred francs. But however mighty force may be, good will is much more effective. The committee suggested that an offering should be made to it of a horse soldier fully equipped. The example was then universally followed. Communes, clubs, sections, were eager to offer to the republic what were called Jacobin cavaliers, completely mounted and equipped.

They had soldiers, but officers were wanting. The committee acted in this respect with its accustomed promptitude. "The revolution," said Barrère, "must accelerate all things for the supply of its necessities. The revolution is to the human mind what the sun of Africa is to vegetation." The school of Mars was re-established; young men, selected from every province, repaired on foot, and in military order, to Paris. Encamped in tents on the plain of Sablons, they repaired thither to acquire rapid instruction in every department of the art of war, and were then to distribute themselves throughout the armies.

Efforts equally energetic were made to refit our navy. It consisted in 1789 of fifty men of war and as many frigates. The disorders of the revolution, and the misfortunes at Toulon, had reduced it to about fifty vessels, of which not more than thirty at the utmost were in a fit state to put to sea. The chief deficiency was in men and officers. The navy required experienced men, and all the experienced men were opposed to the revolution. The reform effected in the staffs of the land forces thus became still more necessary in the staffs of the naval forces, and could not fail to cause a much greater disorganization therein. The two ministers, Monge and d'Albarade, had yielded to the pressure of these difficulties, and had been dismissed. The committee resolved, in this instance also, to have recourse to extraordinary measures. Jean-Bon-Saint-André and Prieur (of La Marne), were sent to Brest with the usual powers of commissioners of the convention. The Brest squadron, after having arduously cruised for four months off the west coast to prevent communication between the Vendéans and the English, had mutinied in consequence of its protracted neglect. No sooner had it come home, than Admiral Morard de Gales was arrested by the representatives, and rendered responsible for the disorderly conduct of the squadron. The crews were entirely remodelled and reorganized in the usual prompt and violent manner of the Jacobins. Peasants, who had never been sailors, were put on board the ships of the republic to manœuvre against veteran English sailors. Inferior officers were raised to the highest ranks, and Villaret-Joyeuse, the captain of a man of war, was promoted to the command of the squadron. In a month's time, a fleet of thirty men of war was ready to set sail; the fleet left the port full of enthusiasm, and amidst the acclamations of the people of Brest; not indeed to defy the formidable squadrons of England, Holland, and Spain, but to protect a convoy of two hundred sail, bringing a considerable quantity of corn from America, and ready to fight to the last extremity if the safety of the convoy required it. Meanwhile, Toulon was the theatre of not less rapid alterations. The ships that had escaped the flames were repaired, and new ones built. The expenses were levied upon the property of those Toulonnais who had assisted in surrendering their port to the enemy. To make up for the large ships which were under repair, a multitude of privateers covered the sea, and made valuable prizes. A bold and courageous nation, that is deficient in the means of carrying on war upon a large scale, can always resort to a system of petty warfare, and therein display its intelligence and its valour; by land, it carries on war by light or irregular troops, and at sea by means of privateers. According to the report of Lord Stanhope, we had taken from 1793 to 1794, four hundred and ten ships, whereas the English had taken from us no more than three hundred and sixteen. The government then did not shrink from the task of re-establishing even the naval portion of our forces.

Such prodigious exertions could not fail to produce their consequences, and we were about to reap in 1794 the benefit of the exertions of 1793.

The campaign first opened on the Pyrenees and on the Alps. Far from being active on the western, it was destined to be much more so on the eastern Pyrenees, where the Spaniards had gained the line of the Tech, and still occupied the famous camp of Boulou. Ricardos was dead, and that famous general had been succeeded by one of his lieutenants, the Count de la Union, an excellent soldier, but an indifferent commander. Not having yet received the fresh reinforcements which he expected, La Union thought of nothing further than keeping Boulou. The French were commanded by the brave Dugommier, the conqueror of Toulon. Part of the ordnance and the troops employed in that service had been sent before Perpignan, while the new levies were training in the rear. Dugommier was enabled to bring thirty-five thousand men into line, and to make the most of the wretched state in which the Spaniards then were. Dagobert, still remarkably active notwithstanding his age, proposed a scheme of invasion by the Cerdagne, which, carrying the French beyond the Pyrenees and upon the rear of the Spanish army, would have obliged the latter to retrograde. It was deemed preferable to attempt, in the first instance, an attack on the camp of Boulou; and Dagobert, who was with his division in the Cerdagne, was directed to await the result of that attack. The camp of Boulou, situated on the banks of the Tech, and sheltered by the Pyrenees, had for its outlet the causeway of Bellegarde, which forms the high road between France and Spain. Dugommier, instead of approaching in front of the enemy's positions, which were extremely well fortified, considered how he might by some means or other push forward between Boulou and the causeway of Bellegarde, so as to reduce the Spanish camp. Every thing succeeded to a miracle. La Union had got the bulk of his forces to Céret, and had left the heights of Saint-Christophe, which command the Boulou, insufficiently protected. Dugommier crossed the Tech, dispatched part of his troops in the direction of Saint-Christopher, and attacked with the rest the front of the Spanish positions, and after a brisk action, remained master of the heights. From that moment the camp became no longer tenable. The enemy was obliged to retreat by the causeway of Bellegarde; but Dugommier made himself master of it, and left the Spaniards no more than a narrow and difficult road across the pass of Porteil. Their retreat soon became a rout. Being charged at the proper time and with briskness, they fled in confusion, leaving us fifteen hundred prisoners, one hundred and forty pieces of cannon, eight hundred mules laden with their baggage, and camp effects for twenty thousand men. This victory, gained in the middle of Floréal (the beginning of May), made us masters of the Tech, and took us beyond the Pyrenees. Dugommier immediately blockaded Collioure, Port Vendre, and Saint-Elme, with the intention of retaking them from the Spaniards. At the time of this important victory, the brave Dagobert, suffering from a fever, closed his long and glorious career. This noble veteran, aged seventy six years, hurried with him the regret and the admiration of the army.

Nothing could be more brilliant than the opening of the campaign at the eastern Pyrenees. In the quarter of the western Pyrenees, we took the valley of Brestin, and these triumphs over the Spaniards, whom we had never yet conquered, excited universal satisfaction.

In the quarter of the Alps we had yet to establish our line of defence upon the great chain. Towards Savoy, we had, in the preceding year, driven back the Piedmontese into the valleys of Piedmont, but we had yet to take the posts of the Little Saint-Bernard and of Mont Cenis. In the quarter of Nice, the army of Italy was still encamped before Saorgio, without being able to force the formidable camp of the Fourches. General Dugommier had been succeeded by old Dumourison, a brave officer, but almost always ill with the gout. Fortunately, he suffered himself to be entirely directed by young Bonaparte, who in the preceding year had decided the reduction of Toulon, by recommending the attack of Little Gibraltar. This service had gained Bonaparte the rank of a brigadier general, and had given him great weight with the army. After having observed the enemy's positions, and ascertained the impossibility of carrying the camp of the Fourches, he was struck with an idea hardly less felicitous than that which in the preceding year had restored Toulon to the republic. Saorgio is situated in the valley of the Roya. Parallel with this valley is that of Oneglia, through which flows the Taggia. Bonaparte conceived the idea of throwing a division of fifteen thousand men into the valley of Oneglia, making this division ascend to the use of the Tanaro, and then to push this division forward to Mount Tanarello, which is on the outside line of the upper Roya, and thus to intercept the easeway of Saorgio, between the camp of the Fourches and the pass of Tenda. The camp of the Fourches, cut off by these means from the high Alps, must necessarily be reduced. There was but one objection that could be made to this plan, and that was, it would compel the army to encroach on the territory of Genoa. But there was no necessity for the republic to make any scruple of this, for in the preceding year two thousand Piedmontese had passed through the Genoese territory, on their way to embark at Oneglia for Toulon, besides, the outrage committed by the English on the Modeste frigate, in the very port of Genoa, was the most signal violation of a neutral country. There was, moreover, an important advantage in extending the right of the army of Italy to Oneglia, they were able by this point to cover a part of the gulf of Liguria, in which Genoa is situated (Riviera de Gènes)*, by driving the privateers from the little port of Oneglia, whither they were accustomed to fly for shelter, and thus to secure the trade of Genoa with the south of France. This trade, which was carried on by coasting vessels, was exceedingly impeded by English privateers and squadrons, and it was important to protect it, because it contributed to supply the south with corn. There could, therefore, be no hesitation in adopting the plan of Bonaparte. The representatives applied to the committee of public welfare for the necessary authority, and the execution of this plan was immediately ordered.

On the 17th Germinal (April 6) a division of fourteen thousand men, divided into five brigades, crossed the Roya. General Massena bore towards mount Tanarello, and Bonaparte with three brigades marched to Oneglia, drove out an Austrian division, and made good his entrance thither. He found in Oneglia twelve pieces of cannon, and cleared the port of all the privateers which infested those parts. While Massena was ascending the Tanaro to Tanarello, Bonaparte continued his movement, and proceeded from Oneglia to Ormèze in the valley of the Timaio. He entered it on the 15th of April (28th Germinal), and there found some muskets, twenty pieces of cannon, and magazines full of cloth for the clothing of the troops. As soon as the French brigades had effected a junction in the valley of the Tanaro, they bore off in the direction of the upper Roya, to execute the prescribed movement on the left of the Piedmontese. General Dumourison attacked the front of the Piedmontese, while Massena fell upon their flanks and upon their rear. After several very brisk actions, the Piedmontese abandoned Saorgio, and fell back on the pass of Tenda, and ultimately abandoned the pass of Tenda itself, in order to retreat for safety to Limona beyond the grand chain. During these occurrences in the valley of the Roya, the valleys of the Timaia and the Vésubie were swept by the left of the army of Italy, and soon afterwards the army of the high Alps, piqued with emulation, took by main force the Saint Bernard and Mont Cenis. Thus, from the middle of Iored (the beginning of May) we were victorious over the whole chain of the Alps, and we occupied them from the first hillocks of the Apennines to Mont Blanc. Our right, supported by Ormèze, extended almost to the gates of Genoa, covered great part of that side of the Gulf of Liguria [or Genoa] called the Riviera di Ponente, and thus protected their trade from the privateers. We had taken three or four thousand prisoners, fifty or sixty pieces of cannon, a great quantity of military equipments, and two fortresses. Our opening, therefore, was as fortunate at the Alps as at the Pyrenees, since on both those points we obtained a frontier and some portion of the enemy's resources. The campaign opened rather later on the great theatre of the war, that is, at the North. There five hundred thousand men were about coming into collision between the Vosges and the sea. The French still had their principal force about Lille, Guise, and Maubeuge. Pichegru had become their general. As commanding the army of the Rhine in the preceding year, he had contrived to appropriate to himself the honour of raising the blockade of Landau, which in reality belonged to young Hoche. He had misused himself into the confidence of Saint Just, while Hoche was thrown into prison, and had obtained the command of the army of the North. Jourdan, esteemed as a prudent general, had not been considered as sufficiently energetic to retain the chief command of the army of the North, and had succeeded Hoche at the army of the Moselle. Michaud also succeeded Pichegru at the army of the Rhine. Carnot still presided over the military operations, and directed them by means of his department. Saint-Just and Lebas had been sent to Guise, to rouse the energy of the army.

The nature of the localities required a very simple plan of operations, and one which could have very speedy and very extensive results; and that was to bring the great mass of the French forces to bear upon the Meuse, in the direction of Namur, and thus threatening the communications of the Austrians. This was then the key of the theatre of the war, and such it always will be, so long as war shall be carried on in the Netherlands against Austrians in their progress from the Rhine. Any diversion in Flanders was an indiscretion, for if the wing thrown into Flanders found itself strong enough to make head against the allies, it could do no more than assist in repelling them in front without affecting their retreat; and, if this wing were not considerable enough to obtain decisive results, the allies would only have occasion to let it advance into West Flanders, and might then enclose and drive it back without a chance of an outlet to the sea. Although Pichegru possessed acquirements, intelligence, and abundance of resolution, he was, after all, but moderately endued with military genius; he formed an erroneous judgment of the position; while Carnot, prepossessed with his plan of the preceding year, persisted in attacking the enemy directly in the centre, and in hurrying him on both his wings; of course the principal mass was to act from Guise upon the centre of the allies, while two strong divisions, the one operating upon the Lys, the other upon the Sambre, were to make a double diversion. Such was the plan opposed to the offensive plan of Mack.

Cobourg was still commander-in-chief of the allies. The emperor of Germany had gone in person to the Netherlands to excite his army, and above all to make his presence a means of putting an end to the dissensions which were every moment arising among the allied generals. Cobourg collected a mass of about one hundred thousand men in the plains of the Cateau, to blockade Landrecies. This was the first act with which the allies meant to open the campaign, and until they could procure the Prussians to march from the Moselle to the Sambre.

It was towards the end of Germinal (March) that the movements commenced. The enemy's mass, after having repelled the French divisions which lay scattered before it, fixed itself in the neighbourhood of Landrecies. The duke of York was placed in observation near Cambray, and Cobourg in the direction of Guise. By the movement which the allies had just made, the French divisions of the centre, driven backwards, found themselves separated from the divisions of Mauberge, which formed the right wing. On the 2nd Floréal (April 21) they attempted to join with these Mauberge divisions. A sanguinary engagement took place on the Helle. Our columns, still too much divided, were repulsed at all points, and brought back to the positions from which they had set out.

They now resolved upon making not only a renewed, but a general attack on the centre and on both wings. Desjardin's division, which was towards Mauberge, was to make a movement in order to join Charbonnier's division, which was coming from the Ardennes. In the centre, seven columns were to act at once, and concentrically on the whole hostile mass grouped around Landrecies. Lastly, on the left, Souham and Moreau, starting from Lille with two divisions, forming a total of fifty thousand men, were ordered to advance into Flanders and to take Menin and Courtrai under the very eyes of Clerfaut. The left of the French army operated without impediment, for prince Kaunitz, with the division which he had on the Sambre, could not prevent the junction of Charbonnier and Desjardins. The columns of the centre put themselves in motion upon the 7th Floréal (April 26), and marched from seven different points, against the Austrian army. This system of simultaneous and disjointed attacks, which had succeeded so ill with us last year, was not more successful on this occasion. These columns, too far apart from each other, could not support themselves, and gained no decisive advantage upon any one point. One of them, indeed, that of general Chappuis, was entirely defeated. This general, who had marched from Cambray, found himself opposed to the duke of York, who, as we have stated, was covering Landrecies on that side. He scattered his troops in different directions, and came up before the entrenched positions of Trois-Ville with an inadequate force. Overwhelmed by the fire of the English, charged in flank by the cavalry, he was put to the rout, and his dispersed division returned confusedly (pêle mêle) to Cambray. These checks were less attributable to the troops than to the injudicious manner in which the operations were directed. Our young soldiers, sometimes staggered by a fire to which they were not yet accustomed, were, nevertheless, easy to lead and to be brought up to the attack, and they frequently displayed extraordinary ardour and enthusiasm.

While this unavailing attempt against the centre was being made, the diversion which was being effected in Flanders against Clerfaut had perfectly succeeded. Souham and Moreau had started from Lille, and had got to Menin and Courtrai on the 7th Floréal (April 26). It is well known that those latter two fortresses are situated on a line with each other upon Lys, the other on its banks. Moreau invested the first, Souham seized upon the second. Clerfaut, mistaken as to the march of the French, sought them where they were not to be found. However, he soon became apprised of the investment of Menin and the capture of Courtrai, and then tried to make us fall back by threatening our communications with Lille. In point of fact, on the 9th Floréal (April 28), he proceeded to Mouscron with eighteen thousand men, and was imprudently exposing himself to the attack of fifty thousand French troops, who might have crushed him in his retreat. Moreau and Souham, bringing up immediately a part of their forces towards their exposed communications, marched to Mouscron, and resolved to engage with Clerfaut. He was intrenched in a position accessible only by five narrow defiles, defended by a formidable artillery. On the 10th Floréal (April 29th), orders were closed his long and glorious career. This noble veteran, aged seventy-six years, carried with him the regret and the admiration of the army.

Nothing could be more brilliant than the opening of the campaign at the eastern Pyrenees. In the quarter of the western Pyrenees, we took the valley of Bastan; and these triumphs over the Spaniards, whom we had never yet conquered, excited universal satisfaction.

While this unavailing attempt against the centre was being made, the diversion which was being effected in Flanders against Clerfaut had perfectly succeeded. Souham and Moreau had started from Lille, and had got to Menin and Courtrai on the 7th Floréal (April 26). It is well known that those latter two fortresses are situated on a line with each other upon Lys, the other on its banks. Moreau invested the first, Souham seized upon the second. Clerfaut, mistaken as to the march of the French, sought them where they were not to be found. However, he soon became apprised of the investment of Menin and the capture of Courtrai, and then tried to make us fall back by threatening our communications with Lille. In point of fact, on the 9th Floréal (April 28), he proceeded to Mouscron with eighteen thousand men, and was imprudently exposing himself to the attack of fifty thousand French troops, who might have crushed him in his retreat. Moreau and Souham, bringing up immediately a part of their forces towards their exposed communications, marched to Mouscron, and resolved to engage with Clerfaut. He was intrenched in a position accessible only by five narrow defiles, defended by a formidable artillery. On the 10th Floréal (April 29th), orders were given for making the attack. Our young soldiers, most of whom saw fire for the first time, did not at first keep their ground; but the generals and officers exposed themselves exceedingly in endeavouring to rally them; they succeeded, and the positions were carried. Clerfaut lost twelve hundred prisoners, eighty-four of whom were officers, thirty-three pieces of cannon, four pair of colours, and five hundred muskets. This was our first victory in the north, and it raised the courage of the army in an extraordinary degree. Menin was taken immediately afterwards. A division of emigrants who found themselves surrounded in the place, escaped by gallantly cutting their way through sword in hand.

The success of the left wing, and the defeat of the centre, determined Pichegru and Carnot to abandon the centre entirely, and to direct their attention exclusively to the wings. Pichegru despatched General Bonnaud with twenty thousand men to Sanghien near Lille, in order to secure the communications with Moreau and Souham. He left at Guise no more than twenty thousand men under General Ferrand, and detached the rest in the direction of Maubeuge, to join the divisions of Desjardins and Charbonnier. These united forces made the right wing, destined to act upon the Sambre, amount to fifty-six thousand men. Carnot, forming a much more correct judgment than Pichegru as to the state of things, issued an order which decided the result of the campaign. Beginning to be made sensible that the point from which an attack upon the allies might be directed was the Sambre and the Meuse; that if beaten on that line, they would be separated from their main support; he ordered Jourdan to get together fifteen thousand men from the army of the Rhine, to leave upon the western slope of the Vosges the troops absolutely necessary for covering that frontier, then to quit the Moselle with forty-five thousand men, and proceed to the Sambre by forced marches. Jourdan's army, united to the army of Maubeuge, was to form a mass of ninety or a hundred thousand men, and to effect the inevitable defeat of the allies upon the decisive point. This order, the most brilliant of the whole campaign, and that to which the entire results are to be attributed, was issued on the 11th Floréal (April 30th), from the office of the committee of public welfare.

In the meantime Cobourg had taken Landrecies. Not attaching by any means sufficient importance to the defeat of Clerfaut, he contented himself by detaching the duke of York towards Lamain, between Tournay and Lillo.

Clerfaut had proceeded into West Flanders, between the advanced left of the French and the sea. In this manner he became farther than ever removed from the grand army and from the relief which the duke of York was bringing him. The French, so disposed, that one division should support and replace the others (échelonnés) at Lille. Menin and Courtrai formed an advanced column in Flanders. Clerfaut, having got to Thielt, was between the sea and this column; and the duke of York, posted at Lamain, before Tournay, was between this column and the grand allied mass. Clerfaut was desirous of making an attempt upon Courtrai, and proceeded to attack it on the 21st Floréal (May 10). Souham was at this moment in rear of Courtrai; he promptly made his arrangements, returned to the fortress to relieve Vandamme, and, while he made ready for a sortie, he detached MacDonald and Mallinckrodt to Menin, with orders to cross the Lys at that place, and to get in the rear of Clerfaut. The engagement took place on the 22nd (May 11). Clerfaut had took the best situation he could on the causeway of Bruges and in the suburbs, but our young recruits boldly braved the fire from the houses and the batteries, and after a violent rencontre, obliged Clerfaut to retreat. Four thousand men belonging to both sides covered the field of battle; and if instead of getting on the enemy's rear on the side next to Menin, they had got at his rear on the opposite side, they could have cut off his retreat towards Flanders.

This was the second time that Clerfaut had been beaten by our victorious left wing. Our right wing, on the Sambre, was not so fortunate. Commanded by several generals, who held a council of war with the representatives, Saint-Just and Lebas, it was not so judiciously directed as the two divisions commanded by Souham and Moreau. Kléber and Marceau, who had been removed thither from La Vendée, might have led it on to victory, but their opinions were not much heeded. The movement prescribed to this right wing was to pass the Sambre, so as to march in the direction of Mons: a first passage was attempted on the 20th Floréal (May 9), but the necessary arrangements not having been made on the other bank, the army could not maintain its ground there, and was obliged to recross the Sambre in confusion. On the 22nd, Saint-Just resolved to try a second passage, notwithstanding the failure of the first. It would have been much better to have awaited the arrival of Jourdan, who, with his forty-five thousand men, must have rendered the success of the right wing infallible. But Saint-Just would not admit of hesitation or delay; and the generals were forced to obey this terrible proconsul. The new passage was not more lucky than the first. The French army crossed the Sambre a second time; but again attacked on the other bank before it had gained a firm position there, it would have been lost but for the intrepidity of Marceau and the firmness of Kléber.

Thus for a month past the contending parties had been fighting from Maubeuge to the sea with incredible resolution, and without any decisive successes. Successful on the left, we were unfortunate on the right; but our troops got into order, and the bold and skilful movement prescribed to Jourdan led the way to important results.

Mack's plan had become impracticable. The Prussian general Moellendorf refused to repair to the Sambre, observing that he had no orders to that effect from his court. The English diplomatists were about compelling the Prussian cabinet to make an explanation relative to the treaty of the Hague, and in the mean time, Cobourg, exposed to an attack on one of his wings, had been obliged to disband his centre, after the example of Pichegru. He had reinforced Kaunitz towards the Sambre, and had moved the main body of his army towards Flanders, to the environs of Tournay. A decisive action was, therefore, about to take place on the left, for the moment was fast approaching when mighty masses were about to come into collision and fight with one another.

There was at that time a plan conceived at the Austrian staff, a plan which was called the destructive plan; the scope of this plan was to cut off the French army from Lille, to surround it, and then to annihilate it. Such an operation was practicable, for the allies could bring nearly one hundred thousand men into action against seventy thousand; but they made rather singular arrangements for attaining this object. The French were still distributed in the following manner. Souham and Moreau at Menin and Courtray with fifty thousand men, and Bonnaud in the environs of Lille with twenty thousand. The allies were still divided upon the two flanks of this advanced line; Clerfaut's division on the left in West Flanders, and the mass of the allies on the right, in the direction of Tournay. The allies resolved to make a concentric effort on Turcoing, which separates Menin and Courtray from Lille. Clerfaut was to march thither from West Flanders, passing through Werwick and Luicelles. Generals de Busch, Otto, and the duke of York, advancing to Roubaix and Mouvaux, was to form a junction with Clerfaut. By this latter junction, Souham and Moreau would be cut off from Lille. General Kinsky and the archduke Charles, were directed, with two strong columns, to drive Bonnaud back into Lille. These arrangements, in order to have succeeded, would have required a combination of movements impossible to effect. The greater part of these corps had to proceed from extremely distant points, and Clerfaut had to march through the French army.

These movements were to be executed on the 28th Floréal (May 17). Pichegru at that time had gone to the left wing of the Sambre, to repair the checks which that wing had just experienced. Souham and Moreau took the command of the army in the absence of Pichegru. The first demonstration of the designs of the allies was given them by the march of Clerfaut to Werwick: they instantly moved from that quarter; but, on learning that the main army of the enemy was approaching on the opposite side and threatening their communications, they formed a prompt and judicious resolution, namely, to make an attempt on Turcoing, with a view to possess themselves of this decisive position between Menin and Lille. Moreau remained with Vandamme's division before Clerfaut, in order to retard his march, and Souham marched upon Turcoing with forty-five thousand men. The communications with Lille not being yet interrupted, the French general could therefore send orders to Bonnaud to advance on his side to Turcoing, and to make a powerful effort to preserve the communication with that position and Lille. The arrangements of the French generals had the most complete success. Clerfaut could advance but slowly; delayed at Werwick, he could not reach Luicelles on the prescribed day. General de Busch had at first possessed himself of Mourbœn, but had afterwards received a slight check, and Otto, having subdivided his troops in order to render him assistance, was not left sufficiently strong in his forces at Turcoing; lastly, the duke of York had advanced to Roubaix and Mouvaux, without seeing anything of Clerfaut. or being able to effect a junction with him; Kinsky and the archduke Charles had not arrived towards Lille till very late in the day of the 28th (May 17). Next morning, the 29th (May 18), Souham marched briskly upon Turcoing, carrying all before him, and made himself master of that important position. Bonnaud, on his part, marching from Lille upon the duke of York, who was to put himself between Turcoing and Lille, found him with his troops in subdivided portions upon an extended line. The English, though taken unawares, attempted to make a stand, but our young recruits, marching with ardour, compelled them to give way, and to throw down their arms, and fly. The rout was so complete, that the duke of York, riding off at full gallop, was indebted solely to the swiftness of his horse for his escape. From that moment the confusion among the allies became general; and from the heights of Templeuve the emperor of Austria witnessed the flight of his whole army. Meanwhile, the archduke Charles, ill supplied with intelligence, and disadvantageously posted, was remaining inactive below Lille, and Clerfaut, stopped towards the Lys, was compelled to retreat; such was the fate of this "destructive" plan (plan de destruction). It gave us several thousand prisoners, a great quantity of ordnance, and the glory of a great victory, obtained by seventy thousand men over nearly one hundred thousand.

Pichegru arrived when the battle was won. All the allied corps fell back upon Tournay; and Clerfaut, getting back to Flanders, resumed his position at Thielt. Pichegru did not make the best use of this important victory. The allies were grouped near Tournay, having their right supported on the Scheldt. The French general was desirous of intercepting a quantity of forage coming up the Scheldt, and he made his whole army fight for this puerile object. Drawing near the Scheldt, he closely surrounded the allies in their semicircular position of Tournay. Presently every one of his regiments were successively engaged upon this semicircle. The action was hottest at Pont-a-Chin, by the side of the Scheldt. For twelve hours there was a most frightful carnage, and without any possible result. From seven to eight thousand men perished on both sides. The French army fell back, after burning some boats, and losing in part that superiority which the battle of Turcoing had secured for it.

We might nevertheless consider ourselves as victorious in Flanders; and the necessity to which Cobourg was reduced of sending for reinforcements elsewhere, soon rendered our superiority there more decided. On the Sambre, Saint-Just had desired to effect a third passage, and to invest Charleroi; but Kaunitz being reinforced, had caused the siege to be raised at the moment when, by great good fortune, Jourdan arrived with the whole army of the Moselle. From that time, ninety thousand men were about to act on the true line of operations, and terminate the fluctuations of victory. On the Rhine nothing of importance had occurred, except that General Möllendorff, taking advantage of the diminution of our forces in that quarter, had taken from us the post of Kayserslautern, but he relapsed into inactivity immediately after his gaining this advantage. Thus, from the month of Prairial (the end of May), and along the whole line of the North, we had not only withstood the league of the allied powers, but had also triumphed over this league in several engagements. We had gained one great victory, and we were advancing on the two wings of their army in Flanders and on the Sambre. The loss of Landrecies was nothing by the side of these advantages, as also of those of which our present situation guaranteed the possession.

The war of La Vendée was not entirely concluded after the rout of Savenay. Three of the leaders were out of danger: Larochejacquelein, Stofflet, and Marigny. Besides these three chiefs, Charette, who, instead of crossing the Loire, had taken the island of Noirmoutiers, remained in Lower Vendée. This war was, however, confined to simple skirmishing, and was not of a nature to give the republic any uneasiness. General Turreau had been appointed to the command of the west. He had divided the available army into moveable columns, which scoured the country, directing their course concentrically to one and the same point. They fought with the fugitive bands when they fell in with them; and when they had none to fight with, they executed the decree of the convention; that is to say, they burned the forests and the villages, and carried away the inhabitants, in order to transport them elsewhere. Several actions had taken place, but they had not been productive of any important results. Haxo, after having recaptured the isles of Noirmoutiers and Bouin from Charette, had several times been in the expectation of capturing him also; but this daring party-leader had always escaped, and shortly afterwards made his appearance upon the field of battle with a constancy not less admirable than his adroitness. This unhappy war was thenceforward nothing else than a war of devastation. General Turreau had been constrained to adopt a cruel measure, namely, to order the inhabitants of the villages to quit the country, upon pain of being treated as enemies if they remained there any longer. This measure compelled them either to quit the soil from which they drew their means of existence, or else to submit to military executions. Such are the inevitable miseries of civil wars.

Brittany had become the theatre of a novel kind of war, the war of the Chouans. That province had already shown some disposition to imitate La Vendée; but the tendency to rise in rebellion was not so general, some individuals only, taking advantage of particular localities, had engaged in unconnected acts of spoliation. The remains of the Vendean column, which had passed into Brittany, soon increased the number of these followers of the Vendean party. Their principal station was in the forest of Perche, and they scoured the country in bands of forty or fifty, sometimes attacking the gendarmerie, levying contributions on small communes, and committing these disorders in the name of the royal and catholic cause. But the substantive war was at an end, and all that remained was to lament the particular calamities which afflicted these unhappy provinces.

In the colonies and at sea, the war was not less active than on the continent. The wealthy settlement of Saint-Domingo had been the theatre of the greatest horrors of which history makes mention. The whites had embraced with enthusiasm the cause of the revolution, which they thought would necessarily lead to their independence of the mother country. The mulattoes had not embraced the cause less cordially than the whites; but they looked for something more than the political independence of the colony, and aspired to the rights of citizenship, which had always been refused them. The constituent assembly had recognised the rights of the mulattoes; but the whites, who wanted to keep the revolution to themselves, had then revolted, and a civil war had commenced between the old race of free men, and those who had been just enfranchised. Taking advantage of this war, the blacks in their turn had appeared upon the stage, and had introduced themselves thither by fire and blood. They had murdered their masters and burned their property. From this moment the colony was abandoned to the most horrible confusion; both parties reproached the other with the new enemy that had newly presented himself, and accused each other of having supplied him with arms. The blacks, without yet ranging themselves on one side or the other, ravaged the country. However, it was not long before that, being excited by the Spanish party, they pretended to espouse the royal cause. To add still further to the confusion, the English had interfered. One part of the whites had applied to them at a period of danger, and had ceded to them the very important fort of Saint-Nicholas. The commissioner, Santhonax, assisted principally by the mulattoes and part of the whites, opposed the invasion of the English, and was only able at last to find one expedient for repelling it, and that was, to recognise the freedom of the blacks who should declare themselves in favour of the republic. The convention had confirmed this measure, and by a decree proclaimed all the negroes free. From that time, a portion of them who had espoused the royal cause went over to the party of the republicans; and the English, entrenched in fort Saint-Nicholas, had no longer any hopes of securing that rich settlement, which, after being long under spoliation, was destined at last to become independent of any foreign power. Guadalupe, after having been captured and recaptured, still continued in our possession; but Martinique was absolutely lost to us for ever.

Such were the disorders in the colonies. At sea, an important event had occurred, namely, the arrival of that convoy from America, so impatiently expected in our ports. The Brest squadron, to the number of thirty vessels, had issued from that port, as we have already observed, with orders to cruise, but by no means to fight, unless the safety of the convoy imperatively required it. We have already stated that Jean-Bou-Saint-André was on board the admiral's ship; that Villaret-Joyeuse had been promoted from captain to commander of the squadron; that peasants who had never seen the sea had been placed among the crews; and that these sailors, officers, and admirals of a day, were sent forth to fight the veteran English navy. Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse set sail on the 1st Prairial (May 20), and made sail for the isles of Coves and Flores, to wait for convoy. He took by the way a great number of English merchantmen, the captains of which said to him, "You are taking us by retail, but Lord Howe will soon take you by wholesale."¹² In point of fact, that admiral was actually cruising off the coasts of Brittany and Normandy with thirty-three vessels and twelve frigates. On the 9th Prairial (May 28th), the French squadron descried a fleet. The impatient crews watched those black specks on the horizon growing gradually larger and larger; and when they ascertained them to be the English, they set up shouts of enthusiasm, and insisted on fighting, with that ardent patriotism which has always distinguished the inhabitants of our coasts. Though the instructions given to the admiral did not allow him to fight unless to save the convoy, yet Jean-Bon-Saint-André, himself hurried away by the universal enthusiasm, consented to fight, and caused orders to be issued to prepare for action. Towards evening a ship of the rear division, Le Révolutionnaire, that had shortened sail, was brought to action by the English, made an obstinate resistance, lost her captain, and was obliged to be towed into Rochefort. Night prevented the action from becoming general.

Next day, the 10th (May 29), the two squadrons were opposite to one another. The English manœuvred against our rear-guard. The movement which we made to protect it brought on a general engagement. The French not managing so expertly two of their ships, L'Indomptable and Le Tyrannique, found themselves opposed to a very superior force, and fought with determined courage. Villaret-Joyeuse ordered some of his squadron to go to the relief of the ships engaged; but his orders being neither clearly understood or properly executed, he advanced alone at the risk of not being followed. However, this was done soon afterwards; our whole squadron bore down upon that of the enemy, and obliged it to sheer off. Unfortunately, we had lost the weather-gauge. We kept up a terrible fire upon the English, but were unable to pursue them. However, we retained our two ships and the field of battle.

On the 11th and 12th (May 30 and 31), a thick fog enveloped the two fleets. The French endeavoured to lead the English to the north and to the west of the track which the convoy was to pursue. On the 13th the fog dispersed, and a bright sun shone upon both the fleets. The French had no more than twenty-six sail, while their adversaries had thirty-six. They again insisted on fighting, and it was agreed to indulge their ardour, for the purpose of occupying the English, and drawing them from the track of the convoy which was to pass over the scene of the battle of the 10th.

This action, one of the most memorable that ocean ever witnessed, began about nine in the morning. Lord Howe bore down to cut our line. A false tack of our ship, La Montague, allowed him to break our line, to cut off our left wing, and to overwhelm it with all his force. Our right and our van were left separated. The admiral would have rallied them around him, with the intention of bearing down upon the English squadron, but he had lost the advantage of the wind, and it was five hours before he was able to approach the field of battle. Meanwhile the ships engaged fought with extraordinary heroism. The English, superior in manœuvring, lost their advantage when the ships lay to by each other's side, and had to encounter a tremendous fire and formidable boardings. It was in the heat of this obstinate action that the vessel Le Vengeur, dismasted, half destroyed, and ready to founder, refused to strike her colours at the peril of foundering in the sea. The English were the first to cease firing, and retired astounded at the defence we had offered. They had taken six of our ships. Next day, Villaret-Joyeuse, having collected his van and his right, was for bearing down upon them, and wresting from them their prey. The English, who had suffered greatly, might then perhaps have yielded the victory to us. Jean-Bon-Saint-André was against engaging with the enemy afresh, notwithstanding the enthusiasm of the crews. The English could therefore regain their ports unmolested; they returned to them, indeed, dismayed even with their victory, and filled with admiration at the intrepidity of our young seamen. But the essential object of this terrible conflict was accomplished. Admiral Venstabel had on that same day, the 13th, sailed over the scene of the battle of the 10th, which he found covered with wrecks, and had entered without accident the ports of France.

Thus victorious at the Pyrenees and at the Alps, formidable in the Netherlands, heroic at sea, and strong enough to dispute a naval victory most dearly bought by the English, we commenced the year 1794 in the most brilliant and glorious manner.

WHILE the republic was victorious abroad, its internal state had been incessantly in a state of conflict. Its afflictions were still the same. These were the assignats, the maximum, the scarcity of the necessaries of life, the law against suspected persons, and the revolutionary tribunals.

The embarrassments resulting from the necessity for regulating all the motions of commerce could not but increase. They had been compelled to be constantly qualifying the law of the maximum; they were obliged to except from its operation, at one time, spun thread, and to allow it ten per cent. above the tariff; at another time, pins, cambrics, linen, muslins, grazes, laces of thread and silk, silks and silken goods. But while there existed a necessity for excepting from the operation of the maximum a great number of commodities, there were others which it was expedient should be subjected thereto. Thus, the value of horses having become extraordinarily high, they could not avoid determining their value according to height and quality. From these means the same inconvenience invariably arose. Commerce stood still and closed its markets, or opened clandestine ones, and here it was that authority became powerless. If by means of the assignments it had been enabled to reduce the value of the national domains, and if by the maximum it had been enabled to place assignments on a par with merchandize, there was no way of preventing merchandize from being withdrawn and concealed from purchasers. So there was no end to the complaints raised against tradesmen who withdrew from business or who shut up their shops.

However, the state of articles of consumption caused less anxiety this year. The convoys arrived from America, and an abundant harvest had furnished a sufficient quantity of corn for the consumption of France. The committee, regulating every thing with the same vigour, had ordered a general statement of the harvest to be drawn up by the commission for provisioning, and that a portion of the corn should be immediately thrashed for the supply of the markets. There had been some apprehension that the itinerant reapers who leave their homes and go to the corn countries would demand extraordinary wages; the committee, therefore, declared that persons of both sexes, who were accustomed to do harvest work, were under compulsory requisition, and that their wages should be determined by the local authorities. It was not long before, the journeymen butchers and bakers having turned out, the committee adopted a more general measure, and put in requisition mechanics of all kinds who were employed in the preparation, the carriage, and the sale of articles forming the necessities of life.

The supplies of meat were far more difficult to regulate, and caused greater anxiety. This deficiency was more than ever felt at Paris, and, from the moment that the Hebertists attempted to make this scarcity a pretext for exciting commotion, the evil had rather increased. It had been found necessary to confine the city of Paris to a daily ration of meat. The commission for provisioning had settled the daily consumption at seventy five oxen, one hundred and fifty quintals* weight of veal and mutton, and two hundred hogs. The commission procured the requisite cattle, and sent them to the Hospice de l'Humanité, which was appointed as the common and only authorized slaughter house. The butchers nominated by each section came thither, and took away the meat which was set out for them, and received a quantity in proportion to the population which they had to supply. Every five days they were to distribute to each family at the rate of half a pound of meat for each individual. On this occasion reference was to be made to the tickets delivered by the revolutionary committees for the distribution of bread, stating the number of individuals of which each family was composed. To prevent disturbance and long waiting, an order was issued prohibiting every one from going before six in the morning to the doors of the butchers.

The insufficiency of these regulations soon became apparent, already, as we have before observed, a set of surreptitious traders had established themselves in business as butchers. Their number daily increased. The cattle had not time to reach the markets of Neaumont, Poissy, and Stenay, the country butchers forestalled them, and came to buy them even in the fields. Taking advantage of the less vigilant execution of the laws in the rural communes, these butchers sold above the maximum, and supplied all the inhabitants of the great communes, and particularly those of Paris, who were not content with the allowance of half a pound every five days. In this manner the country butchers absorbed the entire trade of the town butchers, who had scarcely anything to do since they were confined to the distribution of the rations. Several of them even applied for a law authorizing them to determine the leases of their shops. It then became necessary to make new regulations to prevent the diverting of cattle from the markets, and the occupiers of pasture grounds were subjected to declarations and to extremely annoying formalities. They were obliged to descend to still more minute details, as wood and charcoal no longer came to town on account of the maximum, under circumstances which suggested suspicions of a monopoly, no one was allowed to have more than four loads of wood, nor more than two loads of charcoal.

The new government addressed itself with a singular activity to surmount all the difficulties of the career that was set before it. While the government was issuing these multiplied regulations, it was engaged in reforming agriculture, altering the law of agricultural tenancy so as to effect an allotment of land in tillage, introducing a new system of cropping, an improved laying down of meadows, and the rearing of cattle, it decreed the institution of botanical gardens in all the capital towns of the departments, for the purpose of naturalizing exotic plants, forming nurseries of trees of all kinds, and opening courses of popular lectures on agriculture, adapted to the comprehension of agriculturists. Measures were taken for the general drainage of marshes, upon a comprehensive and well conceived plan, it was settled that the state should advance the funds for this great undertaking, and that the owners whose lands should be drained and rendered wholesome should be subjected to a charge, or that they should sell their lands at a certain price. Lastly, the government invited all the architects to furnish plans for rebuilding the villages or demolishing the mansions. Improvements were ordered to be made, so as to render the garden of the Tuileries more commodious for the public, and artists were called upon to furnish a design for changing the Opera House into a covered arena, where the people might assemble in winter.

Thus it executed, or at least attempted, almost every thing at once, so true it is, that the more one has to do, the more one is capable of doing! The department of the finances was not the least difficult or the least perplexing of all. We have already witnessed what resources were devised in the month of August 1793, to make the assignats current money, by withdrawing part of them from circulation. The one thousand millions withdrawn by the forced loan, and the victories which terminated the campaign of 1793, raised them, and, as we have elsewhere stated, they rose almost to par, owing to the terrible laws which rendered the possession of coin so dangerous. However, this apparent prosperity was of no long duration, the assignats very soon fell, and the quantity of issues rapidly depreciated them. Part of them, indeed, were called in as a consequence of the sales of the national property, but these receipts did not effect the remainder in circulation. That the government possessions should be sold above the estimate was not surprising, for the estimate had been made in money, and payment was made in assignats. Hence it arose that the consideration money was actually much below the true value, although it appeared to be above the estimated value. Moreover, this absorption of the assignats could be but slow, while the issue was necessarily immense and rapid. Twelve hundred thousand men to arm and to pay, with ammunition to provide, a navy to fit out, with a depreciated paper, required enormous quantities of that paper. This having become the only resource, and, besides, the capital of the assignats increasing daily by confiscations, the government made up its mind to employ them so long as occasion required. It abolished the distinction between the ordinary and the extraordinary fund, the one arising from the produce of the taxes, the other from the creation of assignats. These two sorts of resources were consolidated, and, whenever occasion required, the revenue was supplied by fresh issues. At the beginning of 1794 (year II), the sum total of the issues was doubled. Nearly four thousand millions had been added to the sum which previously existed, and had raised it to about eight thousand millions. Deducting the amounts which had been called in and burned, and those which had not yet been expended, there remained in present circulation five thousand five hundred and thirty six millions. In Messidor, year II (June, 1794), the creation of a new thousand millions of assignats was decreed, of all sums, from one thousand francs to fifteen sous. The committee of the finances again had recourse to a forced loan from the rich. The tax rolls of the preceding year were made use of, and upon those who were entered in those rolls was imposed an extraordinary war tax of one tenth of the forced loan, that is to say, of ten millions. This sum was not levied upon them as a loan to be repaid, but as a tax which was to be paid by them without return.

In order to complete the establishment of the Great Book, and the plan of giving uniformity to the public debt, all that remained was to fund (capitaliser) the life annuities, and to convert them into so much stock (inscription). These annuities, of all descriptions and of every possible form, became the object of the most complicated stock-jobbing, like the old loan contracts they were subject to the same inconvenience, that of being founded upon a royal title, and obtaining a marked preference to republican securities, for it was commonly said, that if the republic should consent to pay the debts of the monarchy, the monarchy would never consent to pay those of the republic. Cambon, therefore, completed his grand work of the reformation of the debt by moving for and carrying a law which funded the life annuities, the titles were to be delivered up by the notaries and burned as the contracts had been. The capital originally furnished by the annuitant was converted into an inscription, and bore a perpetual interest at five per cent instead of a life interest. At the same time, out of consideration for aged persons and annuitants of limited means, who desired to augment their resources by sinking them in life annuities, small annuities were preserved, and bore a proportion to the age of the individuals. From forty to fifty, every annuity from fifteen hundred to two thousand francs was suffered to stand, from fifty to sixty, every annuity of three to four thousand, and so on to the age of one hundred, and up to the sum of ten thousand five hundred francs. If the annuitant who came within the cases hereafter mentioned possessed an annuity exceeding the fixed standard, the surplus was funded. Certainly, greater consideration could not well be shown for moderate incomes and for old age; and yet no law ever gave rise to more remonstrances and complaints, and the convention incurred more censure for a discreet and humanely conducted measure, than for those terrible measures which daily marked its dictatorship. The stock jobbers were greatly thwarted, because the law, in order to recognize the credits, required certificates of the parties being alive. The holders of titles of emigrants could not easily procure these certificates, hence the jobbers, who were sufferers by this condition, complained loudly in the name of the aged and the infirm, they persuaded the annuitants that they should not be paid, because the mode of doing business, and the formalities which it required, would be attended with endless delays, however, it turned out otherwise. Cambon caused some clauses of the decree to be quashed, and by constantly watching its operation at the treasury, he carried its provisions into effect with the greatest promptitude. The annuitants who did not job in the titles of others, but lived upon their own income, were speedily paid, and as Barrere said, instead of waiting their turn of payment in uncovered courts, exposed to the inclemency of the weather, they waited in the warm and comfortable rooms of the treasury.

By the side of these beneficial reforms, cruelties continued to run their course. The law which expelled the ex nobles from Paris, the fortresses, and the sea ports, gave rise to a multitude of vexations. To distinguish true nobility, now that to be noble was a misfortune, was not at this time more easy than when it had been a distinction. Females originally belonging to the commonalty, who had married nobles, and become widows, the purchasers of offices who had taken the title of "esquire," claimed to be exempted from a distinction which formerly they had so eagerly coveted. This law then opened a new career to arbitrary power and to the most tyrannical vexations.

The representatives on mission exercised their authority with the utmost rigour, and some of them indulged in extravagant and monstrous cruelties. In Paris the prisons daily became more and more crowded. The committee of general safety had instituted a police which spread terror every where. At the head of it was a man named Heron, who had under his direction a host of agents, all worthy of him. They were what were called the messengers (porteurs d'ordre) of the committees. Some tampered with espionage, others were furnished with secret and even not unfrequently with blank orders, and went to make arrests either in Paris or in the provinces. A sum of money was allowed them for each of their expeditions; they extorted more from the prisoners, and thus added rapine to cruelty. All the adventurers who had been disbanded with the revolutionary army, or dismissed from Bouchotte's office, had taken up this new trade, and become much more formidable in their new vocation. They were every where, in the promenades, the coffee-houses, and places of public amusement; every body was continually apprehensive of being watched and overheard by one of these inquisitors. Owing to their assiduity, the number of the suspected had increased in Paris alone to seven or eight thousand. The prisons no longer exhibited the spectacle which they had at first presented; the rich were no longer seen there contributing to the support of the poor, and men of all opinions, of all ranks, leading at the common charge a tolerably agreeable life, and consoling themselves by the pleasures of the arts for the hardships of captivity. This system had appeared too indulgent for those who were termed aristocrats; an outcry was raised that luxury and plenty were the lot of the suspected, while the people outside were reduced to rations; that the wealthy prisoners amused themselves by recklessly wasting those provisions which might have served to support the indigent citizens; and it had been decided that some other order should be taken with the prisons. Accordingly refectories and common tables had been established; the prisoners were supplied at fixed hours and in large halls with an unpalatable and unwholesome food, for which they were obliged to pay very dear. They were no longer allowed to purchase food in place of that which they could not eat. They were visited by officials, and stripped of their assignats, and thus it was that they deprived them of every means of procuring themselves comforts. They were no longer allowed the same liberty of seeing one another, and living in common; and to the torments of solitary confinement were superadded the terrors of death, who every day was bestirring himself more and more. The revolutionary tribunal began, after the trial of the Hébertists and the Dantonists, to sacrifice victims in troops of twenty at a time. It had condemned the family of the Malesherbes and their relatives to the number of fifteen or twenty persons. The venerable head of that house had met death with the serenity and the cheerfulness of a sage. Stumbling as he was walking to the scaffold, "This false step," said he, "is a bad omen: a Roman would have gone back to his home." To the family of Malesherbes had been added twenty-two members of the parliament [of Paris]. The parliament of Toulouse had been almost entirely sacrificed. Lastly, the farmers of the taxes were brought to trial on account of their former contracts with the revenue. It was proved that these contracts had contained conditions burdensome to the state, and the revolutionary tribunal sent them to the scaffold for exactions on tobacco, salt, &c. Among them was that illustrious votary of science, Lavoisier the chemist, who was in vain solicited a respite of a few days, that he might commit to paper a discovery he had made.

The impulsion was given; the government officiated, fought, and slaughtered with a horrible consistency. The committees placed in the centre of the state governed with the same vigour. The convention, still keeping silence, decreed pensions to the widows or the children of the soldiers who had died for their country, reviewed the judgments of tribunals, interpreted decrees, regulated the exchange of certain government domains; in short, occupied themselves with the most trivial and the most subordinate affairs. Barrère attended the convention every day, to read his reports of victories to the members; these reports he called carmagnoles. At the end of every month he acquainted them, as a matter of form, that the powers of the committees were expired, and that they must renew them. He then received for answer, amidst cheering, that the committees had but to prosecute their labours. Sometimes he even forgot this formality, and the committees nevertheless continued to exercise their functions.

It is in these moments of absolute submission that exasperated spirits burst forth, and that the point of the dagger is more to be dreaded than despotic authorities. At that time there was a man employed as a doorkeeper in the national lottery office who had formerly been in the service of several great families, and who felt a deadly hate against the prevailing system. This man was about fifty years of age, and his name was Admiral. He had formed the design to assassinate one of the influential members of the committee of public welfare, either Robespierre or Collot d'Herbois. For some time past he had lodged in the same house with Collot d'Herbois, in the Rue Favart, and he was undecided as to whom it should be, Collot or Robespierre. Having on the 3d of Prairial (22d May) resolved upon dispatching the latter, he had gone to the committee of public welfare, and there waited for him the whole day, in the gallery adjoining the hall where the committee sat. Not meeting with him there, he had returned home, and posted himself on the staircase, with the intention of dispatching Collot d'Herbois. About midnight Collot came in and went up stairs, when Admiral snapped a pistol at him with the muzzle to his head. The pistol missed fire. Admiral pointed it again, but again the weapon refused its office. He snapped the pistol the third time, and this time it went off, but he hit only the wall. A scuffle then ensued. Collot d'Herbois cried "Murder." Luckily for him, a patrol was passing along the street, and hastened up on hearing the noise. Admiral then ran up stairs to his room, where he fastened himself in. He was followed by the patrol, who threatened to break open the door. He declared that he was armed, and that he would fire upon any one who should dare to come near him. This threat did not intimidate the patrol. The door was forced. A locksmith named Geffroy advanced first, and received a musket-shot, which almost wounded him mortally. Admiral was immediately secured and taken to prison. When examined by Fouquier Tienville, he related the circumstances of his life, his schemes, and the attempts he had made to dispatch Robespierre before he thought of Collot d'Herbois. He was asked who had instigated him to commit this crime. He replied with firmness, that it was no crime at all, that it was a service he had desired to render to his country; that he alone had conceived this design, without any suggestion from another; and that his only regret was that it had not succeeded.

The intelligence of this attempt spread with rapidity, and, as is usual in these cases, it increased the power of those against whom it was directed. Barrère went the very next day, the 4th Prairial, to the convention, to read his report of this new machination of Pitt's. "The factions of the interior," said he, "are unceasingly in correspondence with that coalition-mongering, assassin-hiring government that persecutes liberty as its greatest enemy. While we place justice and virtue on the order of the day, the allies make crime and assassination the order of the day. Every where you will find the baleful spirit of the Englishman: in our markets, in our contracts, on our seas, on the continents, in the throngings of Europe as well as in our cities. It is the same head that directs the hands that assassinated Basseville at Rome, the French sailors in the harbour of Genoa, the faithful French in Corsica; it is the same head that directs the steel against Lepelletier and Marat, the guillotine against Chalier, and the pistol against Collot d'Herbois." Barrère then produced letters from London and Holland, which had been intercepted, and which stated that the plots of Pitt were levelled against the committees, and particularly against Robespierre. One of these letters in substance said, "We much fear Robespierre's influence. The more concentrated the French republican government becomes, the more strength it will acquire, and the more difficult it will be to overturn."

The like mode of exhibiting facts was well calculated to excite a strong interest in favour of the committees, and especially of Robespierre, and to identify their existence with that of the republic. Barrère then related the fact, with all its circumstances; spoke of the tender solicitude which the constituted authorities had manifested for protecting the national representation, and described in high-flown terms the conduct of citizen Geoffroy, who had received a severe wound in seizing the assassin. The convention received Barrère's report with applause; she gave directions for investigation, so as to ascertain whether Ladmiral had any accomplices; she passed a vote of thanks to citizen Geoffroy, and resolved that, to compensate him, the bulletin of the state of his wound should be read every day at the tribune. Couthon then made a thundering speech, to propose that Barrère's report should be translated into all languages, and diffused throughout every country. "Pitt! Cobourg!" he exclaimed, "and all of you, cowardly and petty tyrants, who consider the world as your heritage, and who, in the last moments of your agony, struggle with such fury, whet, whet your daggers; we despise you too much to fear you, and you well know that we are too great to imitate you!" The hall rang with applause. "But," continued Couthon, "the law whose reign affrights you has her sword uplifted over you. She will strike every one of you. The human race requires this example, and the heaven that you outrage has so ordained it."

Collot d'Herbois then entered, as if to receive the congratulations of the assembly. He was hailed with redoubled acclamations, and had difficulty in making himself heard. Robespierre exhibited greater tact in staying away, and affecting to withdraw himself from the homage that awaited him.

On this same day, the 4th, a young female named Cécile Renault, called at Robespierre's door with a parcel under her arm. She asked to see him, and urgently insisted on being introduced to him. She said that a public functionary ought to be always ready to receive those who have occasion to speak to him, and at last began to abuse Robespierre's landlord's family, the Duploix, who refused to admit her. From the pressing solicitations of this young female, and from her strange appearance, suspicions were entertained; they seized her, and handed her over to the police. On opening her parcel, it was found to contain some clothes and two knives. They immediately imagined that she intended to assassinate Robespierre: on being interrogated, she answered with the same assurance as Ladmiral. She was asked what was her business with Robespierre. She replied that it was only to see what sort of man a tyrant was. She was still further asked what was meant by the clothes and the knives. She replied that she had not intended to make any particular use of the knives; that as for the clothes, she had provided herself with them because she expected to be carried to prison, and from prison to the guillotine. She added, that she was a royalist, because she preferred one king to fifty thousand. They pressed her further, but she refused to make answer, and desired to be conducted to the scaffold.

These indicia were deemed quite sufficient to warrant the conclusion that young Renault was one of the assassins armed against Robespierre. To this last circumstance was presently added another. On the following day, at Choisy-sur-Seine, a citizen was relating in a coffee-house the attempt to murder Collot d'Herbois, and was congratulating himself that it had not succeeded. A monk named Saintanax, who was listening to the account, replied, that it was unfortunate that those wretches belonging to the committee had escaped, but he hoped that, sooner or later, they would be despatched. The unfortunate man was immediately secured, and they conveyed him the very same night to Paris. This was more than enough to induce conjectures of vast ramifications; they were persuaded that a band of assassins had been got ready; people eagerly thronged around the members of the committee, begging them to be cautious, and to take care of those lives that were so valuable to the country. The sections assembled and sent fresh deputations and addresses to the convention. They said that, among the miracles which Providence had wrought in favour of the republic, the mode in which Robespierre and Collot d'Herbois had just escaped the blow of the assassins was not the least. One of them even proposed to furnish a guard of twenty-five men to protect the lives of the members of the committee.

him to meet. Robespierre and Collot d'Herbois repaired thither, and were received with the utmost enthusiasm. When power has discovered the method of ensuring a general submission, it has merely to allow baser minds to act, and these soon complete the structure of its omnipotence, and add thereto divine worship and honours. Robespierre and Collot d'Herbois were gazed at with eager curiosity. "Look," it was said, "at those valuable men! The God of free men has saved them. He has thrown his ægis over them, and has preserved them for the republic. It is but right that they should share the honours which France has decreed to the martyrs of liberty; she will thus have the satisfaction of honouring them without having to weep over their funeral urn*." Collot first spoke with his usual vehemence, and said, that the emotion that he experienced at that moment, demonstrated to him how delightful it was to serve the country, even at the price of the greatest perils. "He gathered from it," he said, "this truth, that he who has incurred any danger for his country, receives new strength from the fraternal interest which he excites. Those kind plaintiffs create a new pact of union between all men of strong minds. The tyrants kept at bay, and feeling their end approaching, would in vain have recourse to daggers, to poison, to stratagems; the republicans will not alarm themselves. Do not the tyrants know, that when one patriot expires under their blows, that it is upon his tomb that all the patriots who survive him swear to take vengeance for the crime, and to eternize liberty?"

Collot finished amidst applause. Benthollé required that the president should give Collot and Robespierre the fraternal embrace in the name of the whole society. Legendre, with the anxious demonstration of a man who had been the friend of Danton, and who was compelled to submit to more than one meanness to cause that friendship to be forgotten, said, that the hand of guilt had been raised to strike virtue, but that the God of nature had prevented the consummation of the crime. He exhorted all the citizens to form a guard around the members of the committee, and he himself offered to be the first to protect their invaluable lives. At this moment some sections solicited admittance into the hall: enthusiasm was extreme, but the concourse was so great that they were obliged to remain at the door.

The insignia of supreme power were offered to the committee, and this was the fit moment to repel such an offer. It was quite sufficient for leaders of sufficient tact to cause such insignia to be tendered, and then they might make a merit of refusing them. The members of the committee who were present opposed with affected indignation the proposal that guards should be assigned them. Couthon immediately addressed the assembly. He was astonished, he said, at the proposal which had just been made to the Jacobins, and which had already been before the convention. He was willing, indeed, to attribute it to pure intentions, but none but despots surrounded themselves with guards, and the members of the committee did not desire to assimilate themselves with despots. They wanted no guards to defend them.

It was virtue, the confidence of the people, and Providence who watched over their lives; they needed no other guarantees for their safety. Besides, they would always be ready to die at their post and in the cause of liberty.

Legendre lost no time in explaining his motion. He said that he did not mean to give precisely an organized guard to the members of the committee, but to induce the good citizens to watch over their safety. At any rate, if he was at all in the wrong, he withdrew his motion, and his intention had been well meant. Robespierre succeeded him in the tribune. It was the first time that he had risen to speak. A loud and prolonged cheering burst forth on all sides; silence was at length obtained, and he was allowed to begin. "I am one of those," said he, "whom the events that have just occurred ought least of all to interest. Still I cannot refrain from making a few reflections. That the defenders of liberty should be exposed to the daggers of tyranny, is no more than what might be expected. I have already said, if we fight the enemy, if we thwart the factions, we shall be assassinated. That which I have foreseen is now come to pass. The soldiers of tyranny have bitten the dust, the traitors have perished on the scaffold, and daggers have been sharpened against us. I know not what impression these events make upon you, but that which they have produced upon me is this: I have felt that it was easier to assassinate us than to conquer our principles or to subdue our armies. I said to myself, that the more uncertain and precarious the lives of the defenders of the people are, the more anxious ought they to be to fulfil their last days in actions promoting the cause of liberty. I, who do not consider that no one need live, were it not to live for virtue and for Providence, I find myself placed in a state in which certainly the assassins did not wish to place me. I feel more independence than ever of the wickedness of men. The crimes of tyrants and the steel of the assassins have rendered me more free and more formidable to all the enemies of the people; my soul is more disposed than ever to unveil the traitors, and to tear from them the mask with which they presume to cover themselves. Frenchmen! friends of equality, leave to us the duty of employing the short remainder of life that Providence may grant, in combating the enemies that surround you!" The acclamation increased, and transports of enthusiasm burst from all parts of the hall. Robespierre, after having enjoyed this enthusiasm for a few moments, again addressed the club against a certain member of the society, who had moved that civic honours should be paid to Geffroy. Considering this as an approximation to that motion which was for assigning guards to the members of the committees, he maintained that these motions could answer no other end than that of exciting envy and obloquy against the government, by burdening it with superfluous honours. He accordingly moved and carried the vote of expulsion against that member who had required civic honours for Geffroy.

Considering the degree of power the committee had attained, it had to cautiously divest itself of the semblance of sovereign power. In point of fact, the committee exercised an absolute dictatorship, but there was no necessity for letting this too prominently appear; and all the externals, all the parade of power, could but compromise it to no purpose. An ambitious soldier, who obtains the mastery by his sword, and who aspires to a throne, loses no time in impressing a character upon the authority he assumes, especially by blending the energies of power with power itself; but the leaders of a party, who govern that party solely by their influence, and who desire to retain the superiority, are obliged to be continually caressing that party, and be constantly ascribing to it the very power they enjoy, and, while they control its motions, appear to be subservient to it.

It would have been, therefore, bad policy for the members of the committee of public welfare, and the leaders of the Mountain party, to separate themselves from the Mountain and the convention; on the contrary, their policy was to reject whatever might seem to raise them too high above their colleagues. A change in public opinion was already taking place, and the extent of their power forcibly struck even persons of their own party. They were already regarded as dictators, and it was Robespierre in particular whose high influence began to dazzle all eyes. The saying was no longer, The committee will have it so, but Robespierre will have it so.

Fouquier-Tinville said to an individual whom he threatened with the revolutionary tribunal, "If Robespierre requires it, thou shalt go thither." The agents of the executive power constantly alluded to Robespierre in their operations, and seemed to refer every thing to him as to the cause from which every thing emanated. The victims were not behindhand in imputing their sufferings to him, and the inmates of the prisons recognized but one oppressor—Robespierre. Foreigners themselves, in their proclamations, styled the French soldiers Robespierre's soldiers. This expression occurred in one of the duke of York's proclamations. Feeling deeply sensible how dangerous a use was made of his name, Robespierre was very anxious to deliver a speech to the convention, for the purpose of repelling what he termed perfidious insinuations, the object of which was to ruin him; he repeated it at the Jacobins, and there drew down that applause which was usually bestowed on all his harangues. The Journal de la Montagne and the Moniteur having given, on the following day, a report of this speech, and having styled it a masterpiece not susceptible of analysis, because every word had the point of a sentence, and every sentence a page, he became exceedingly enraged, and complained next day at the Jacobins of the nauseous flattery of the members of the committee emitted by the journals, who pursued this course for the purpose of causing their downfall, by investing them with the semblance of absolute power. The two journals were obliged to retract what they had said, and to apologize for having praised Robespierre, by the assurance that their intentions were pure.

Robespierre had vanity, but was not sufficiently great to be ambitious. Covetous of flattery and respect, he feasted upon them, and justified himself for receiving them by declaring that he had no wish to be all-powerful. He was surrounded by a kind of court, composed of a few men, but chiefly of a great number of women, who paid him the most refined attentions. Constantly resorting to his residence, they manifested the most unceasing solicitude for his welfare; they were continually praising amongst themselves his virtue, his eloquence, his genius; they called him a divine creature, and quite exalted above our human nature. A superannuated marchioness was the principal of those females who waited, like real devotees, upon this proud and bloodthirsty pontiff. Nothing is so certain a demonstration of the public infatuation as the gross admiration of the women. It is they also who, by their active attentions, their language, and their restless affectation, make it appear ridiculous.

With the women who adored Robespierre, was associated a ridiculous and extravagant sect that had been recently formed. When religious worship has been abolished, then it is that sects abound, because the absolute necessity for believing in something seeks to indulge itself with other illusions in lieu of those which have been destroyed. One old woman, named Catharine Th  ot, whose brain was turned in the prisons of the Bastille, called herself the mother of God, and proclaimed the speedy coming of a new Messiah. He was, according to her, to make his appearance amidst universal disorder, and the time when he was to appear was to be the commencement of an eternal existence to the elect. These elect were to propagate their faith by all means whatever, and to exterminate the enemies of the true God. Dom Gerle, the Carthusian who had figured under the constituent assembly, and whose weak imagination had been led astray by mystic reveries, was one of their two prophets. Robespierre was the other. Deism had doubtless obtained him this distinction. Catharine Th  ot called him her beloved son; she initiated treated him with reverence, and regarded him as a supernatural being, called to fulfil sublime and mysterious destinies. He was probably apprized of their follies, and, without being their accomplice, he profited by their error. Certain it is, that he had patronised Dom Gerle, that he received frequent visits from him, and that he had given him a certificate of civism, signed by his own hand, to deliver him from the prosecutions of a revolutionary committee. This sect was widely spread; it had its form of worship and its practices, which contributed not a little to its propagation; it held its meetings at Catharine Th  ot's, in a remote quarter of Paris, near the Pantheon. Here the reception of new members took place, in the presence of the mother of God, Dom Gerle, and the principal elect. This sect began to be known; and it was also vaguely known that Robespierre was looked upon by this sect as a prophet. Thus every thing contributed to exalt him and to compromise him.

It was more particularly among his colleagues that jealousies began to arise. Divisions already manifested themselves, and this was natural; for the power of the committee being established, the time for rivalries had arrived. The committee was split into several distinct groups. The twelve members who composed it were reduced to eleven by the death of H  rault-Sechelles. Jean-Bon-Saint-Andr   and Prieur (of La Marne) had been always absent on missions. Carnot was exclusively occupied with the war department, Prieur (of the Cote d'Or) with the army supplies, Robert Lindet with provisions. These were called the "lookers into things" (les gens d'examen). They took no part either in politics or mutual pretensions. Robespierre, Saint Just, and Couthon, were hooked together. A sort of superiority of mind and manners, the high opinion which they seemed to have of themselves, and the contempt which they appeared to feel for their other colleagues, had induced them to stand apart; they were called the men of the high hand (les gens de la haute main). Barriere was, in their estimation, nothing else than a weak and pusillanimous creature, possessing suppleness enough to be at every body's service, Collot d'Herbois a club declaimer; Billaud-Varennes a man of moderate capacity, gloomy, and envious. These last three could not forgive the secret disdain of their colleagues. Barriere durst not take a decided part, but Collot d'Herbois, and particularly Billaud, whose temper was indomitable, could not conceal the hatred that began to excite them. They sought to make use of their colleagues called "les gens d'examen," and to gain them to their side. They had also reason to hope for support from the committee of general safety, who began to feel annoyed at the supremacy of the committee of public welfare. The committee of general safety could ill brook this dependence, confined particularly as it was to the police, and frequently superintended or controlled in its operations by the committee of public welfare. Arnauld, Vadier, Vouland, Jagot, Louis (of the Bas Rhin), the most cruel of its members, were at the same time the most disposed to shake off the yoke. Two of their colleagues, who were called the listeners (les ecouteurs), watched them for Robespierre, and this kind of espionage at last became insupportable. The malcontents in both committees might therefore confederate and become dangerous to Robespierre, Couthon, and Saint Just. We must particularly observe that it was the rivalry of pride and power which commenced the dissension, and not a mere difference of political opinion; for Billaud Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, Vadier, Vouland, Arnauld, Jagot, and Louis, were revolutionists not less formidable than the three adversaries whom they sought to overthrow.

A particular circumstance tended to alienate the committee of general safety from these dominants in the committee of public welfare. Great complaints were made of the arrests, which daily became more numerous, and which were often unjust, as they were directed against a great number of individuals known to be excellent patriots; complaint was also made of the rapine and vexations of the numerous agents to whom the committee of general welfare had delegated its inquisitorial powers. Robespierre, Saint Just, and Couthon, not daring to obtain either the abolition or the renewal of this committee, devised a scheme for establishing an office of police, as part and parcel of the committee of public welfare. This was, without annihilating the committee of general safety, to encroach upon and dispossess it of its functions. Saint Just was to have had the conduct of this office, but having been sent to the army, he had not been able to perform that duty, and Robespierre had undertaken it in his stead. The office of police began to set at liberty those who had been apprehended by order of the committee of general safety; and the latter committee acted in the same manner towards the other. This usurpation of functions led to an open rupture. It soon got wind; and, notwithstanding the secrecy which shrouded the government, it soon began to be no secret, that its members were by no means on good terms with one another.

Other causes of mutual dissatisfaction, not less serious, arose in the convention; its bearing was still very submissive, but some of its members, who had conceived fears on their own account, acquired somewhat more boldness from the danger. These were old friends of Danton's, who had compromised themselves by their connexion with him, and who were sometimes threatened as the relics of the party of the corruptionists and indulgents. Some had been guilty of malversation in their functions, and dreaded the application of the system of virtue, others showed themselves openly opposed to any further display of the daily increasing severities. The most compromised among them was Tallien. It was said that he had been guilty of malversation at the commune at the time he was a member, and afterwards at Bordeaux when on mission there. It was added that, while in the latter city, he had suffered himself to be melted and subdued by a young and beautiful female, who had accompanied him to Paris, and just been thrown into prison. Next to Tallien was mentioned Bourdon (of the Oise), who was compromised by his contest with the Sturm party, and who had been expelled from the Jacobins jointly with Fabre, Camille, and Philippeau; Thuriot's name was also mentioned as having been excluded by the Jacobins; Legendre, who, notwithstanding his daily submissions, could never obtain forgiveness for his former connexion with Danton; and, lastly, Freron, Barras, Lacombe, Rovère, Monestier, Paris, &c., all of them either friends of Danton, or disapprovers of the system followed by the government. These personal inquietudes were on the increase; the number of the discontented were daily increasing, and they were ready to join those members of one or the other committee who would hold out their hand to them.

The 20th Prairial (June 8) was at hand, this was the day appointed for the fête in honour of the Supreme Being. On the 16th [Prairial] they were to name a president, the convention unanimously appointed Robespierre to take the presidency. This was conferring on him the principal part on the 20th. His colleagues, we see, still strove to flatter and to soothe him by dint of honours. Preparations had been made on a very large scale, according to the plan conceived by David. The fête was expected to be magnificent. On the morning of the 20th the sun shone forth in all its brightness. The multitude, ever ready to attend the sights afforded them by public authority, had collected. Robespierre kept them waiting a considerable time. At length he appeared amidst the convention. He was dressed with extraordinary care. His head was covered with feathers, and in his hand he held, as did every one of the representatives, a bunch of flowers, fruit, and ears of corn. On his countenance, usually so gloomy, was manifested a cheerfulness that was very uncommon with him. An amphitheatre was erected in the centre of the garden of the Tuilleries.

This was occupied by the convention; and on the right and left were several groups of boys, men, aged persons, and females. The boys wore wreaths of violets, the youths wreaths of myrtle, the men wreaths of oak, and the aged people wreaths of ivy and olive. The women held their daughters by the hand, and carried baskets of flowers. On the other side of the amphitheatre were figures representing Atheism, Discord, and Egotism. These were to be burned. As soon as the convention had taken its place, the ceremony commenced with music. The president then delivered an introductory discourse upon the object of the festival. "Republican Frenchmen!" said he, "At length has arrived that ever-to-be-remembered day of happiness which the French people consecrate to the Supreme Being. Never did the world, which he created, exhibit a spectacle so worthy of his attention. He has beheld tyranny, crime, and imposture reigning upon earth. He beholds at this moment an individual nation at war with all the oppressors of mankind, suspending the course of its heroic labours, to lift its thoughts and its prayers towards the Supreme Being, who gave it the mission to undertake and the courage to execute them."

After having spoken for a few minutes, the president descended from the amphitheatre, and, seizing a torch, set fire to the figures of Atheism, Discord, and Egotism. From amidst the ashes arose the statue of Wisdom; but it was remarked that it was smoked by the flames from whence it had to make its appearance. Robespierre returned to his place, and delivered a second speech upon the extirpation of the vices leagued against the republic. After this ceremony, the assembly set out in procession for the Champ de Mars. The self-sufficiency of Robespierre seemed extraordinarily increased, and he affected to walk considerably in advance of his colleagues. But some of them, feeling indignant, kept up with him, and lavished on him the keenest sarcasms. Some laughed at the new pontiff, and said, in allusion to the smoky statue of Wisdom, that his wisdom was obscured. Others uttered the word "tyrant," and exclaimed that there were still some Brutus left. Bourdon (of the Oise) addressed to him these prophetic words: "The Tarpeian rock is hard by the capitol."

The procession at length reached the Champ de Mars. There, instead of the former altar of the country, was to be observed a lofty mountain. At the top of this mountain was a tree, beneath the boughs of which the convention seated itself. On each side of the mountain were placed different groups of boys, old men, and women. A symphony commenced; the groups then chanted a chorus, alternately responsive to each other. At length, on a given signal, the youths drew their swords, and swore between the hands* of the old men to defend the country; the matrons lifted their infants in their arms; all present raised their hands towards heaven, and the oath to conquer was mingled with the homage paid to the Supreme Being. They then returned to the garden of the Tuileries, and the fête concluded with public diversions.

Such was the famous fête celebrated in honour of the Supreme Being. Robespierre had on that day attained the summit of honours, but he had only gained this pinnacle to be hurled from it. Everybody had been wounded by his pride. The sarcasms had reached his ear, and he had observed in some of his colleagues a boldness that was unusual in them. Next day he went to the committee of public welfare, and expressed his indignation against the deputies who had insulted him on the preceding day. He complained of those friends of Danton's, those impure relics of the indulgent corruptionist party, and demanded the sacrifice of them. Billaud-Varennes and Collot d'Herbois, who were not less wounded than their colleagues at the part which Robespierre had performed the day before, appeared extremely cold, and by no means over-anxious to avenge him. They did not indeed justify the deputies of whom Robespierre complained, but, recurring to the fête itself, they expressed apprehensions concerning its effects. It had, they said, alienated many minds. Besides, those ideas of the Supreme Being, of the immortality of the soul, those pompous ceremonies, looked like a return to the superstitions of old, and were likely to impart a retrograde impulse to the revolution. Robespierre was irritated by these remarks. He maintained that it never was his intent that the revolution should retrograde; that, on the contrary, he had done every thing to accelerate its course. In proof of this, he introduced the draught of a bill which he had just drawn up with Couthon, and which would tend to make the revolutionary tribunal still more sanguinary. Now let us see what this bill meant.

For two months past it had been contemplated to annex some qualifications in the constitution of the revolutionary tribunal. The defence made by Danton, Camille, Fabre, and Lacroix, had shown the inconvenience of the formalities that had been suffered to remain. Every day it had to hear witnesses and advocates; and how brief soever the examination of witnesses, howsoever restricted the defence of the advocates, still they occasioned a great loss of time, and always occasioned a certain scandal. The heads of this government, who wished every thing to be done promptly and without noise, were desirous of suppressing these inconvenient formalities. Having brought themselves to consider that the revolution had a right to annihilate all its opponents, and that they could be distinguished by the mere inspection of party, they thought that the revolutionary proceedings could not be rendered too expeditious. Robespierre, to whom this tribunal was specially committed, had prepared this law with no one else than Couthon, for Saint-Just was away. He had not deigned to consult his other colleagues of the committee of public welfare, and he merely came to read the bill to them before he brought it in. Although Barrère and Collot d'Herbois were quite as well disposed as himself to allow its sanguinary tendencies, they could not but receive it coldly, because it was drawn and settled without their concurrence. It was, however, arranged that it should be brought in on the following day, and that Couthon should report upon it; but no satisfaction was given to Robespierre for the affronts which he had received on the preceding day.

The committee of general safety was no more consulted upon this law than the committee of public welfare had been. That committee knew that a law was in preparation, but was not invited to take any part in it. It desired, at least, that out of fifty jurors who should be nominated, it should name twenty; but Robespierre rejected them all, and chose none but his own creatures. The motion for bringing in the bill was made on the 22nd Prairial. Couthon had reported upon it. After the usual declamations as to the inflexibility and promptitude which ought to be the characteristics of revolutionary justice, he read the draught bill, which was couched in terrific language. The tribunal was to divide itself into four sections, composed of a president, three judges, and nine jurors. Twelve judges and fifty jurors were appointed, who were to succeed one another in the exercise of their functions, so that the tribunal might sit every day. The only punishment awarded was to be death. The tribunal (so said the bill) was to be instituted for the purpose of punishing the enemies of the people, according to a most vague and comprehensive definition of what was meant by the enemies of the people. In this description were to be included dishonest contractors, and the alarmists who circulated bad news. The power of bringing citizens before the revolutionary tribunal was assigned to the two committees, to the convention, to the representatives on mission, and to Fouquier-Tinville, the public accuser. If there existed proofs, were they substantive facts or moral inferences, no witnesses were to be examined. Lastly, there was a clause to this effect:—The law grants patriot jurors as defenders to unjustly accused patriots, but it does not accord the same indulgence to conspirators.

A law that annihilated all the ordinary safeguards, that confined all the necessary formalities to a bare expression of opinion, and which, when it invested the two committees with the power of handing the citizens over to the revolutionary tribunal, thus gave them power over life and death, such a law could not but excite real alarm, especially in those members of the convention who were already uneasy on their own account. It was not stated in the bill whether the committees were to have the power of bringing the representatives before the tribunal without applying for a previous impeachment; for if so, the committees from that time would possess the power of sending their colleagues to death, without any further trouble than that of pointing them out to Fouquier-Tinville. Thus the remains of the faction of the indulgents were roused, and for the first time during a considerable period an opposition was manifested in the body of the assembly. Ruamps moved that the bill should be printed and the report adjourned, saying, that if this law were carried without adjournment, all they would have to do would be to blow out their brains. Lecointre of Versailles seconded the motion of adjournment. Robespierre immediately came forward to combat this unexpected resistance. "There are," said he, "two modes of thinking as old as our revolution; one which tends to punish conspirators in a prompt and inevitable manner; the other which tends to acquit the guilty: this latter has never ceased to show itself anew upon all occasions. It again manifests itself to-day, and I come to put it down. For these two months, the tribunal has been complaining of the shackles which obstruct its progress; it complains of the difficulty of procuring jurors; a law therefore is required. Amidst the victories of the republic, the conspirators are more active and more ardent than ever; we must smite them. This unexpected opposition which now manifests itself is not natural. You wish to divide the convention; you wish to intimidate it."—"No, no!"—cried several voices. "Nobody shall divide us." "It is us," added Robespierre, "who have always defended the convention, it is not us that it will have occasion to fear. At any rate we have now arrived at the point where they may kill us, but where they shall not prevent us from saving the country."

Robespierre never missed a single opportunity of talking of daggers and assassins, as if he were always exposed to assassination. Bourdon of the Oise replied to him, and said that if the tribunal were in need of jurors, it had but to adopt immediately the proposed list, for nobody had any wish to clog the march of justice, but that the further consideration of the bill ought to be adjourned. Robespierre again ascended the tribunal, and said that the law was neither more complicated or more obscure than a great many others which had been passed without discussion, and that at a moment when the defenders of liberty were threatened with the dagger, no one should strive to relax in their exertions to suppress the conspirators. He concluded with proposing to discuss the whole law, article by article, and to sit till midnight, if it were necessary, that it might be passed that very day. The overwhelming power of Robespierre once more prevailed over all other considerations. The bill was read and carried in a few minutes.

However, Bourdon, Tallien, and all the members who entertained personal apprehensions, were exceedingly alarmed at such a law as this. The committees being thus empowered to hand over citizens to the revolutionary tribunal, not even the members of the national representation being excepted, they trembled lest they themselves should be carried off some night, and delivered over to Fouquier, without the convention knowing any thing about the matter. On the following day, the 23rd of Prairial, Bourdon required to be heard. "When the power was given," said he, "to the committees of public welfare and of general safety of handing over the citizens to the revolutionary tribunal, it certainly never could have been intended by the convention that the power of the committees should include its members without a previous impeachment." "No, no," was shouted from various quarters. "I was expecting these marks of dissatisfaction," continued Bourdon; "they prove to me that liberty is imperishable." This remark caused a deep sensation. Bourdon moved that it should be declared, that members of the convention could not be delivered up to the tribunal without a previous impeachment. The committees were absent; Bourdon's motion was favourably received. Merlin moved the previous question; whereat there were evident symptoms of discontent; but he explained himself, and moved the previous question with a preamble to this effect: that the convention could not divest itself of the right of claiming sole cognizance of its own members. The preamble was adapted to the general satisfaction.

A scene which occurred in the evening gave still greater point to this novel opposition. Tallien and Bourdon were walking in the Tuileries; the spies of the committee of public welfare followed them very closely. At length Tallien indignantly turned round, provoked them, called them base spies of the committee, and bade them go and tell their masters what they had seen and heard. This scene caused a great sensation. Couthon and Robespierre were highly indignant. Next day they went to the convention, resolved to complain bitterly of the opposition they experienced. Delacroix and Mallarmé afforded them the opportunity. Delacroix required, that those whom the law termed "corrupters of morals" should be defined more precisely. Mallarmé also inquired what was meant by these words: the law grants unjustly accused patriots no other defender than the conscience of patriot jurors. Couthon then ascended the tribune, complained of the amendments adopted on the preceding day, and of those which were then proposed. "It was a libel on the committee of public welfare," said he, "to even imagine the possibility that it wished to have the power of sending members of the convention to the scaffold. That the tyrants should scandalize the committee was natural; but that the convention itself should give ear to the scandal, such an injustice was insupportable, and he could not help complaining of it. Yesterday a member prided himself on a fortunate by-word, which proved that liberty was imperishable, as if liberty had been threatened. They had availed themselves of the moment when the members of the committee were absent for making this attack. Such conduct," added Couthon, "is unworthy, and I propose that the amendments made yesterday be annulled, as well as those which have just been moved to-day." Bourdon replied, that to demand explanations concerning a law was not a crime; that if he piqued himself on a by-word, it was because he was gratified to find himself of the same opinion with the convention; and that, if the same acrimony were to be shown on both sides, discussion would be impossible. "I am accused," said he, "of talking like Pitt and Cobourg. Were I to reply in the same spirit, where should we be? I respect Couthon, I respect the committee, I respect the mountain, which has saved liberty." These explanations of Bourdon's were applauded; but these explanations after all were but excuses, and the authority of the dictators was still too strong to be openly defied. Robespierre then addressed the convention, and made a prolix speech, full of pride and bitterness. "Mountainers," said he, "ye will always be the bulwark of the public liberty, for ye have nothing in common with the intriguers and the perverse, whosoever they be. If they strive to thrust themselves into your ranks, they are not the less strangers to your principles. Suffer not a few intriguers, more despicable than others, because more hypocritical, to attempt to misguide a portion of you, and to set themselves up as leaders of a party." Bourdon, (of the Oise,) here interrupted Robespierre, saying that he had never attempted to set himself up for the leader of a party. Robespierre took no notice of him, but proceeded thus: "It would be the height of opprobrium, if calumniators, deluding our colleagues—" Bourdon again interrupted him. "I call upon him," said he, "to prove what he is advancing; he has just been saying, in plain terms, that I am a villain." "I have not mentioned Bourdon," replied Robespierre; "if the cap fits him, let him wear it"! Yes, the mountain is pure, she is undefiled; intriguers belong not to the mountain." Robespierre then dwelt at considerable length upon the efforts which had been made to frighten the members of the convention, and to persuade them that they were in danger. He said that it was the guilty only who were afraid, and it was they who wanted to make others afraid. He then related what had occurred the preceding evening between Tallien and the spies, whom he called the messengers (couriers) of the committee. This relation drew very warm explanations from Tallien, and brought upon the latter abundance of abuse. At length, all these discussions terminated in the adoption of the motions made by Couthon and Robespierre. The amendments of the preceding day were annulled, those of that day rejected, and the frightful enactment of the 22d remained in its original state.

The leaders of the committee were once more victorious. Their adversaries were trembling; Tallien, Bourdon, Ruamps, Delacroix, Mallarmé, and all those who had made objections to the law, gave themselves up for lost, and expected every moment to be arrested. Though a previous decree of the convention was still necessary for impeaching a member, it was still in such a state of intimidation, that she was likely to grant whatever should be asked at her hands. She had passed a decree against Danton; it was to be presumed that she would not hesitate to pass another against such of his friends as survived him. A report was soon circulated that the list was drawn up; the number of the victims was stated to amount to twelve, and afterwards to eighteen. Their names were mentioned. The alarm soon spread, and more than sixty members of the convention ceased to sleep at their own homes.

However, there was one impediment against their lives being disposed of quite so easily as they themselves apprehended. The chiefs of the government were divided. It has already been noticed that Billaud-Varennes, Collot, and Barrère, had replied coldly to the first complaints of Robespierre against his colleagues. The members of the committee of general safety were more opposed to him than ever; for they were to be kept aloof from all co-operation in the law of the 22d [Prairial], and it even appears that some of them were threatened. Robespierre and Couthon carried their demands to a great length. They would have sacrificed a great number of deputies; they talked of Tallien, Bourdon (of the Oise), Thuriot, Rovère, Lecointre, Panis, Monestier, Legendre, Fréron, and Barras; they even called for Cambon, whose financial reputation annoyed them, and who had seemed adverse to their cruelties; lastly, they would have extended their vengeance to several of the most decided members of the mountain, as Duval, Audouin, and Leonard Bourdon†. The members of the committee of public welfare, Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, as well as all those of the committee of general safety, refused their assent. The danger, by extending to so great a number of lives, might very soon finish by threatening themselves.

They were thus demonstrating these hostile tendencies, with not the slightest inclination of making a further sacrifice, when one concluding circumstance produced a definitive rupture. The committee of general safety had discovered the meetings that were held at the house of Catharine Théot. They had learned that this extravagant sect had turned Robespierre into a prophet, and that the latter had given a certificate of civism to Dom Gerle. Thereupon Vadier, Vouland, Jagot, and Amar, immediately resolved to avenge themselves, by representing this sect as an assemblage of dangerous conspirators, by denouncing it to the convention, and by thus making Robespierre come in for a share of the ridicule and odium which necessarily attach thereto. They sent an agent, named Sénart, who, under the pretence of becoming a member of the society, was admitted to one of its meetings. In the midst of the ceremony he stepped to a window, gave a signal to an armed force, and apprehended almost the entire sect. Dom Gerle and Catharine Théot were apprehended. Upon Dom Gerle was found the certificate of civism given him by Robespierre; and even in the bed of the mother of God they discovered a letter written by her to her beloved son, to the chief prophet, in short, to Robespierre. When Robespierre received intelligence that the sect was about to undergo a prosecution, he was against it, and caused a discussion on this subject in the committee of public welfare. We have already seen that Billaud and Collot were not very favourable to deism, and that they viewed with umbrage the political use which Robespierre wished to make of that creed. They were for the prosecution. Robespierre insisting that these prosecutions should be stopped, the discussion grew extremely warm; he experienced the most abusive language, failed to carry his point, and retired weeping with rage. The quarrel had been so vehement, that, lest they should be overheard by persons passing through the galleries, the members of the committee resolved to adjourn their sitting to the floor above. The report upon the sect of Catharine Théot was presented to the convention. Barrère, in order to revenge himself in his own way on Robespierre, had secretly drawn up the report, which Vouland was to read. The sect was therein represented as equally ridiculous and atrocious. The convention, alternately indignant and amused with the picture drawn by Barrère, decreed the accusation of the principal leaders of the sect, and sent them before the revolutionary tribunal.

Robespierre, indignant at the opposition he had experienced, and the abusive language he had received, discontinued his attendance at the committee, and resolved to take no further part in its deliberations. He withdrew himself towards the end of Prairial (the middle of June). This secession proves of what description his ambition was. An ambitious man never betrays ill-humour; he is only the more excited by obstacles; he seizes the supreme power, and crushes those who have affronted him. A weak and vain declaimer is petulantly spiteful, and yields the contest when he finds a cessation of flattery or respect. Danton retired from indolence and disgust; Robespierre from wounded pride. This secession proved as fatal to him as it did to Danton. Couthon was left alone against Billaud-Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, and Barrère, and these latter were about to take every thing into their own hands.

These dissensions were not yet publicly known; all that got wind was, that the committees of public welfare and of general safety were not on good terms with each other: the public were delighted at this misunderstanding, and hoped that it would prevent fresh proscriptions. Those who were threatened courted the committee of general safety, and flattered it, and supplicated its protection, nay, had even received the most cheering assurances from some of its members. Elie Lacoste, Moses Bayle, Lavicomterie, and Dubarran, the best of the members of the committee of general safety, had promised to refuse their signature to any new list of proscription.

Amidst these contentions, the Jacobins were still devoted to Robespierre. They made as yet no distinction between the different members of the committee, between Couthon, Robespierre, and Saint-Just, on the one hand, and Billaud-Varennes, Collot, and Barrère, on the other; all they looked at was the revolutionary government on the one side, and on the other some remains of the indulgents, and some friends of Danton's, who, when the law of the 22d Prairial [8th June] was brought in, had recently set themselves in opposition to that wholesome form of government. Robespierre, who in supporting this law had defended that government, was still in their estimation the first and the greatest citizen of the republic; all the others were but so many intriguers, whose destruction must be accomplished. Accordingly, they did not fail to exclude Tallien from their committee of correspondence, because he had not replied to the accusations preferred against him on the sitting of the 24th [Prairial]. From that day, Collot and Billaud-Varennes, being fully sensible of Robespierre's influence, abstained from appearing at the Jacobins'. What could they have said? They could not have exposed their mere personal grievances, and made the public an arbiter between their pride and that of Robespierre. All they could do was to be silent and bide their time. Robespierre and Couthon had therefore an open field. The rumour of a new proscription having produced a dangerous effect, Couthon hastened to disavow, in the presence of the society, the designs which they were supposed to entertain against twenty-four, nay, even sixty members of the convention. "The shades of Danton, Hébert, and Chaumette still haunt us," said he; "they still seek to perpetuate trouble and dissension. What passed in the sitting of the 24th is a striking instance of this; there exists a desire to divide the government, to vilify its members, by describing them as Syllas and Neros; they deliberate in secret, they meet, they form pretended lists of proscription, they alarm the citizens, in order to set them against the public authority. A few days ago, it was reported that the committees intended to order the arrest of eighteen members of the convention; nay, even their names were given. Distrust these perfidious insinuations. Those who circulate such rumours are accomplices of Hébert's, and of Danton's; they dread the punishment of their guilty conduct; their object is to connect themselves with singleminded men, in the hope that, whilst concealed by them, they may easily escape the eye of justice. But be of good cheer; the number of the guilty is happily very small; it amounts to no more than four, or perhaps six; and they shall be smitten, for the time is come for delivering the republic from the few remaining enemies that are conspiring against it. Commit the charge of her salvation to the energy and the justice of the committees."

The reducing the number of the proscribed persons whom Robespierre wished to smite to a very few persons, exhibited considerable tact. The Jacobins applauded, as usual, the speech of Couthon; but that speech by no means tranquillized the threatened victims, and those who considered themselves in danger still continued to sleep away from home. Never had the terror been greater, not only in the convention, but in the prisons, and throughout France.

Those cruel agents of Robespierre, Fouquier-Tinville the accuser, and Dumas the president, were putting in force the law of the 22d Prairial, and were preparing to avail themselves of it for the purpose of desolating the prisons. Very soon, said Fouquier, there shall be put upon their doors this writing, This house to let. The intent was to get rid of the greater part of the suspected persons. The public had long been accustomed to consider these latter as irreconcilable enemies, whom they ought to destroy for the welfare of the republic. To sacrifice thousands of individuals, whose only fault was to have a certain bias of opinion, and whose opinions frequently coincided with their persecutors, seemed quite in the regular course of things, from the habit which people had acquired of destroying one another. The readiness with which they put others to death, or encountered death themselves, had become extraordinary. In the fields of battle, and upon the scaffold, thousands daily perished, and it no longer caused remark. The first murders committed in 1793 proceeded from a substantive irritation produced by the apprehension of danger. At this day the danger was passed; the republic was victorious; people were no longer murdered from angry motives, but from the fatal habitude of murder they had contracted. That formidable machine, which they had been obliged to construct in order to withstand enemies of every kind, was no longer necessary; but once set in action they knew not how to stop it. Every government must arrive at its excess, and does not perish till it has attained that excess. The revolutionary government was not able to cease on the very day that all the enemies of the republic were sufficiently terrified; it must needs go beyond that point, and it had to keep itself in motion until it raised a general indignation by its very atrocity. Human affairs have no other tendency. How was it that terrible circumstances had called for the creation of a government of death, which could neither reign or conquer except by death!

That which is still more frightful is, that when the signal is given, when the idea has taken root, that lives must be sacrificed, every thing concurs to carry out this horrid purpose with an extraordinary aptitude. Every one acts without remorse, without repugnance; one gets accustomed to it, just as the judge condemns criminals to death, like the surgeon who sees beings suffering under his instrument, like the general who orders the sacrifice of twenty thousand soldiers. A horrid jargon obtains in reference to these new operations; the people contrive to render it the object of facetious remarks; they invent pointed phrases to express sanguinary ideas. Every one, as drawn along with the current, and as stunned, keeps pace with the mass; and we see men who were yesterday engaged in the peaceful occupations of the arts and commerce, to-day applying themselves with the same facility to the work of death and destruction.

The committee had given the signal by the law of the 22d. Dumas and Fouquier had but too well understood it. However, some colourable pretence was requisite for immolating so many victims. What crime could be imputed to them, when most of them were peaceful unknown citizens, and whose existence was unknown to the state? It was conceived, that being confined in the prisons, they would take measures to liberate themselves; that their number would necessarily suggest an idea of their strength, and present the notion of making it available for their rescue. The pretended conspiracy of Dillon was the germ of this idea, which was illustrated in an atrocious manner. They made use of some miserable wretches, who being also prisoners, consented to act the infamous part of informers. They pointed out in the Luxembourg one hundred and sixty prisoners who, they said, had been concerned in Dillon's plot. Some of these listmakers were procured in all the other prison-houses, and in each prison-house they denounced one or two hundred persons as accomplices in the prison conspiracy. An attempt at escape made at La Force served but to give weight to this infamous invention, and immediately they began to send hundreds of these unfortunates before the revolutionary tribunal. They committed them from the various prisons to the Conciergerie, to go from thence before the tribunal, and then to the scaffold. In the night between the 18th and 19th of Messidor (July 6), the one hundred and sixty persons denounced at the Luxembourg were transferred. They trembled on hearing themselves called; they knew not what was laid to their charge; but what they considered most probable was the death reserved for them. The odious Fouquier, since he had been furnished with the law of the 22nd, had made great changes in the hall of the tribunal. Instead of the seats for the advocates and the bench of the accused, capable of holding eighteen or twenty persons, he had caused an amphitheatre to be built capable of containing one hundred, or one hundred and fifty accused at a time. This he called his little seats (ses petits gradins). Pushing his zeal to a kind of extravagance, he had even caused a scaffold to be erected in the very hall of the tribunal, and he proposed to have the one hundred and sixty accused in the Luxembourg tried at one and the same sitting.

The committee of public welfare, when informed of the kind of delirium which had possessed the mind of its public accuser, sent for him, and ordered him to remove the scaffold from the hall in which it was set up, and forbade him to send for more than sixty persons at once. Dost thou wish, then, said Collet d'Herbois, in a violent passion, to demo- realize punishment? It should, however, be remarked, that Fouquier has asserted the contrary, and maintained, that it was himself who demanded the trial of the one hundred and sixty in three divisions. Be that as it may, every thing proves that it was the committee who was less extravagant than their minister, and repressed his revolutionary delirium. The committee were obliged to send a second order to Fouquier-Tinville to remove the guillotine from the hall of the tribunal.

The one hundred and sixty were divided into three companies, and tried and executed in three days. The mode of procedure was quite as expeditious and quite as frightful as that adopted at the wicket of the Abbaye on the nights of the 2nd and 3rd of September. Carts ordered for every day were waiting from the morning in the courtyard of the Palace of Justice, and the accused could see them as they went up stairs to the tribunal. Dumas, the president, sitting like a maniac, had a pair of pistols on the table. He simply asked the accused their names, and added thereto some very general question. In the examination of the one hundred and sixty, the president said to one of them, "Dorival, do you know any thing of the conspiracy?"—"No."—"I expected that you would give that answer; but that will not do. The next." He thus addressed one Champigny: "Are you not an ex-noble?"—"Yes."—"The next." To Guédreville: "Are you a priest?"—"Yes; but I have taken the oath."—"You have no right to speak. The next." To one Ménil: "Were you not servant to the ex-constituent, Menou?"—"Yes."—"The next." To one Vély: "Were you not architect to Madame?"—"Yes; but I was dismissed in 1788."—"The next." To Goudrecourt: "Had you not your father-in-law at the Luxembourg?"—"Yes."—"The next." To Durlfort: "Were you not in the life-guards?"—"Yes; but I was disbanded in 1789."—"The next."

Such was the mode in which the trial of these unfortunates was conducted. The law required that the testimony of witnesses was not to be dispensed with, except when they had substantive or moral evidence; nevertheless, no witnesses were called, as it was pretended that there were proofs of this kind existing in every case. The jurors did not even take the trouble to retire to the consultation room. They returned their verdict before the audience, and sentence was immediately pronounced. The accused had scarcely time to rise and to utter their names. One day there was a person whose name was not upon the list of the accused, and who said to the court, "I am not accused; my name is not in your list." "What signifies that?" said Fouquier; "give it directly." He gave it, and was sent to death like the others. The utmost carelessness prevailed in this kind of barbarous administration. They frequently omitted, by reason of their indecent hurry, to deliver the act of accusation to the accused, and they were given them even in court. The most extraordinary mistakes were committed. A worthy old man, Loizerolles, heard along with his own surname the Christian names of his son called over: he forbore to remonstrate, and was sent to the scaffold. Some time afterwards the son was brought to trial in his turn; it was found that he ought not to be alive, since a person answering to all his names had been executed: it was his father. However, for all that he suffered. More than once, victims were called long after they had been executed. There were hundreds of acts of accusation quite ready, to which there was nothing to add but the designation of the individuals. The same course was taken with the judgments. The printing-office was by the side of the very hall of the tribunal: the forms were kept standing; the title, the matters of inducement, were ready composed; there was nothing but the names to be added. These were handed through a small loophole to the corrector of the press. Thousands of copies were immediately worked, and plunged families into mourning, and struck terror into the prisons. The hawkers came to sell the calendar of the tribunal under the prisoners' windows, crying, Here are the names of those who have gained prizes in the lottery of Saint Guillotine. The accused were executed at the rising of the court, or at latest on the morrow, if the day was too far advanced.

Ever since the passing of the law of the 22d of Prairial, fifty or sixty heads a day fell under the guillotine. That goes well, said Fouquier-Tinville: heads fall like slates. And he added, It must go still better next decade; I must have four hundred and fifty at least. For this purpose there were given what were called orders to the sheep (moutons), who undertook the office of being spies upon the suspected. These wretches had become the terror of the prisons; being confined as suspected persons, it could not exactly be known which of them it was who undertook to point out the victims; but it was guessed, from their insolence, from the preference shown them by the gaolers, from the orgies which they held in the lodges with the agents of the police. They frequently gave intimations of their importance, in order to traffic with it. They were caressed and implored by the trembling prisoners; they even received sums of money not to put names upon their lists. They made their selection at random; they said of one that he had used aristocratic language; of another, that he had been drinking on a certain day when a defeat of the armies was announced; and their mere pointing out was equivalent to a death-warrant. The names they furnished were inserted in so many acts of accusation; and in the evening they came to deliver these acts to the prisoners, and convey them to the Conciergerie. This was called, in the language of the gaolers, the Evening Journal. When those unhappy persons heard the rolling of the tumbrils which came to fetch them, they suffered quite as much in their mind as if they had been summoned to death. They ran to the gates, clung to the bars to listen to the list, and trembled lest they should hear their name pronounced by the mouth of the officer. When they were named, they embraced their companions in misfortune, and received their final farewell from them. Most distressing separations were frequently witnessed: that of a father parted from his children, a husband from his wife. Those who survived were quite as wretched as those who were conducted to the den of Fouquier-Tinville; they went back expecting soon to rejoin their relatives. When this fatal call of names was over, the prisoners breathed more freely, but only till the following day. Their anguish was then renewed, and the fatal rolling of the carts brought fresh terror along with it.

However, public sympathy began to be expressed in a way that gave some uneasiness to the exterminators. The shopkeepers in the Rue Saint Honoré, through which the carts passed every day, shut up their shops. To deprive the victims of these signs of grief, the scaffold was removed to the Barrière du Tronc, but not less pity was demonstrated in this quarter of the labouring people than in the best inhabited streets in Paris. The people, in a moment of irritation, may have no feeling for the victims whom they slaughter themselves, but the sight of the death of fifty or sixty unfortunate persons, against whom they are not excited by blind rage, is a spectacle which soon operates upon their sympathy. However, this sympathy was still silent and timid. All the most distinguished persons confined in the prisons had fallen: the unfortunate sister of Louis XVI. had been sacrificed in her turn; and from the upper classes of society a descent was now being made to the lower classes. We find at this period, on the list of the revolutionary tribunal, tailors, shoemakers, hairdressers, butchers, husbandmen, lemonade sellers, nay, even labouring men, condemned for sentiments and language deemed counter-revolutionary. To convey, in short, an idea of the number of executions at this period, suffice it to say, that between the month of March, 1793, the period of the tribunal entering upon its functions, and the month of June, 1794 (22 Prairial, year II.), it had condemned five hundred and seventy-seven persons; and that from the 10th of June (22 Prairial) to the (9 Thermidor) 27th of July, it condemned one thousand two hundred and eighty-five; so that the total number of victims up to the 9th Thermidor amounts to one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two.

However, these executioners were by no means well at ease. Dumas was troubled in his mind, and Fouquier durst not go out at night; he beheld the relatives of his victims ever ready to despatch him. On one occasion, passing with Sénaert through the wickets of the Louvre, he felt alarmed at a slight noise; it was caused by a person passing close to him. "If I had been alone," said he, "something would have befallen me."

In the principal cities of France, the terror was not less than at Paris. Carrier had been sent out to Nantes, there to punish La Vendée. Carrier, still a young man, was one of those vulgar and violent minds who, in the excitement of civil wars, become monsters of cruelty and extravagance. He began by saying, on his arrival at Nantes, that all should be put to death, and that, notwithstanding the promise of pardon made to those Vendéans who should lay down their arms, no quarter ought to be given to them. The constituted authorities having spoken upon the subject of keeping faith with the rebels, "You are j— f—," said Carrier to them, "you don't know your business; I'll send you all to the guillotine;" and he began by firing upon and destroying with grape shot, in companies of one hundred or two hundred at a time, the unhappy persons who had surrendered themselves. He made his appearance at the popular society, sword in hand, uttering abusive language, and always threatening the guillotine. This society not suiting him, he caused it to be dissolved. He intimidated the authorities to such a degree, that they durst no longer appear before him. One day, when they came to consult him on the subject of provisions, he replied to the municipal officers, that it was no business of his: that the first b—who talked to him about provisions, should have his head struck off, and that he had no time to attend to their nonsense. This madman imagined that the sole object of his mission was to slaughter.

He resolved to punish at one and the same time the Vendean rebels, and the federalists of Nantes, who had attempted a movement in favour of the Girondins, after the siege of their city. Every day the unfortunates who had escaped the massacres of Mans and Savenay, were coming in in crowds, as they were driven by the armies which pressed them closely on all sides. Carrier ordered them to be confined in the prisons of Nantes, and had thus collected there nearly ten thousand. He had next formed a band of murderers, who scoured the adjacent country, arrested the Nantese families, and added rapine to cruelty. Carrier had at first instituted a revolutionary commission for trying the Vendéans and the Nantese. He caused the Vendéans to be shot, and the Nantese, suspected of federalism of royalism, to be guillotined. He soon found this formality too tedious, and the execution by shooting attended with inconveniences. This mode of execution was slow; it was troublesome to bury the bodies: they were frequently left on the scene of carnage, and infected the air to such a degree, as to produce an epidemic disease in the town. The Loire, which runs through Nantes, suggested a frightful idea to Carrier, namely, to rid himself of the prisoners by drowning them in that river. He made a previous experiment, and loaded a barge with ninety priests, under the pretence of transporting them elsewhere, and caused it to be sunk when at some distance from the city. This expedient having been found to answer, he resolved to employ it on a large scale. He no longer used the mock formality of passing the prisoners before a commission; he caused them to be taken in the night out of the prisons in parties of one and two hundred, and put into boats. From these boats they were conveyed to small vessels prepared for this horrible purpose. The miserable wretches were thrown into the hold; the port-holes were nailed down; the passages to the deck were closed with planks; the executioners then got into the boats, and carpenters placed in wherries opened the sides of the vessels with hatchets, and made them sink. In this frightful manner four or five thousand persons perished. Carrier congratulated himself at having discovered a more expeditious and more sanitary mode of delivering the republic from its enemies. He drowned not only men, but also a great number of women and children. When the Vendean families were dispersed, after the route of Savenay, a great number of Nantese had taken care of the children, with the intention of bringing them up. "They are wolf whelps," said Carrier; and he ordered them to be restored to the republic. These unfortunate children were for the most part drowned.

The Loire was covered with dead bodies. Ships, in weighing anchor, sometimes raised boats filled with drowned persons. Birds of prey covered the banks of the river, and gorged themselves with human flesh*. The fish were thus fed upon a substance which rendered them unfit to be eaten, and were forbidden by the municipality to be taken. To these horrors were added those of a contagious disease and dearth. In the midst of this dreadful situation, Carrier, still boiling with rage, forbade the slightest emotion of pity, seized by the collar and threatened with his sword those who came to speak to him, and caused notices to be posted, stating that whosoever should come to solicit on behalf of any person in confinement should be thrown into prison. Fortunately, he was superseded by the committee of public welfare, for although the committee desired extermination, it did not require this extraordinary violence. The number of Carrier's victims is computed at four or five thousand. The greater part of them were Vendéans.

Bordeaux, Marseilles, Toulon, expiated their federalism. At Toulon, Fréron and Barras, the representatives, had caused two hundred of the inhabitants to be killed with grape shot, and had punished them for a crime, the real authors of which had escaped in the English squadron. In the department of Vaucluse, Maignet exercised a dictatorship as terrific as the other delegates of the convention. He had ordered the borough of Bédouin to be burned for rebellion; and at his suggestion, the committee of public welfare had instituted at Orange a revolutionary tribunal, the jurisdiction of which extended to the whole of the South. This tribunal was framed after the very model of the revolutionary tribunal of Paris, with this difference, that there were no jurors, and that five judges condemned, upon what they termed moral proofs, all the unfortunate persons whom Maignet collected in his circuits. At Lyons, the sanguinary executions ordered by Collot d'Herbois had altogether ceased. The revolutionary commission had just given an account of its proceedings, and furnished the number of the acquitted and of the condemned. One thousand six hundred and eighty-four persons had been either guillotined or destroyed by grape shot. One thousand six hundred and eighty-two had been set at liberty by the justice of the commission.

The North also was not without its pro-consul, Joseph Lebon. He had been a priest, and confessed that, in his youth, he should have carried religious fanaticism to such a length, as even to kill his father and mother, had he been enjoined so to do. He was a real lunatic, less ferocious perhaps than Carrier, but more decidedly divested of reasoning capacity. From his language, and from his conduct, it was evident that his mind was deranged. He had fixed his principal residence at Arras. He had established a tribunal with the approbation of the committee of public welfare, and travelled through the departments of the North, attended by his judges and a guillotine. He had visited Saint Pol, Saint Omer, Béthune, Bayeume, Aire, &c., and had every where left the bloody traces of his progress. The Austrians having approached Cambray, and Saint-Just imagining that he perceived that the aristocrats of that town were in secret correspondence with the enemy, summoned thither Lebon, who, in a few days, sent to the scaffold a multitude of unfortunate persons, and pretended that he had saved Cambray by his firmness. When Lebon had finished his excursions, he returned to Arras. There he indulged in the most disgusting orgies, with his judges and various members of the clubs. The executioner was admitted to his table, and was there treated with every possible mark of respect. Lebon attended the executions, which he witnessed from a balcony; from this balcony he was accustomed to harangue the people, and caused the "ça ira" to be played while the blood was actually flowing. One day, immediately after he had received intelligence of a victory, he hastened to his balcony, and ordered the execution to be suspended, that the sufferers who were about to die might be made acquainted with the successes of the republic.

Lebon's conduct had been so strongly marked by mental alienation, that he became subject to accusation even before the committee of public welfare. Some inhabitants of Arras had sought refuge in Paris, and took great pains to gain access to their fellow-citizen, Robespierre, for the purpose of submitting their complaints to him. Some of them had known, and even conferred obligations on him in his younger days, but yet they could not gain access to him. Guffroy, the deputy, who was at Arras, and who possessed great courage, exerted himself extremely at the committees so as to call their attention to the conduct of Lebon. He had nobly ventured to make an express denunciation to the convention. The committee of public welfare took cognizance of it, and could not help calling Lebon before them. However, as the committee was not willing either to disavow its agents, or to afford the slightest ground for presuming that one could be too severe towards the aristocrats, they sent Lebon back to Arras, and, in writing to him, made use of the following expressions:—"Continue to do good, and pursue your course with that discretion and dignity which cannot afford an handle for the calumnies of the aristocracy." The complaints preferred in the convention by Guffroy against Lebon required a report from the committee. Barrère was commissioned to prepare it. "All complaints against representatives," said he, "ought to be referred to the committee, in order to spare those debates which would perturb the government and the convention. This is what has been done upon the present occasion in regard to Lebon; we have inquired into the motives of his conduct. Are these motives pure? Is the result useful to the revolution? Is it serviceable to liberty? Are the complaints merely recriminatory, or are they only the vindictive outcries of the aristocracy? This is what the committee has kept in view in this affair. Forms somewhat harsh have been employed; but these forms have destroyed the snares of the aristocracy. The committee certainly has reason to disapprove of them; but Lebon has completely defeated the aristocrats, and saved Cambray. Besides, what is there that ought not to be forgiven in the hatred of a republican against the aristocracy! However acrimonious a patriot may be in his prosecution of the enemies of the people, yet how many generous sentiments does he not possess to extenuate his faults! The revolution should not be mentioned but with respect, nor revolutionary measures but with consideration. Liberty is a virgin, and to raise her veil is a crime."

All this ended in Lebon's being authorized to proceed, and in Guffroy's being classed among the troublesome censors of the revolutionary government, and as such was exposed to the same dangers. It was now evident enough that the entire committee was in favour of the system of terror. Robespierre, Couthon, Billaud, Collot d'Herbois, Vadier, Vouland, and Amar, might differ amongst themselves as to their prerogatives, and as to the number and selection of the colleagues they were to sacrifice; but they were every one quite agreed as to the system of exterminating all those who interposed obstacles to the revolution. They did not wish this system to be applied without any limit by the Lebons and the Carriers; but they were anxious to be delivered after the way in which things were done at Paris, that is, with promptitude, certainty, and with as little disturbance as possible, from the enemies whom they supposed to have conspired against the republic. While they could not but censure certain insane cruelties, they possessed that self-esteem of power which is always reluctant to disavow its agents. They condemned what had been done at Arras and at Nantes; but in appearance they approved of it in order that they might not have to acknowledge that their government was to blame. Hurried along into this horrible career, they blindly advanced, not knowing where it would terminate. Such is the unhappy condition of the man engaged in evil, he has not the power to stop. So soon as he begins to conceive a doubt as to the nature of his actions, so soon as he has a glimmering notion that he has strayed from the right path, instead of retreating he rushes forward as if to hide the true state of things from himself, or as if to escape from the transient gleams that annoy him. Before he can arrest his progress he must be calm, he must commune with himself, he must pass a severe judgment upon himself, which no man has courage to do.

There was nothing short of a general rising that could stop the authors of this terrible system. It was requisite that in this rising there should engage, the members of the committees jealous of the supreme power, as well as the threatened Mountaineers, the indignant convention, and every heart disgusted by this horrid effusion of blood. But in order to arrive at this association of jealousy, fear, and indignation, it was requisite that jealousy should make its way in the committees, that the fear should become extreme in the Mountain, and that indignation should restore courage to the convention and to the public. It was further requisite that a suitable opportunity should cause all these sentiments to burst forth simultaneously, and that the oppressors should strike the first blows, so that the oppressed might dare to return them.

Public opinion had received its impression, and the moment had arrived when a movement in behalf of humanity against revolutionary violence was possible. The republic being victorious, and its opponents terrified, the transition from fear and fury to confidence and pity was natural enough. It was the first time during the revolution that such a circumstance could have taken place. When the Girondists and the Dantonists perished, it was not yet time to invoke humanity. The revolutionary government had neither been divested of its utility or its consideration.

Up to this period both parties attentively watched each other, and treasured up the deepest resentment in their hearts. Robespierre had entirely ceased his attendance at the committee of public welfare. He hoped to vilify the government of his colleagues by taking no further part in it; he never showed himself but at the Jacobins, where Billaud and Collot durst no longer appear, and where he was every day more and more adored. He began to throw out observations there upon the intestine discussions of the committee. "Formerly," said he, (13 Messidor) "the hollow faction which has been formed out of the remains of Danton and Camille Desmoulins was attacking the committees en masse; now it prefers attacking certain members in particular, in order to succeed in breaking the fascies. Formerly, it durst not attack the national justice; now it deems itself strong enough to calumniate the revolutionary tribunal as well as the decree concerning its organization: it attributes to a single individual that which belongs to the entire government; it ventures to assert that the revolutionary tribunal has been instituted for the purpose of slaughtering the national convention, and unfortunately it has obtained but too much credence. Its scandals have gained credence; they have been assiduously circulated: a dictator has been talked of; his name even has been mentioned; it is myself they have alluded to, and you would shudder were I to tell you in what place. Truth is my only refuge against crime. These calumnies will most assuredly not discourage me, but they leave me undecided as to my future conduct. Until I am able to say more on this subject, I appeal to the virtues of the convention, the virtues of the committee, the virtues of all good citizens, and, lastly, your virtues, which have so often proved serviceable to the country."

We see by what perfidious insinuations Robespierre began to denounce the committees, and to attach the Jacobins exclusively to himself. For these tokens of confidence he was repaid with unbounded adulation. The revolutionary system being solely attributed to him, it became natural that all the revolutionary authorities should be attached to him, and should warmly espouse his cause. With the Jacobins were of course associated the commune, always united in principle and conduct with the Jacobins, as well as all the judges and jurors of the revolutionary tribunal. This association formed a very considerable force, and, with more resolution and energy, Robespierre might have made himself extremely formidable. By means of the Jacobins he had the direction of a turbulent mass, whom he had hitherto represented, and whose opinion he swayed; through the commune he controlled the local authority, which had taken the lead in all the insurrections; and what was of still more consequence, the armed force of Paris, Pache, the mayor, and Henriot, the commandant, whom he had saved when they were about to be identified with Chaumette, were wholly devoted to him. Billaud and Collot had taken advantage, it is true, of his absence to imprison Pache; but Fleuriot, the new mayor, and Payan, the national agent, were just as much attached to him; and the committee had not dared to take Henriot from him. Add to these persons, Dumas, the president of the tribunal, Coffinhal, the vice-president, and all the other judges and jurors, and we shall have some idea of the faculties Robespierre possessed in Paris. If the committees and the convention did not obey him, he had only to complain to the Jacobins, to excite a movement in that quarter, to communicate this movement to the commune, to compel the municipal authority to declare that the people resumed its sovereign powers, to set the sections in motion, and to send Henriot to demand of the convention sixty or seventy deputies. Dumas, Coffinhal, and the whole tribunal, would then be at his command, to put to death the deputies whom Henriot should have obtained by main force. In short, all the expedients of such a day as the 31st of May, more prompt and more certain in their execution than the former, were in his hands.

Accordingly, his partisans and his hiring assassins came around him, urging him to give the signal. Henriot again offered the assistance of his columns, and promised to be more energetic than he was on the 2nd of June. Robespierre, who preferred doing every thing by word of mouth, and who imagined that he could still perform a great deal through that medium, resolved to wait. He hoped to make the committees unpopular by his secession, as well as by his speeches at the Jacobins, and he then proposed to seize a favourable moment for attacking them openly in the convention. He continued, notwithstanding his seeming abdication, to direct the tribunal, and to conduct an active police by means of an office which he had established. By his police-office he was keeping strict watch over his adversaries, and informed himself of all their movements. He now allowed himself somewhat more relaxation than formerly. He was observed to repair to a very handsome country-seat, belonging to a family that was devoted to him, at Maisons-Alfort, three leagues from Paris. Thither all his partisans accompanied him; thither, also, came Dumas, Coffinhal, Payan, and Fleuriot. Henriot, also, frequently went thither with all his aides-de-camp; they traversed the roads five a-breast, and at full gallop, overthrowing all the persons they met with, and by their presence spreading terror through the country. The hosts, and the friends of Robespierre, caused him, by their indiscretion, to be suspected of many more plans than he ever contemplated, or had the courage to methodize. In Paris, he was always surrounded by the same persons, and he was followed at certain distances by Jacobins or jurors of the tribunal, men devoted to him, armed with sticks and secret weapons, and ready to hasten to his assistance on the first alarm. They were called his body-guards.

Billaud-Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, and Barrère, on their part, intruded themselves in the conduct of all affairs, and, in the absence of their rival, attached to themselves Carnot, Robert Lindet, and Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or). A community of interest induced an association between them and the committee of general safety; in other respects, they maintained the most profound silence. They strove to effect a gradual diminution of the power of their adversary, by reducing the armed force of Paris. There were forty-eight companies of artillery belonging to the forty-eight sections, well disciplined, and who had invariably demonstrated the most revolutionary spirit. They had constantly sided with the insurrectionary party ever since the 10th of August to the 31st of May. A decree directed that at least the half of them should remain in Paris, but permitted the other part to be shifted to some other place. Billaud and Collot had ordered the chairman of the commission for superintending the movements of the armies, to send them off successively to the frontiers, and this order had already begun to be carried into effect. In all their operations they concealed themselves as much as possible from Couthon, who, not having seceded like Robespierre, watched them attentively, and stood very much in their way. While these things were going on, Billaud, gloomy and splenetic, seldom quitted Paris; but the witty and voluptuous Barrère went to Passy, in company with the principal members of the committee of general safety, with old Vadier, Vouland, and Amar. They met at the house of Dupin, formerly a farmer-general, famous under the late government for his kitchen, and, during the Revolution, for the report which sent the farmers-general to their death. There it was that they enjoyed themselves with fine women; and Barrère pointed his wit against the pontiff of the Supreme Being, the chief prophet, the beloved Son of the Mother of God. After having sufficiently diverted themselves, they quitted the arms of their courtizans, to return to Paris into the midst of blood and party animosities.

On their part the old members of the Mountain, who found themselves threatened, met in secret, and earnestly sought to come to a mutual understanding. The devoted woman who, at Bordenaux, had attached herself to Tallien, and snatched a multitude of victims from his grasp, urged him from the recesses of her prison to strike the tyrant. To Tallien, Lecointre, Bourdon (of the Oise), Thuriot, Panis, Barras, Fréron, Monestier, were associated Guffroy, the antagonist of Lebon; Dubois-Crancé, compromised at the siege of Lyons, and detested by Couthon; Fouché (of Nantes), who had embroiled himself with Robespierre, and who lay under the imputation of not having conducted himself in a perfectly patriotic manner at Lyons. Tallien and Lecointre were the most daring and the most impatient. Fouché was particularly dreaded, on account of his skill in contriving and conducting an intrigue, and it was against him that the triumvirs were most exasperated.

On occasion of a petition from the Jacobins of Lyons, in which they complained to the Jacobins of Paris of their existing situation, the whole circumstances of that unfortunate city came again to be noticed. Couthon denounced Dubois-Crancé, as he had done some months before, and accused him of having allowed Préezy to escape, and caused his name to be struck out of the list of Jacobins. Robespierre accused Fouché, and imputed to him the intrigues which had caused Gaillard, the patriot, to lay violent hands on himself. It was settled that Fouché should be summoned before the society to explain his conduct. It was not so much the intrigues of Fouché at Lyons as his intrigues in Paris, that Robespierre dreaded, and was desirous of punishing. Fouché, aware of the danger, addressed an evasive letter to the Jacobins, and besought them to suspend their judgment, till the committee, to whom he had just submitted his conduct, and whom he had furnished with all the documents in its support, should have pronounced its decision. "It is astonishing," said Robespierre, "that Fouché should to-day implore the aid of the convention against the Jacobins. Is he afraid of the eyes and the ears of the people? Is he afraid lest his agitated countenance should betray his crime? Is he afraid lest the looks of six thousand persons fixed upon him should discover his soul in his eyes, and read his thoughts there in despite of nature who has concealed them? The conduct of Fouché is that of a guilty wretch; you cannot any longer retain him as a member of your body; he must be expelled." Fouché was accordingly expelled, as Dubois-Crancé had been. Thus the storm roared daily more and more vehemently against the threatened Mountaineers, and the horizon on all sides became more overcast with clouds.

Amidst this general agitation, the members of the committees, who feared Robespierre, would rather have courted an explanation and conciliated his ambition, than have engaged in a perilous conflict. Robespierre had sent for his young colleague, Saint-Just, and the latter had immediately returned from the army. It was proposed that a meeting should take place for the purpose of attempting to come to a mutual understanding. Robespierre had to be extremely pressed before he would consent to an interview; he did at last consent thereto, and the two committees gave each other the meeting; mutual reproaches were exchanged with great bitterness on both sides. Robespierre spoke of himself with his usual offensive pride, denounced secret meetings, talked of conspirator deputies to be punished, censured all the operations of the government, and condemned every thing, administration, war, and finances.

Saint-Just supported Robespierre, pronounced a magnificent panegyric upon him, and said that the only hope that was left for the foreign foe was to produce dissension in the government. He related what had been said by an officer who had been made prisoner before Maubeuge. They were waiting, to use the words of that officer, till a more moderate party should overturn the revolutionary government, and cause other principles to get the upper hand. Saint-Just relied upon this fact for making them duly consider the necessity of reconciling their present differences, and going hand in hand with each other. The antagonists of Robespierre were also of the same opinion, and they were willing to come to a good understanding, so that they might remain masters of the state; but in order to effect a mutual understanding, they must consent to all that Robespierre desired, and such conditions could not suit them. The members of the committee of general safety made great complaints of having been stripped of their functions. Elie Lacoste carried his hardihood so far as to assert that Couthon, Saint-Just, and Robespierre, formed a committee in the committees, nay, even dared to utter the word triumvirate. However, some mutual concessions were settled. Robespierre consented to confine his office of general police to the superintendence of the agents of the committee of public welfare; and his adversaries, in return, consented to direct that Saint-Just should make a report to the convention in respect of the interview that had taken place. In this report, as may well be conceived, no mention was to be made of the dissensions that had prevailed between the committees; but the report was to make mention of the commotions which public opinion had of late experienced, and to fix the course which the government purposed to pursue. Billand and Collot insinuated that the less that was said in it about the Supreme Being the better it would be; for they still had Robespierre's pontificate before their eyes. However, Billand, with his gloomy and sinister aspect, told Robespierre that he had never been his enemy; and the parties separated without being really reconciled, but apparently somewhat less divided than before. There could be no sincerity in such a reconciliation as this, for their ambitious desires remained the same; it resembled those attempts at negotiation which all parties make before they come to blows; it was a true kiss and make it up (baiser lamourette); it bore a strong likeness to all the reconciliations proposed between the constituents and the Girondists, between the Girondists and the Jacobins, and between Danton and Robespierre.

However, if it failed to restore harmony among the members of the committees, yet it greatly alarmed the Mountaineers. They concluded that their destruction was to be the pledge of peace, and they strove to ascertain what were the conditions of the treaty. The members of the committee of general safety were anxious to dispel their fears. Elie Lacoste, Dubarran, and Moses Bayle, the better constituted members of the committee, pacified them, and told them that no sacrifice had been agreed upon. This was true enough; and it was one of the reasons which prevented the reconciliation from being complete. Nevertheless, Barrère, who was particularly desirous that they should be on good terms, did not fail to repeat in his daily reports that the members of the government were perfectly united, that they had been unjustly accused of being at variance, and that they were exerting their joint efforts to render the republic every where victorious. He affected to sum up all the imputations raised against the triumvirs; and he repelled those imputations as so many criminal scandals, and pointed equally against both the committees. "Amid the shouts of victory," said he, "vague rumours are heard, obscure calumnies are circulated, subtle poisons are infused into the journals, fatal conspiracies are being contrived, factitious discontents are preparing, and the government is perpetually annoyed, impeded in its operations, thwarted in its movements, scandalized in its intentions, and threatened in those who compose it. Yet what has it done?" Here Barrère added the usual enumeration of the labours and services of the government.

CHAPTER XXII.

OPERATIONS OF THE ARMY OF THE NORTH TOWARDS THE MIDDLE OF 1794. THE CAPTURE OF YPRES. FORMATION OF THE ARMY OF THE SAMBRE-AND-MEUSE—BATTLE OF FLEURUS. OCCUPATION OF BRUSSELS—THE LATTER DAYS OF TERROR; STRUGGLE BY ROBESPIERRE AND THE TRIUMVIRS AGAINST THE OTHER MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEES. EVENTS OF THE 8 AND 9 THERMIDOR; ARREST AND EXECUTION OF ROBESPIERRE AND SAINT-JUST—MARCH OF THE REVOLUTION FROM '89 TO 9 THERMIDOR.

WHILE Barrère was doing his best to conceal the discord of the committee, Saint-Just, notwithstanding the report which he had to make, had returned to the army, where important events were taking place. The movements commenced by the two wings had continued. Pichegru had prosecuted his operations on the Lys and the Scheldt; Jourdan had commenced his on the Sambre. Taking advantage of the defensive attitude which Cobourg had assumed at Tournay since the battles of Turenne and Pont-a-échin, Pichegru designed to beat Clerfait separately. However, he durst not advance as far as Thielt, and he resolved to commence the siege of Ypres, with the twofold object of drawing Clerfait towards him and taking that place, which would consolidate the establishment of the French in West Flanders. Clerfait was waiting for reinforcements, and made no movement. Pichegru then pushed the siege of Ypres so vigorously, that Cobourg and Clerfait deemed it incumbent on them to quit their respective positions, and to go to the relief of the threatened fortress. Pichegru, in order to prevent Cobourg from prosecuting this movement, caused troops to issue from Lille, and to make so serious a demonstration on Orchies, that Cobourg was detained at Tournay. At the same time he moved forward and hastened to Clerfait, who was advancing towards Rousselaer and Hooglède. His prompt and well-conceived movements afforded him an occasion of still fighting Clerfait separately. Unfortunately one division had mistaken its way; Clerfait had time to return to his camp at Thielt, after a slight loss. But, three days afterwards, 25 Prairial, (13 June,) Clerfait, reinforced by the detachment he expected, deployed unawares in face of our columns with thirty thousand men. Our soldiers quickly ran to arms, but the right division being attacked with great impetuosity, was thrown into confusion, and the left remained uncovered on the high level ground of Hooglède. Macdonald commanded this left division, and found means to maintain it against the repeated attacks in front and flank to which it was long exposed. By this courageous defence he gave Devanther's brigade time to rejoin him, and then obliged Clerfait to retire with considerable loss. This was the fifth time that Clerfait, inefficiently seconded, was beaten by our army of the north. This action, so honourable for Macdonald's division, decided the surrender of the besieged fortress. Four days afterwards, on the 29th Prairial (June 17), Ypres opened its gates, and a garrison of seven thousand men laid down their arms. Cobourg was going to the relief of Ypres and Clerfait, when he learned that it was too late. The events which were taking place on the Sambre then obliged him to move towards the opposite side of the theatre of war. He left the duke of York on the Scheldt, and Clerfait at Thielt, and marched with all the Austrian troops in the direction of Charleroi. It was in fact an absolute separation between the principal powers, England and Austria, who were on very bad terms, and whose different interests were here most distinctly manifested. The English remained in Flanders near the maritime provinces, and the Austrians lost no time in getting to their exposed lines of communication. This separation increased not a little their misunderstanding. The emperor of Austria had retired to Vienna, disgusted with this unsuccessful warfare; and Mack, seeing his plans frustrated, had once more quitted the Austrian staff.

We have observed Jourdan came from the Moselle to Charleroi at the moment when the French, repulsed for the third time, were crossing the Sambre in disorder. After a few days' rest had been given to the troops, some of whom were dispirited by their defeats, and others by their rapid march, some change was made in their organization. The divisions of Desjardins and Charbonnier, as well as the divisions which had arrived from the Moselle, were formed into a single army, called the army of Sambre-and-Meuse; this army amounted to about sixty-six thousand men, and was placed under the command of Jourdan. A division of fifteen thousand men, commanded by Scherer, was left to guard the Sambre from Theuin to Maubeuge.

Jourdan resolved immediately to recross the Sambre and to invest Charleroi. Hentry's division was ordered to attack the place, and the bulk of the army was disposed all round to cover the siege. Charleroi is seated on the Sambre. Beyond it are a series of positions forming a semicircle, the extremities of which are supported by the Sambre. These positions are of no great importance, inasmuch as the semicircle they describe is ten leagues in extent, because they do not sufficiently communicate with each other, and have a river at their back. Kléber, with the left, drew himself out in line from the Sambre to Orchies and Traségnies, and protected the rivulet of Picton, which ran through the field of battle and fell into the Sambre. At the centre, Morlot guarded Goselies; Championnet advanced between Hépiguiés and Wagné; Lefèvre occupied Wagné, Fleurus, and Lambusart. Lastly, on the right, Marceau drew himself out in advance of the wood of Campinaire, and connected our line with the Sambre. Jourdan, sensible of the disadvantage of these positions, had no desire to remain there, and advised that, in order to leave them, we should open the attack on the morning of the 28th Prairial (June 16). At this time Cobourg had not yet moved towards that point; he was at Tournay, being present at the defeat of Clerfuit and the capture of Ypres. The prince of Orange, dispatched towards Charleroi, commanded the army of the allies. He resolved, on his part, to anticipate the attack with which he was threatened; and on the morning of the 28th, his troops being deployed, compelled the French to sustain the attack on the ground they occupied. Four columns, directed against our right and our centre, had already made their way into the wood of Campinaire, where Marceau was, had taken Fleurus from Lefèvre, Hépignies from Championnet, and were driving Morlot from Pont-a-Migneloup to Gosselies, when Jourdan, seasonably arriving with a reserve of cavalry, stopped the progress of the fourth column by a successful charge, brought Morlot's troops back to their positions, and revived the conflict at the centre. On the left, Wartensleben had made a similar progress towards Traségnies. But Kléber, by making the most ready and efficient arrangements, retook Traségnies; and then, seizing the favourable moment, got to the rear of Wartensleben, drove him beyond the Piéton, and pursued him with two columns. The conflict had been maintained with advantage, nay, victory was about to declare for the French, when the prince of Orange, effecting a junction between his first two columns in the direction of Lambusart, on the point which connected the extreme right of the French with the Sambre, threatened their line of communications. The right and the centre were then obliged to fall back. Kléber, relinquishing his victorious career, covered the retreat with his troops, which was effected in good order. Such was the first affair of the 28th (June 16). This was the fourth time that the French had been forced to recross the Sambre; but on the present occasion, it was in a manner much more honourable to their military character. Jourdan was by no means out of spirits. He once more crossed the Sambre a few days afterwards, regained the positions he had occupied on the 16th, again invested Charleroi, and caused the bombardment to be maintained with the utmost vigour.

Cobourg, apprised of Jourdan's new operations, at length approached the Sambre. It was of importance to the French that they should take Charleroi before the reinforcements expected by the Austrian army should come up. Marescot, the engineer, pushed the operations so briskly, that in a week the guns of the fortress were silenced, and every preparation was made for the assault. On the 7th Messidor (June 25) the commandant sent an officer with a letter to treat. Saint-Just, who still held supreme sway in our camp, refused to open the letter, and sent back the officer, saying, This is but a bit of paper; it is the fortress we must have. The garrison marched out of the fortress the same evening, at the very moment that Cobourg was coming in sight of the French lines. The enemy remained ignorant of the surrender of Charleroi. The possession of the place rendered our position more secure, and that battle in which we were about to engage, with a river at our backs, less disadvantageous. Hatry's division being left at liberty, was marched to Ransart, to reinforce the centre, and everything was made ready for a decisive engagement on the following day, the 8th Messidor (June 26).

Our positions were the same as on the 28th Prairial (June 16). Kléber commanded on the left, commencing from the Sambre to Traségnies. Morlot, Championnet, Lefèvre, and Marceau, formed the centre and the right, and extended their line from Gosselies to the Sambre. Intrenchments had been made at Hépignies, to secure our centre. Cobourg caused us to be attacked along the whole of this semicircle, instead of directing a concentric effort upon one of our extremities, at our right for instance, and taking from us all the passages of the Sambre.

The attack commenced on the morning of the 8th Messidor. The prince of Orange and General Latour, who fronted Kléber on the left, beat back our columns, and drove them through the wood of Monceaux to Marchienne-au-Pont, up to the banks of the Sambre. Kléber, who was fortunately placed on the left for the purpose of taking charge of all the divisions in that quarter, immediately hastened to the threatened point, brought batteries to bear upon the heights, surrounded the Austrians in the wood of Monceaux, and attacked them on all sides. The latter having perceived, as they approached the Sambre, that Charleroi was in possession of the French, began to flinch. Kléber taking advantage of this state of things, made a vigorous charge, and compelled them to get off from Marchienne-au-Pont. While Kléber was thus protecting one of our extremities, Jourdan was doing no less for the centre and the right. Morlot, who was in advance of Gosselies, had been long time fighting with General Kwasdanowich, and attempted several manoeuvres for the purpose of getting round to his rear; but it ended by having the same manoeuvre practised upon himself. He had himself fallen back upon Gosselies, after making the most honourable exertions. Championnet, supported by the redoubt of Hépignies, made quite as vigorous a defence, but the corps of Kaunitz had advanced to get behind the redoubt at the very moment when a false report announced the retreat of Lefèvre at the right. Championnet, deceived by this report, was retiring, and had already abandoned the redoubt, when Jourdan perceiving the danger, brought part of Hatry's division, placed in reserve, to bear upon that point, retook Hépignies, and sent forth his cavalry into the plain upon the troops of Kaunitz. While both sides were charging with great fury, a still fiercer contest was raging near the Sambre at Wagné and Lambusart. Beaulieu, marching up both banks of the Sambre at once, for the purpose of attacking our extremity to the right, had repulsed Marceau's division. That division fled in all haste through the woods bordering the Sambre, and even crossed the river in disorder. Marceau then got together some battalions, and, regardless of the rest of the fugitive division, threw himself into Lambusart, resolving to perish there rather than abandon that post contiguous to the Sambre, and an indispensable support of our extremity at the right. Lefèvre, who was stationed at Wagné, Hépignies, and Lambusart, drew back his advanced posts from Fleurus upon Wagné, and threw his troops into Lambusart to support Marceau's operations. This spot now became the decisive point of the battle; Beaulieu perceiving this, sent a third column thither. Jourdan, fully apprized of the danger, also brought thither the rest of his reserve. The engagement was kept up around the village of Lambusart with extraordinary obstinacy. So brisk was the firing, that the volleys could no longer be distinguished. The corn and the huts of the camp took fire, and the combatants were soon fighting amidst a conflagration. The republicans at last remained masters of Lambusart.

At this moment, the French at first repulsed, had succeeded in renewing the battle at every point: Kléber had covered the Sambre and the left; Morlot having fallen back to Gosselies, kept his ground there; Championnet had retaken Hépigny; and a furious conflict at Lambusart had ensured us that position. It was now nightfall. Beaulieu had just learned, upon the Sambre, what the prince of Orange had already been apprised of, that Charleroi was in the possession of the French; after that, Cobourg not venturing to proceed, ordered a general retreat.

Such was this decisive engagement, which was one of the most sanguinary in the campaign, and which was fought over a semicircle of ten leagues, between two armies of nearly eighty thousand men each. It was called the battle of Fleurus, though that village acted but a secondary part, because the duke of Luxemburg had already shed a lustre on that name under Louis XIV. Though its results on the spot were inconsiderable, and it was confined to a defensive attack, it decided the retreat of the Austrians, and thereby produced immense results*. The Austrians could not fight a second battle. They must have effected a junction either with the duke of York or with Clerfaiit, and these two generals were occupied in the north by Pichegru. Besides, exposed as they were upon the Meuse, it was expedient for them to fall back, lest they should endanger their line of communications. From that moment, the retreat of the allies became general, and they resolved to concentrate themselves towards Brussels, in order to protect that city.

The campaign was now evidently decided; but an error of the committee of public welfare prevented us from obtaining results so prompt and so decisive as there had been reason to expect. Pichegru had formed a plan, which was the best of all his military schemes. The duke of York was on the Scheldt, above Tournay; Clerfaiit at a great distance from thence, at Thielt, in Flanders. Pichegru, still holding to his plan of destroying Clerfaiit separately, desired to cross the Scheldt at Oudenarde, thus to cut off Clerfaiit from the duke of York, and to fight him once more singly. His intention next was, that while the duke of York, left alone, should think of joining Cobourg, to fight him in his turn, then to take Cobourg in the rear, or to form a junction with Jourdan. This plan, which was attended not only with the advantage of attacking Clerfaiit and the duke of York separately, but also with that of collecting all our forces on the Meuse, was thwarted by a very stupid notion of the committee of public welfare. Carnot had been persuaded to despatch admiral Venstabel with marines to the island of Walcheren, so as to cause a rising in Holland. For the purpose of assisting this plan, Carnot directed Pichegru's army to march along the coast, and to take possession of all the ports of West Flanders; he further ordered Jourdan to detach sixteen thousand men from his army, and to send them towards the sea. This latter order, in particular, was one of the most injudicious and the most dangerous that could be. The generals demonstrated its absurdity to Saint-Just, and it was not executed; but Pichegru was nevertheless obliged to move towards the sea, to take Bruges and Ostend, while Morceau was in the occupation of Nieuport.

The movements still progressed by the two wings. Pichegru left Morceau, with one part of the army, to lay siege to Nieuport and Sluys, and with the other took possession of Bruges, Ostend, and Ghent. He then advanced towards Brussels. Jourdan, on his side, was also marching thither. We now had only rear-guard battles to fight, and at length, on the 22nd Messidor (July 10), our advanced guard entered the capital of the Netherlands. A few days afterwards, the two armies of the north and of the Sambre-and-Meuse, effected a junction at that place. Nothing could be of greater importance than this event; one hundred and fifty thousand French, collected in the capital of the Netherlands, could pour down from that point upon the armies of Europe, who, beaten on all sides, were seeking, some to regain the sea, others to regain the Rhine. The fortresses of Conde, Landrecies, Valenciennes, and Le Quesnoy, which the allies had taken from us, were immediately invested; and the convention, upon the assumption that the possession of the territory conferred absolute right, decreed that, if the garrison did not immediately surrender, they should be put to the sword. The convention had also passed another decree, enacting that no more English should in future be made prisoners, by way of punishing all the bold offences of Pitt against France. Our soldiers would not carry out this decree. A sergeant having taken some English, brought them to an officer. "Why hast thou taken them?" asked the officer. "Because we shall have to receive so many shots the less," replied the sergeant. "True," replied the officer, "but the representatives will oblige us to shoot them." "It will not be us," retorted the sergeant, "who will shoot them. Send them to the representatives, and if they are cannibals, why then let them e'en kill and eat them, if they like."

Thus our armies, acting at first upon the enemy's centre, and finding it too strong for them, had divided themselves into two wings, which had marched, the one along the Lys, the other along the Sambre. Pichegru had first beaten Clerfaiit at Meuvrœn and at Courtray, then Cobourg and the duke of York at Turcoing, and, lastly, had defeated Clerfaiit again at Hoogledo. After several fruitless passages across the Sambre, Jourdan, brought to the Sambre by a happy idea of Carnot's, had decided the success of our right wing at Fleurus. From that moment the allies, approached by both wings, had abandoned the Netherlands to us. Such was the result of the campaign. Our astounding successes were everywhere extolled. The victory of Fleurus, the occupation of Charleroi, Ypres, Tournay, Oudenarde, Ostend, Bruges, Ghent, and Brussels, and lastly, the junction of our armies in that capital, were looked upon as prodigies. These successes did not gratify Robespierre, who saw that the credit of the committee, especially of Carnot, was on the increase, to whom, it must be confessed, the success of the campaign was not in so great a degree to be attributed. All the good done by the committees, and all the glory gained by them in the absence of Robespierre, could not but rise up against him, and constitute his condemnation. On the other hand, one defeat would have revived the revolutionary fury in his favour, have given him license to accuse the committees of want of energy or treason, have justified his secession for the last four decades, have presented an extraordinary idea of his foresight, and raised his influence to the highest pitch. He had, therefore, placed himself in the most melancholy position, that of wishing for reverses; and every circumstance proved that he did wish for them. It did not become him either to give utterance to this wish or to suffer it to be perceived; but it was made perceptible, in spite of himself, in his speeches; he strove, in his addresses to the Jacobins, to diminish the enthusiasm that the successes of the republic inspired; he insinuated that the allies were retreating before us as they had done before Dumouriez, only to return the sooner; that in temporarily quitting our frontiers, they meant only to deliver us to the dominion of those passions prosperity is apt to call forth. He added, moreover, that "victory over the enemy's armies was not that to which they ought most exclusively to aspire. The genuine victory," said he, "is that which the friends of liberty gain over factions; it is this victory that restores to nations peace, justice, and prosperity. A nation does not acquire glory by overthrowing tyrants or subjugating other nations. That had been the lot of the Romans, and of some other people: our destiny, far more sublime, is to found upon earth the empire of wisdom, justice, and virtue *."

* It is wrong to attribute to the influence of a faction the great sensation that the battle of Fleurus produced upon public opinion. The Robespierre faction, on the contrary, had the greatest interest in derogating at the moment from the effect of those victories, as we shall shortly perceive. The battle of Fleurus gave us an entrance into Brussels and Belgium, and it is from that circumstance it derives its estimation.

Robespierre had absented himself from the committee ever since the latter end of Prairial. It was now early in Thermidor. It was nearly forty days since he had seceded from his colleagues; it was time to adopt some resolution. His sworn friends declared openly that another 31st of May was desirable; the Dumas, the Henriots, and the Payans, urged him to give the signal for it. He did not possess the same taste for violent measures as themselves, and could not identify himself with their brutal impatience. Accustomed to carry every thing by words, and having greater respect for the law, he much preferred trying the experiment of a speech, in which he should denounce the committees and call for their remodelling. If he should succeed by this quiet method, he would become absolute master, without incurring any danger, and without an insurrection. Should he not succeed, these fair means would not exclude violent measures; on the contrary, he ought to anticipate them. The 31st of May had been preceded by repeated harangues, by respectful applications, and it was not till after asking without having, that it ended by their being peremptorily demanded. He resolved, therefore, to employ the same means as on the 31st of May, to cause in the first place a petition to be presented by the Jacobins, in the next place to deliver a grand speech, and lastly to make Saint-Just come forward with a report. If all these means proved insufficient, he had with him the Jacobins, the commune, and the armed force of Paris. But he hoped after all not to have occasion to renew the scene of the 2nd of June. He had not audacity enough for this, and he still entertained too high a respect for the convention to desire it.

For some time he had been labouring upon a voluminous speech, in which he exerted himself to expose the abuses of the government, and to throw all the evils which were imputed to it upon his colleagues. He wrote to Saint-Just to come back from the army. He detained his brother, who ought to have set out for the frontiers of Italy; he attended daily at the Jacobins, and made every arrangement for the attack. As it always happens in extreme situations, various incidents concur in increasing the general agitation. A person named Magenthies presented a ridiculous petition, praying that the punishment of death should be inflicted upon all who should use oaths in which the name of God was introduced. At last a revolutionary committee ordered some labouring men who had got drunk to be imprisoned as suspected persons. These two facts gave rise to numerous observations against Robespierre; it was said that his Supreme Being was likely to prove a greater oppressor than Christ, and we should shortly see the Inquisition re-established to maintain deism! Sensible of the danger of such accusations, he lost no time in denouncing Magenthies at the Jacobins as an aristocrat paid by foreigners to throw discredit upon the creeds adopted by the convention; he even caused him to be handed over to the revolutionary tribunal. Still further availing himself of his office of police, he had every one of the members of the revolutionary committee of indivisibility apprehended.

The crisis approached, and it appears that the members of the committee of public welfare, and Barrère in particular, would have been glad to have made peace with their formidable colleague; but he had become so overbearing, that it was impossible to come to any understanding with him. Barrère, returning home one evening with one of his confidants, threw himself into a chair, saying, "This Robespierre is insatiable. Let him demand Tallien, Bourdon (of the Oise), Thuriot, Guffroy, Rovère, Lecointre, Paris, Barras, Fréron, Legendre, Monestier, Dubois-Crancé, Fouché, Cambon, and the whole Dantonist-train, well and good: but Duval and Audouin, Leonard, Bourdon, Vadier, and Voulant, it is impossible to consent to that." We see that Robespierre required even the sacrifice of some members of the committee of general safety, and consequently there was no longer any possibility of a treaty. All that could be done was, to break with him at once, and stand the chances of the contest. However, not one of Robespierre's adversaries would have dared to begin; the members of the committees expected to be denounced; the proscribed Mountaineers waited till their heads should be demanded; all meant to suffer themselves to be attacked before they defended themselves, and they acted wisely. It was much better to let Robespierre commence the engagement, and compromise himself in the eyes of the convention, by the demand of new proscriptions. They would then occupy the position of men defending their lives, and even those of others; for there was no foreseeing the extent of these immolations, if even one more were permitted.

Every thing was ready, and the first movement commenced on the 3rd Thermidor at the Jacobins. Among the sworn friends of Robespierre was one named Sijas, a sub-commissioner of the army-movements. There was a strong dislike against this commission for having ordered the successive departure of a great number of companies of artillery, and for having thus diminished the armed force of Paris. Still no one had ventured to prefer any direct charge against him. Sijas began by complaining of the secrecy in which Pyle the chief commissioner was wrapt; and all the imputations which no one dared to impute either to Carnot or to the committee of public welfare were levelled at this chief commissioner. Sijas pretended that there was but one course left, namely, to address themselves to the convention, and to denounce Pyle there. Another Jacobin denounced one of the agents of the committee of general safety. Couthon then spoke, and said that it was necessary to go still further, and to present to the national convention an address in respect of all the machinations which again threatened liberty. "I invite you," said he, "to submit your reflections to her consideration. She is pure, she will not suffer herself to be under the dominion of four or five villains. As for myself, I declare that they shall never control me." Couthon's suggestion was forthwith adopted. The petition was prepared; it was approved on the 5th Thermidor, and on the 7th it was presented to the convention.

The style of this petition was, as usual, respectful in its style and language, but in point of fact imperious. It stated that the Jacobins came to make the bosom of the convention the depository of the solicitudes of the people: this petition repeated the accustomed declamations against foreigners and their accomplices, against the system of indulgence, against the alarm that had been diffused for the sole purpose of creating a division in the national representation, against the efforts that were made to render the worship of God ridiculous, etc. It tended to no precise conclusion, but stated, in a general manner, "You will make traitors, villains, and intriguers, tremble; you will encourage the worthy member of society; you will maintain that union in which your strength consists, you will preserve in all its purity that sublime religion of which every citizen is the minister, and of which virtue is the only practice; and the people trusting in you, will consider that their duty and glory will consist in obeying and defending their representatives even unto death." This was as much as to say in plain terms, you must do what Robespierre dictates, or you will no longer be either obeyed or defended. The reading of this petition was hearkened to amidst a grave silence. No answer was given to it. It had hardly been read before Dubois-Crancé ascended the tribune, and, without alluding to the petition or to the Jacobins, complained of the mortifications to which, for the last six months, he had been subjected, of the injustice he had met with in return for his services, and required that the committee of public welfare might be directed to report upon his conduct, though he said there were in that committee two of his accusers. He required that such report should be presented within three days. His demand was assented to without a single observation, the assembly preserving the same silence as before. Barrère succeeded him in the tribune. He came to submit an important report on the comparative state of France, in July 1793, and in July 1794. It is certain that the difference was very great, and that, were a comparison instituted between France, rended at one and the same time by the royalists, the federalists, and the foreign enemy, and between France, victorious on all the frontiers, and mistress of the Netherlands, they could not refrain from rendering special thanks to that government which had effected such a change in one year. These eulogies bestowed upon the committee was the only way in which Barrère durst indirectly attack Robespierre; nay, he even praised him expressly in his report. With reference to the hollow agitations which prevailed, and the misguided outcries of certain disturbers of the peace, who were calling for another 31st of May, he said that "a representative who enjoyed a patriotic reputation, earned by five years of toil, and by his unshaken principles of independence and liberty, had warmly refuted this counter revolutionary language." The convention listened attentively to this report, and every one went his way in the expectation of some important event. Each regarded his fellow in silence, and durst neither question or explain.

On the next day, the 8th Thermidor, Robespierre settled upon delivering his famous speech. All his agents had their cue, and Saint-Just arrived in the course of the day. The convention, seeing him in that tribune where he appeared so seldom, were in expectation of a decisive scene. "Citizens," said he, "let others draw flattering pictures for you; I come to tell you useful truths. I come not to realize the ridiculous terrors diffused by perfidy; but I wish to extinguish, if possible, the torch of discord by the mere force of truth. I come to defend before you your outraged authority and violated liberty. I shall defend myself: you will not be surprised at that; you are not like the tyrants with whom you are in conflict. The cries of outraged innocence do not importune your ears, and you cannot but be sensible that this cause nearly concerns you." Robespierre then depicted the agitations which had prevailed for some time, the apprehensions that had been circulated, the designs imputed to the committee and to himself against the convention. "We," exclaimed he, "attack the convention. And what are we without her? Who is it that has defended her at the peril of his life? Who is it that has devoted himself to rescue it from the hands of the factions?" Robespierre replied, that it was himself; and he called his having dragged from the convention Brissot, Vergniaud, Gensonné, Pétion, Barbaroux, Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, &c., defending the convention against fictions. After the proofs of devotedness which he had demonstrated, he expressed his astonishment that sinister reports should have been circulated. "Is it true," said he, "that odious lists have been hawked about, wherein a certain number of members of the convention have been pointed out as victims, and that these lists were first said to have emanated from the committee of public welfare, and then said to have been my work? Is it true that some have dared to suppose meetings of the committee, rigorous resolutions that never had existence, and arrests not less chimerical? Is it true that some persons have taken the pains to persuade a certain number of inapproachable representatives that their destruction was resolved upon, and to persuade all those who, by some error, had paid an inevitable tribute to the fatality of circumstances and to human imperfection, that they were doomed to the fate of conspirators? Is it true that imposture has been propagated with such art and audacity, that a great number of members ceased to sleep at their own homes? Yes, the facts are certain, and the proofs of them are before the committee of public welfare."

He then complained that the accusation preferred en masse against the committees terminated at length in being levelled at him alone. He explained that his name had been identified with whatever misconduct had occurred in the government, that if patriots were imprisoned instead of aristocrats, it was said, It is Robespierre who deserves it, that if patriots had fallen, it was said, It is Robespierre who ordered it, that if numerous agents of the committee of general safety set no limits to their extortion and their rapine, it was said, It is Robespierre who sends them, that if some new law pressed heavily on the fundholders, it was said, It is Robespierre who ruins them. He then said that he was represented as the author of every species of mischief for the purpose of ruining him, that he had been called a tyrant, and that, on the fête in honour of the Supreme Being—that day when the convention had stricken atheism and priestly despotism with one blow, when she had attached all generous hearts to the Revolution—that day, in short, of happiness and pure enthusiasm, the president of the national convention, while addressing the assembled people, had been insulted by guilty creatures, and that these men were representatives! They had called him tyrant! and why? because he had acquired some influence by speaking the language of truth. "And what is it ye want," he exclaimed, "ye who wish truth to be powerless in the mouths of the representatives of the French people? Truth assuredly has her power, she is subject to anger; she also is despotic, she also utters her touching and terrible accents which forcibly vibrate in pure hearts as well as in guilty consciences, and which falsehood has not the power of imitating any more than to Salmonæus was given the faculty of imitating the thunder of the gods. But blame the nation for all this, blame the people, who are affected by truth, and have a strong regard for her. Who am I, myself who am accused? a slave of liberty, a living martyr of the republic, the victim as much as the enemy of crime. Every whipster abuses me. The most indifferent, the most legiti-mate actions on the part of others are crimes in me. A man is slandered as soon as it is known that he is acquainted with me: others are forgiven their open offences, as for myself, my zeal is made a crime. Take from me my conscience, and I am the most miserable of men, I do not even enjoy the rights of a citizen; nay, I am not even allowed to fulfil the duties of a representative of the people."

Robespierre thus defended himself by subtle and diffuse remonstrances, and for the first time he found the convention grave, taciturn, and as it were weary of the length of his speech. At last he came to the pith of the question: he began to be the accuser. Taking a cursory survey of all the departments of the government, he first censured with iniquitous malice the financial system. Originator of the law of the 22nd prairial, he dwelt with a great show of sympathy upon the law concerning the life annuities, there was nothing even to the maximum, against which he did not seem to rise in judgment, saying that intrigues had hurried the convention into violent measures. "In whose hands are the finances?" he exclaimed. "In the hands of Leullius, of notorious rogues, of the Cambons, the Mallumés, and the Rémels." He then passed to the war department, spoke with disdain of those victories which had just been ascribed with an academical suppancy (l'hyperité académique), as though they had not cost either blood or toil. "Keep an attentive watch," cried he, "keep an attentive watch on victory, keep an attentive watch upon Belgium. Your enemies are retreating and leaving you to your intestine divisions, look to the end of the campaign. They have some dissensions among the generals, the military aristocracy is protected, the trusty generals are persecuted; the military administration wraps itself up in a suspicious authority. These truths are epigrammatic." He spoke no further upon Carnot and Baniere, he left to Saint Just the task of condemning the plans of Carnot. We see that this wretched man flung over every thing the bitterness of that gall in which he was absorbed. He next enlarged upon the committee of general safety, on the multitude of its agents, on their cruelties, their rapine, he denounced Amis and Jagot as having seized upon the police, and doing every thing to vilify the revolutionary government. He complained of the sarcasms uttered in the tribune with respect to Catherine Theot, and asserted that men encouraged the belief of feigned conspiracies in order to conceal real ones. He described the two committees as addicted to intrigues, and engaged, in some degree, in the schemes of the anti-national faction. In the whole existing system he found nothing good but the revolutionary government, and in that solely the principle, not the mode in which it was carried out. The principle was his, it was he who caused that government to be instituted, but it was his adversaries who corrupted it.

Such is the substance of Robespierre's voluminous declamations. At length he concluded with this summary. "We assert that there exists a conspiracy against the public liberty, that it derives its strength from a criminal combination, carrying on its intrigues in the very body of the convention; that this combination has accomplices in the committee of general safety, and in the offices of that committee which they govern; that the enemies of the republic have set this committee in opposition to the committee of public welfare, and thus constituted two adverse governments; that members of the committee of public welfare are engaged in this conspiracy; that the coalition thus formed is striving to ruin the patriots and the country. What is the remedy for this evil? To punish the traitors, to remodel the offices of the committee of general safety, to purify the committee itself, and to render it subordinate to the committee of public welfare, to purify even the committee of public welfare, to constitute the government under the supreme authority of the national convention, which is the centre and the judge, and thus crush all the factions by the weight of the national authority, in order to raise upon their ruins the omnipotence of justice and liberty. Such are the principles. If it is impossible to assert them without passing for an ambitious man, I shall conclude that the principles are proscribed, and that tyranny reigns among us; but not that I should on that account be silent on the subject; for what can be objected to a man who is in the right, and who is ready to die for his country? I am made to enter into a conflict with crime—not to govern it. The time is not yet arrived when worthy persons can serve their country with impunity."

Robespierre had commenced his speech in silence, and in silence he concluded it. In every part of the hall all continued mute, while they attentively surveyed him. Those deputies, once so anxious to cheer him, were frigid as ice; they uttered nothing, and seemed to have the courage to exhibit a chill reserve, now that the tyrants, divided among themselves, looked to them as judges. The faces of all had become impenetrable. A faint kind of hollow murmur gradually arose in the assembly, but no one durst rise to speak. Lecointre (of Versailles), one of the most energetic of Robespierre's enemies, was the first to present himself at the tribune, but it was to move that the speech be printed,—such was still the hesitation, even of the boldest, to enter upon the attack. Bourdon (of the Oise) ventured to state his opinion against the printing of the speech, saying that it involved questions too serious, and he required a reference to the two committees. Barrère, always prudent, supported the motion for printing, and at the same time remarked, that in a free country every thing ought to be printed. Couthon rushed to the tribune, indignant at witnessing a wrangling instead of a burst of enthusiasm, and not only urgently called for the printing of the speech, but that it be sent to every one of the communes, as well as to the armies. He was compelled, he said, to pour forth the feelings of his wounded heart, since, for some time past, the deputies most faithful to the cause of the people had been subjected to the most scandalous treatment; they were accused of shedding blood, and of desiring to shed more; and yet, if he could believe that he had contributed to the destruction of a single innocent person, he should kill himself with grief. The speech of Couthon called into action what little submission there remained in the assembly, and the vote passed, that the speech be printed and sent to all the municipalities.

The adversaries of Robespierre were about to labour under a disadvantage; but Vadier, Cambon, Billaud-Varennes, Panis, and Amar, desired to be heard in reply to the accusations of Robespierre. Their courage received fresh vigour from the danger, and the conflict commenced. All wanted to speak at once. The turn of each was settled. Vadier was first allowed to explain himself. He justified the committee of general safety, and maintained that the report in respect of Catharine Théot had for its object to reveal a substantive and a deep-laid conspiracy; and he added, in a significant tone, that he possessed documents proving its importance and its danger. Cambon justified his financial laws and his integrity, which was universally known and admired, in a post where the temptations were so great. He spoke with his usual impetuosity; he proved that none but the stock-jobbers could be hurt by his financial measures, and then throwing off the reserve which had been kept up thus far, "It is high time," he exclaimed, "to tell the whole truth. Is it I who ought to be accused for having made myself master in any one thing? The man who has made himself master of every thing, the man who has paralysed your will, is the man who has just spoken,—that man is Robespierre!" This vehemence disconcerted Robespierre. As if he had been accused of playing the tyrant in financial matters, he declared that he had never meddled with finances; that of course he could never restrain the freedom of the convention in this matter, and that, at any rate, in attacking Cambon's plans, he meant not to attack his intentions. He had, for all that, called him a rogue. Billaud-Varennes, a no less formidable antagonist, said that it was high time to put the whole facts in evidence; he spoke of the secession of Robespierre from the committees, of the removal of the companies of artillery, of which no more than fifteen had been sent out, although the law allowed twenty-four to be sent out. He added, that he was determined to throw off all disguise; and he had rather that his dead body should serve for a footstool to an ambitious man, than countenance his proceedings by his silence. He called for the report upon the decree which ordered the printing of the speech. Panis complained of the continual calumnies of Robespierre, who had wanted to make him pass for the author of the September murders; he wanted that Robespierre and Couthon should explain their motives as to the five or six deputies, the sacrifice of whom they had been for a month past incessantly demanding at the Jacobins. Immediately the same thing was called for on all sides. Robespierre replied with hesitation, that he had merely come to expose abuses, and that he was not bound to justify or accuse this or that person. "Name them; name the individuals!" was the cry. Robespierre evaded the question, and said, that "since he had possessed the courage to communicate to the convention intelligence which he deemed useful, he did not think——" He was again interrupted. "You who pretend to be endued with the courage of virtue," cried Charlier, "pray exemplify the virtue of truth. Name them; name the individuals!" The confusion increased. The question of printing was resumed. Amar insisted on referring the speech to the committee. Barrère perceiving the advantage of declarifying for those who were for a reference to the committees, made a sort of apology for having made a contrary motion. At last the convention revoked its decision, and declared that Robespierre's speech, instead of being printed, should be referred to the consideration of the two committees.

This sitting was a truly extraordinary event. All the deputies, habitually so submissive, had again taken heart. As for Robespierre, who never exhibited anything else than superciliousness without an atom of audacity, he was taken by surprise, rebuffed, and dejected. He had need to compose himself; he hurried to his trusty Jacobins, to regain his friends, and to borrow courage from them. They were already apprized of the event, and were anxiously awaiting his arrival. No sooner did he appear, than he was greeted with applause. Couthon followed him, and shared the acclamations. He was requested to read the speech. Robespierre occupied them two long hours in repeating it to them. Every moment he was interrupted by shouts and frenzied cheering. He had hardly concluded, before he added a few words of lamentation and grief. "This speech which you have just been hearing," said he, "is my last will and testament. I have seen this to-day; the bonds of the wicked are so strong, that I cannot hope to escape them. I fall without regret; I leave you my memory; it will be dear to you, and you will protect it from insult." At these words they cried out that now was not the time to give way to despondency and despair; that, on the contrary, they would avenge the father of the country upon the congregation of the wicked. Henriot, Dumas, Coffinhal, and Payan, surrounded him, and declared that they were quite ready to act. Henriot said, that he had not forgotten the way to the convention. "Separate the wicked from the weak-minded," said Robespierre to them; "deliver the convention from the villains who oppress it; render it the service that it expects of you, as on the 31st of May and the 2nd of June. March, and once more save liberty! If, in spite of all these efforts, we must fall, why then, my friends, you shall see me drink the hemlock with tranquillity." "Robespierre," exclaimed a deputy, "I will drink it with thee!"

Couthon proposed to the society a new purification scrutiny, and desired the instant expulsion of those deputies who had voted against Robespierre; he had a list of them on his person, which he immediately furnished. His motion was carried amidst a frightful uproar. Collot d'Herbois came forward to offer some observations, but was overwhelmed with yells. He spoke of his services, of his dangers, and of Ladmiral's two shots at him. He was snored at, abused, and driven from the tribune. All the deputies present, and pointed out by Couthon, were expelled, some of them even were beaten. Collot escaped from amidst the knives pointed against him. The society was reinforced on that day by all the fighting men, who, in times of agitation, gained admission either with false tickets, or even without any. They added violence to words, and they were even quite ready to add murder. Payan, the national agent, who was a man of execution, proposed a bold scheme. He was for going at once and seizing every one of the conspirators; which could very easily be done, for they were all of them at that moment assembled in those committees to which they belonged as members. This struggle might have been thus terminated, without a conflict, by an off-hand attack. Robespierre set himself against this; he disliked such decisive modes of action; he thought that it would be better to pursue the precedent of the 31st of May. A solemn petition had already been made; he had made a speech; Saint-Just, who had lately arrived from the army, was to make a report the next morning; he, Robespierre, would again speak, and if they were unsuccessful, the magistrates of the people, meanwhile assembled at the commune, and supported by the armed force of the sections, were to declare that the people had resumed their sovereignty, and would proceed to deliver the convention from the villains who led them astray. The plan was thus settled according to precedents. The meeting broke up, pledging themselves for the next day, namely, Robespierre to be at the convention, the Jacobins in their hall, the municipal magistrates at the commune, and Henriot at the head of the sections. They reckoned, moreover, upon the young men in the school of Mars, whose commandant, Labretèche, was devoted to the cause of the commune.

Such were the events of the day of the 8th Thermidor, the last of the sanguinary tyranny which had afflicted France; nevertheless, on that very day the horrible revolutionary machine did not cease its work. The tribunal had been sitting, and victims had been conveyed to the scaffold. In their number were two eminent poets, Roucher, author of the "Mois," and André Chenier, who left admirable indications of genius, and whom France will have to regret as much as any other of the young men of genius, orators, writers, and generals, devoured by the scaffold and by the war. These two sons of the muses cheered one another when in the fatal cart by reciting verses of Racine's. Young André, on mounting the scaffold, uttered the cry of genius stopped short in its career: "To die so young!" he exclaimed, striking his forehead, "there was something there!"

During the night which followed, there was agitation going forward in all the parties, and each party thought of concentrating its own strength. The two committees had met, and were deliberating on the important events of the day and on those of the morrow. What had just passed at the Jacobins proved that the mayor and Henriot would declare for the triumvirs, and that on the next day they should have to struggle against the entire force of the communes. To cause these two principal leaders to be apprehended would have been the most prudent course, but the committees still hesitated; they would and they would not; they seemed to feel a sort of regret in having begun the struggle. The committees plainly saw, that if the convention were strong enough to vanquish Robespierre, she would resume all her powers, and that they would be snatched from the blows of their rival, but dispossessed of the dictatorship. It would no doubt have been much better to have come to terms with him; but it was now too late. Robespierre had taken good care not to go among them, after the sitting at the Jacobins. Saint-Just, who had just arrived from the army a few hours previously, was watching them. He was silent; they asked him for the report with which he had been entrusted at the time of his last being present; the committees wished to hear it read. He replied that he had it not with him, but had given it to one of his colleagues to read. He was requested to state its conclusions; he refused that also. At this moment Collot entered, incensed at the treatment which he had experienced at the Jacobins. "What are they doing at the Jacobins?" said Saint-Just to him. "Dost thou ask?" replied Collot angrily; "art thou not the accomplice of Robespierre? Have you not concerted your plans together? I see it plain enough, you have formed an infamous triumvirate, and that you want to assassinate us; but if we fail, you will not long enjoy the fruit of your crimes." Then going up to Saint-Just with vehemence, "Thou dost intend," said he, "to denounce us to-morrow morning; thou hast thy pocket full of notes against us; show them ——" Saint-Just emptied his pockets, and assured Collot that he had nothing of the kind. Collot was appeased, and Saint-Just was ordered to come at eleven the next morning to communicate his report before reading it to the assembly. The committees, before they separated, agreed to ask the convention to discharge Henriot, and to summon the mayor and the national agent to the bar.

Saint-Just hastened away to prepare his report, which was not yet written; and denounced, with much more brevity and force than Robespierre had done, the conduct of the committees towards their colleagues, their usurpation of affairs in general, the imperiousness of Billaud-Varennes, and the false manoeuvres of Carnot, who had conveyed Pichegru's army to the coasts of Flanders, and had meant to tear away sixteen thousand men from Jourdan. This report was as perfidious, and in another way quite as able, as that of Robespierre. Saint-Just resolved to read it to the convention without showing it to the committees.

While the conspirators were concerting together, the Mountaineers, who had hitherto contented themselves with communicating their apprehensions to one another, and had formed no plot, now hurried to the houses of each other, and agreed to attack Robespierre in a more formal manner on the following day, and to get him impeached, if it were possible. To bring this about, they would require the concurrence of the deputies of the Plain, whom they had frequently threatened, and whom Robespierre, affecting the character of moderator, had formerly defended. They had therefore but slight claims to their favour. However they sought out Boissy d'Anglas, Durand-Maillane and Palasne-Champenoux, all three of them constituents, and whose example was likely to decide the others. They told them that they would be accountable for all the blood that Robespierre might yet spill, if they did not agree to vote against him. Repulsed at first, they returned three times to the charge, and at length obtained the desired promise. They bestirred themselves vigorously the whole of the morning of the 9th; Tallien promised to make the first attack, and only desired that others would venture to follow him.

Every one hastened to his post. Fleuriot, the mayor, and Payan, the national agent, were at the commune. Henriot was on horseback with his aides-de-camp, and was riding through the streets of Paris. The Jacobins had commenced a permanent sitting. The deputies, who had turned out early in the morning, had repaired to the convention before the usual hour. They paced the lobbies tumultuously, and the Mountaineers conversed with them in an animated manner, so as to decide them in their favour. It was half-past eleven o'clock. Tallien was speaking to some of his colleagues at one of the doors of the hall, when he saw Saint-Just enter, who ascended the tribune. "Now is the time!" he exclaimed; "we'll go in." They followed him; the benches filled; and the assembly awaited in silence the opening of that scene, one of the grandest in our stormy revolution.

Saint-Just, who had broken his word with his colleagues, and who had not gone to read his report to them, was in the tribune. The two Robespierres, Lebas, and Couthon, were seated beside one another. Collot d'Herbois was in the chair. Saint-Just said that he was commissioned by the committees to make a report, and then was allowed to speak. He set out with asserting that he belonged to no faction, and that he belonged only to truth; that the tribune might prove the Tarpeian rock to him or many others, but that he should nevertheless give his opinion without reserve upon the dissensions which had broken out. Tallien scarcely let him finish these preliminary sentences, before he asked leave to speak on a call to order, and obtained it. "The republic," said he, "is in the most unfortunate condition, and no good citizen can help shedding tears over her. Yesterday a member of the government separated himself and denounced his colleagues; another is doing the same to-day. This is only aggravating our calamities. I desire that at length the veil may be entirely thrown aside." Scarcely were these words uttered, when cheers burst forth. It was prolonged and renewed for the third time. This was the signal, the harbinger of the fall of the triumvirs. Billaud-Varennes, who took possession of the tribune after Tallien, said that the Jacobins had the preceding evening held a seditious sitting, which was attended by ambushed assassins, who have avowed a design of slaughtering the convention. General indignation was manifested. "I see," added Billaud-Varennes, "I see in the galleries one of the men who yesterday threatened the trusty deputies. Let him be secured." He was immediately seized and given into the custody of the gendarmes. Billaud then maintained that Saint-Just had no right to speak in the name of the committees, inasmuch as he had not communicated his report to them; that this was the moment for the assembly to be firm, for perish she must if she exhibited any weakness. "No, no," cried the deputies, waving their hats; "she will not be weak, she shall not perish." Lebas claimed to be heard before Billaud had gone from the tribune; he agitated himself, and made a great noise to get possession of the tribune. At the desire of all the deputies, he was called to order. He renewed his demand to be heard. "To the Abbaye with the seditious fellow!" cried several voices of the Mountain. Billaud continued, and throwing aside all delicacy, said that Robespierre had always sought to rule the committees; that he had seceded, when they were opposed to his law of the 22d Fructid., and the use which he purposed to make of it; that he was for retaining the noble Lavalette, a conspirator at Lille, in the national guard; that he had prevented the arrest of Henriot, an accomplice of Hébert's, in order to make him his creature; that he moreover opposed the apprehension of a secretary of the committee, who had stolen one hundred and fourteen thousand francs; that he had caused the best revolutionary committee of Paris to be closed by means of his office of police; that he always had done just what he pleased, and wanted to make himself absolute master. Billaud added, that he could adduce many other facts, but it would suffice to say, that, on the preceding day, Robespierre's agents at the Jacobins, the Dumases and the Coffinhalts, had settled amongst each other to decimate the national convention. While Billaud was enumerating these grievances, bursts of indignation every now and then escaped the assembly. Robespierre, livid with rage, had left his seat, and was endeavouring to ascend the steps of the tribune. Standing behind Billaud, he demanded of the president with extreme violence permission to speak. He seized the moment when Billaud was about concluding, to renew his demand with still greater vehemence. "Down with the tyrant! down with the tyrant!" was shouted in all parts of the hall. Twice was this accusing cry raised, and it proclaimed that the assembly dared at length to give him the name which he deserved. While he was still endeavouring to gain a hearing, Tallien, who had darted to the tribune, claimed permission to speak, and obtained it before him. "It was but this moment," said he, "that I desired that the veil might be entirely torn off; I now perceive that it soon will be. The conspirators are unmasked. I knew that my head was in danger, and hitherto I have kept silence; but yesterday I attended the sitting of the Jacobins, I witnessed the formation of the army of the new Cromwell formed; I shuddered for my country, and I armed myself with a dagger, resolved to plunge it into his bosom, if the convention had not the courage to pass a decree of impeachment." As he finished these words, Tallien exhibited his dagger, and they showered their plaudits upon him. He then moved for the arrest of the chief of the conspirators, Henriot. Billaud proposed to add that of Dumas, the president, and of a man named Boulanger, who had been the day before one of the most violent agitators at the Jacobins. They immediately decreed the apprehension of those three culprits.

At this moment Barrère entered, to submit to the assembly the propositions upon which the committee had deliberated the previous night before it broke up. Robespierre, who had not quitted the tribune, took advantage of this interval again to demand leave to speak. His adversaries were determined to refuse it, fearful lest any remains of fear or servility should be awakened by his voice. Placed, all of them, at the top of the Mountain, they raised fresh clamours, and, while Robespierre was turning first to the president, then to the assembly, shouted with voices of thunder, "Down! down with the tyrant!" Barrère again obtained leave to speak before Robespierre. It is said that this man, who, out of vanity, was desirous of playing a part, and now trembled from weakness at having taken upon himself to perform one, had two speeches in his pocket, one for Robespierre, the other for the committees; he developed the proposition settled the previous night, which was, to abolish the post of commandant general, to establish that old law of the legislative assembly, by which each commander of a legion commanded in turn the armed force of Paris, and lastly, to summon to the bar the mayor and the national agent, to answer there for the tranquillity of the capital. This decree was forthwith passed, and an officer of the assembly went to communicate it to the commune in the greatest possible peril.

When the decree proposed by Barrère had been adopted, the enumeration of the wrongs that Robespierre had committed was resumed. Every one came in turn to make his charge. Vadier, who fancied that he had discovered an important conspiracy in seizing Catherine Théot, stated what he had omitted to say the preceding day, that Dom Gerle had a certificate of civism signed by Robespierre, and that in Catlavine's mattress had been found a letter, in which she called Robespierre her beloved son. He then enlarged upon the espionage with which the committees were surrounded, with the prolixity of an old man, and a tardiness by no means suited to the agitation of the moment. Tallien, getting impatient, reascended the tribune, and again addressed the assembly, saying, that the question ought to be brought back to its question, really to be settled. They had in fact decreeted Henriot, Dumas, and Boulanger, and they had called Robespierre a tyrant, but yet they had taken no decisive resolution. Tallien observed, that it was not upon a few circumstances in the life of that man, called a tyrant, on which they were to form a judgment, but that they were to consider the whole tenor of his life. He then commenced an energetic picture of the conduct of that cowardly, supercilious, and blood-thirsty orator. Robespierre, choked with rage, interrupted him with cries of fury. Louchet said: "This must be put an end to." "A warrant of arrest against Robespierre!"—"The accusation against thy grand accuser!" added Leseau. "The accusation! The accusation!" shouted a great number of deputies. Louchet rose, and, looking around him, asked if any one seconded him. "Yes, yes," replied a hundred voices. Robespierre, the younger, said from his place: "I shared the crimes of my brother; let me be joined with him." Scarcely any attention was paid to this act of devotedness. "The arrest! the arrest!" was still the cry. At this moment Robespierre, who was incessantly pacing from his place to the bureau, and from the bureau to his place, again went up to the president and demanded leave to speak. But Thuriot, who had succeeded Collot d'Herbois in the chair, answered him only by ringing the bell. Robespierre then turned towards the Mountain, where he observed only cold friends or furious enemies. He next turned his eyes towards the plain. "It is to you," said he, "pure and virtuous men, that I address myself, and not to brigands." They either turned away their heads or threatened him. Once more he addressed the president. "For the last time," he exclaimed, "president of assassins, I desire to be heard." He uttered the concluding words in a faint and stifled voice. "The blood of Danton suffocates thee!" said Garnier (of the Aube). Impatient of this struggle, Duval rose and said, "President, is this man any longer to be master of the convention?" "Ah," added Fréron, "how hard a tyrant is to be beaten down." "To the vote! to the vote!" cried Leseau. The arrest so generally called for was put to the vote, and decreed amidst tremendous uproar. No sooner was the decree passed, than on every side of the hall the members rose and shouted, "Liberty for ever! Long live the republic! The tyrants are no more!"

A great number of members rose and said, that they had intended to vote for the arrest of Robespierre's accomplices, Saint-Just and Couthon. They were immediately included in the decree. Lebas desired to be associated with them; his desire was granted, as well as that of the younger Robespierre. These men still excited such apprehension, that the officers of the hall had not dared to come forward to take them to the bar. On seeing them retain their seats, some of the members asked why they did not go down to the place of the accused. The president replied, that the officers had not been able to carry the order into execution. The shout of, "To the bar! to the bar!" now became general. The five accused went down thither. Robespierre furious, Saint-Just calm and contemptuous, and the others thunderstruck at this humiliation so new to them. They were at length at that place whither they had sent Vergniaud, Brissot, Pétion, Camille Desmoulins, Danton, and so many others of their colleagues, so remarkable for their virtue, genius, or courage.

It was now five o'clock. The assembly had declared its sitting permanent. But at that moment, worn out with fatigue, it took the dangerous resolution to suspend the sitting till seven, for obtaining a slight refreshment. The deputies then separated, and left it to the commune, if it had possessed any boldness, the opportunity of closing the place of its sittings, and possessing themselves of absolute power in Paris. The five accused were conducted to the committee of general safety, and interrogated by their colleagues before they were conveyed to prison.

While these important events were occurring in the convention, the commune had remained in suspense. Courvol, the officer of the convention, had gone to give int notice of the decree which placed Henriot under arrest, and summoned the mayor and the national agent to the bar. He had been very rudely received. He asked for a receipt, but the mayor replied, On such a day as this we give no receipts. Go to the convention; go and tell it that we shall find means to maintain it; and tell Robespierre not to be afraid, for we are here. The mayor had afterwards expressed himself, before the general council, in the most mysterious manner as to the object of the meeting; he confined himself to the decree which ordered the commune to watch over the tranquillity of Paris; he called to their mind those periods when that commune had displayed great courage, and had alluded very plainly to the 31st of May. The national agent, Payan, speaking after the mayor, had proposed sending two members of the council to the Place de la Commune, where an immense crowd had assembled, to harangue the people, and to invite them to join with the magistrates in saving the country. An address had then been prepared, in which it was said that a set of miscreants were oppressing Robespierre, that virtuous citizen, who caused the decretal of that consulatory worship of the Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul; Saint-Just, that apostle of virtue, who had extinguished treason at the Rhine and in the north; Couthon, that virtuous citizen, who had no more than the body and head of a living man, but whose were burning with patriotism. Immediately afterwards, it was resolved that the sections should be convoked; and that the presidents and the commandants of the armed force should be summoned to the commune to receive its orders. A deputation had been despatched to the Jacobins, that they should come and fraternize with the commune, and send to the general council the most energetic of their members, and a good number of citizens and citizenesses of the galleries. Without directly naming insurrection, the commune took all the requisite steps, and evidently proceeded with that object in view. The commune was still in ignorance of the arrest of the five deputies, and on this account it still maintained some reserve.

Meanwhile Henriot had mounted his horse, and was riding through the streets of Paris. Hearing, by the way, of the arrest of five representatives, he therefore strove to excite the people, crying out that villains were oppressing the trusty deputies, and that they had arrested Couthon, Saint-Just, and Robespierre. This wretch was half drunk; he sat unsteady upon his horse, and flourished his sword like a maniac. He first proceeded to the faubourg Saint Antoine, to raise the working classes, who scarcely comprehended what he meant to say, and who had besides begun to relent when they every day witnessed new victims passing to the scaffold. By a fatal mischance Henriot met the carts. When the arrest of Robespierre was known, the people had surrounded them, and as Robespierre was considered as the author of all the murders, it was conceived that he being arrested, the executions would cease. They would have made them turn short back with the condemned, but Henriot, who came up at the moment, opposed this intention, and caused this last execution to be consummated. He then returned, still at full gallop, to the Luxembourg, and ordered the gendarmerie to assemble in the place before the communal house. He took a detachment in his train, and then went down along the quays, so as to get to the Place du Carrousel, and there deliver the prisoners, who were to be found at the committee of general safety. As he was galloping upon the quays with his aides-de-camp, he threw down several persons. A man who had his wife on his arm, turned towards the gendarmes and cried, "Gendarmes, arrest that ruffian! he is no longer your general." An aide-de-camp replied by a cut with his sword. Henriot continued in his course, and dashed through the Rue Saint Honoré. When he got to the place of the Palais-Egalité (Palais-Royal), he perceived Merlin of Thionville, and made up to him shouting, "Arrest that rascal! he is one of those who persecute the trusty representatives." Merlin was immediately seized, maltreated, and taken to the nearest guard-house. When at the courtyard of the Palais National, Henriot made his companions alight, and endeavoured to push his way into the Palais. The grenadiers refused him admittance, and crossed their bayonets. At this moment, an officer of the convention advanced and said, "Gendarmes, arrest that rebel; a decree of the convention orders you to do so." Immediately hereupon Henriot was surrounded and disarmed, together with several of his aides-de-camp; they were pinioned and conducted to the hall of the committee of general safety, along with Robespierre, Couthon, Saint-Just, and Lebas.

Hitherto all went on well for the convention. Her decrees, boldly passed, were successfully executed; but the commune and the Jacobins, who had not yet openly proclaimed the insurrection, were now ready to break out, and realise their scheme of another 2nd of June. Fortunately, while the convention imprudently suspended its sitting, the commune did the same, and thus the time was lost on all sides.

The council did not meet again till six o'clock. At this resumption of the sitting, the arrest of the five deputies and of Henriot was known. The council, on receipt of this intelligence, could not contain itself, and declared itself in a state of insurrection against the oppressors of the people, who desired the destruction of its defenders. The commune also ordered the tocsin to be rung at the Hotel de Ville and in all the sections. It deputed one of its members to each of the sections, to goad them to insurrection, and to decide them to send their battalions to the commune. It despatched gendarmes to close the barriers, and ordered all the keepers of the prisons not to receive the prisoners who should be committed thither. Lastly, the commune appointed an executive commission of twelve members, among whom were to be found Payan and Coffinhal, to take the conduct of the insurrection, and to exorcise all the sovereign powers of the people. At this moment, there were already mustered upon the Place de la Commune some few battalions of the sections, several companies of artillery, and great part of the gendarmerie had already been collected in the Place de la Commune. They then began to administer the oath to the commandants of the battalions there assembled. They next ordered Coffinhal to repair with a few hundred men to the convention, to liberate the prisoners.

Already had the elder Robespierre been conveyed to the Luxembourg, the younger Robespierre to the Maison-Lazare, Couthon to Port-Libre, Saint-Just to the Pecosais, and Lebas to the common gaol (maison de justice) of the department. The order issued by the commune to the keepers of the prisons had been executed, and they refused to receive the prisoners. The administrators of police had taken charge of them, and conveyed them in a coach to the Mairie. When Robespierre appeared people embraced him, loaded him with demonstrations of attachment, and swore to die in his defence and that of the trusty deputies. Meanwhile Henriot was left alone at the committee of general safety. Coffinhal, the vice-president of the Jacobins, arrived there sword in hand with some companies of the sections, took possession of the rooms of the committee, expelled the members, and released Henriot and his aides-de-camp. Henriot, now set at liberty, hastened to the Place du Carrousel, where he still found his horses, leaped upon one of them, and with great presence of mind stated to the companies of the sections and the artillery about him, that the committee had just declared him innocent, and reinstated him in the command. The men rallied around him, and, followed by a considerable force, he began to give orders against the convention, and to prepare for besieging the hall.

It was now seven o'clock in the evening. The convention had already re-assembled; and during the interval the commune had gained great advantages. It had, as we have seen, proclaimed the insurrection, collected around it many companies of artillery and gendarmes, and released the prisoners. It might with boldness march promptly upon the convention, and force it to revoke its decrees. It reckoned, moreover, upon the school of Murs, the commandant of which, Labreteche, was wholly devoted to it.

The deputies assembled tumultuously, and communicated to each other with consternation the news of the evening. The members of the committee, alarmed and undecided, had met in a room by the side of the president's bureau. There they were deliberating, without knowing for what party they were to declare themselves. Several deputies succeeded one another in the tribune, and related what was passing in Paris. It was reported that the prisoners were enlarged, that the commune had met at the Jacobins, that it had already a considerable force at its disposal, and that the convention would soon be besieged. Bourdon proposed to go out in a body and show themselves to the people, in order to bring them over. Legendre made an effort to infuse confidence into the assembly by saying, that go where it would, it would find none but pure and faithful mountaineers ready to defend it; and in this hour of peril he displayed a courage which he had not possessed against Robespierre. Billaud ascended the tribune, and announced the fact that Henriot was in the Place du Carrousel, that he had gained over the artillery, that he had pointed the guns against the hall of the convention, and was about to commence the attack. Collot d'Herbois then went up to the chair, which, from the internal arrangement of the hall, must have received the first balls, and said, as he seated himself in it, "Representatives! now is the moment for dying at our post. Villains have invaded the national palace." At these words all the deputies, some of whom were standing, others strolling about in the hall, took their places, and remained seated in majestic silence. All the citizens in the galleries fled with a tremendous uproar, leaving nothing behind them but a cloud of dust. The convention remained abandoned to itself, and although under the conviction that the members were about to be murdered, yet resolved to perish rather than endure a Cromwell. Let us here admire the influence of circumstances upon courage! These same men, so long submissive to the orator who harangued them, now braved the cannon which he had caused to be pointed against them with a sublime resignation. The members of the assembly went in and out and brought intelligence of what was going on at the Carrousel. Henriot was still giving orders there. "Outlaw him! outlaw the brigand!" was the cry in the hall. A decree of outlawry was immediately passed, and some of the deputies went to proclaim it in front of the national palace.

At this moment Henriot, who had seduced the cannoniers, and had made them point their guns against the hall, wanted to bring them to fire; but these latter hesitated. Some of the deputies cried out, "Cannoniers! will you disgrace yourselves? that brigand is outlawed." The gunners then positively refused to obey Henriot. Abandoned by his men, he had but time to turn his bridle and to seek refuge at the commune.

This first danger over, the convention outlawed the deputies who had withdrawn themselves from its decrees, as well as all those members of the commune who were engaged in rebellion. However, this was not enough. Although Henriot was no longer in the Place du Carrousel, yet the insurgents were still at the commune with all their forces, and they still might resort to the expedient of an off-hand attack. Such a great danger must necessarily be obviated. The convention deliberate without doing any thing. In the small apartment situated behind the bureau, whither the committees and many had gone, it was proposed that a commandant of the armed force should be chosen from the body of the assembly. "Who?" was the question. "Barras," replied a voice, "and he will have the courage to accept the appointment." Thereupon Vouland immediately hurried to the tribune and proposed that Barras, the representative, should be appointed to take the conduct of the armed force. The suggestion was adopted; Barras was appointed, and associated with him seven other deputies to command under his orders: namely, Fréron, Ferraud, Rovère, Delmas, Boleti, Leonard Bourdon, and Bourdon (of the Oise). To this proposal a member of the assembly added another which was not less important, namely, to appoint representatives to go and shew the true state of things to the sections, and require the assistance of their battalions. This last measure was the most necessary of all, for it was more than ever pressing to decide the wavering or misguided sections.

Barras hastened to the battalions already assembled, to acquaint them with his powers, and to post them around the convention. The deputies despatched to the sections repaired thither to harangue them. At this moment the greater part of them were undecided; very few were for holding with the commune and with Robespierre. Every one had a horror of that atrocious system commonly imputed to Robespierre, and longed for an event that should deliver France from such thralldom. Nevertheless, fear still paralyzed the citizens. They durst not make up their minds. The commune, whom the sections had been long accustomed to obey, had summoned them, and some, not daring to resist, had sent in commissaries, not for the purpose of adhering to the scheme of the insurrection, but to obtain intelligence of the passing events. Paris was in a state of uncertainty and anxiety. The relatives of the prisoners, their friends, and all who were suffering from that cruel system, sallied from their houses, drew nearer street by street in the direction of the places where the uproar prevailed, and strove to gain some intelligence. The unfortunate prisoners, having from their barred windows perceived a great commotion, and heard a great noise, suspected that something was the matter, but trembled lest this new event should only aggravate their lot. However, the dejection of the gaolers, words whispered to the list makers, and the consternation which succeeded, had in some measure dissipated their apprehensions. It was soon known, from some loose expressions, that Robespierre was in jeopardy. The relations of the prisoners came to take their station under the windows of the prisons, and to indicate by signs what was passing; and thereupon the prisoners collected, and placed no restraint upon their rejoicings. The base informers, tremblingly, had taken apart some of the suspected, and were compelled to justify themselves, and to persuade them that they were not the authors of the lists of proscription. Some of them, admitting the fact, said that they had nevertheless excluded many names. One had returned no more than forty names instead of two hundred, which were required of him; another had destroyed entire lists. In their fright, these wretches reciprocally accused each other, and cast the infamy of their proceedings from one to the other.

The deputies distributed among the sections had no great difficulty in prevailing against the obscure emissaries of the commune. Those sections who had sent off their battalions to the Hotel de Ville recalled them; the others directed theirs towards the Palais National. Already was the Palais sufficiently protected. Barras went and informed the assembly, and next hastened to the plain of Sablons to supersede Labrotèche, who was dismissed, and to bring the school of Mars to the relief of the convention.

The national representation now found itself sheltered from any off-hand attack that might be made. In point of fact, now was the time for taking hostile measures against the commune, and opening the attack, which it had hitherto neglected to do. It was immediately resolved to march to the Hotel de Ville. Leonard Bourdon, who was at the head of a great number of battalions, put himself in order to march. When he announced that he was now going to meet the rebels, "Go," said Tallien, who occupied the president's chair, "and let the rising sun witness no living conspirators." Leonard Bourdon filed off by the quays, and arrived at the place of the Hotel de Ville. A great number of gendarmes, cannoniers, and armed citizens of the sections, were still to be found there. An agent of the committee of public welfare, named Dulac, had the courage to slide into their ranks, and to read to them the decree of the convention which outlawed the commune. The respect which people had contracted for that assembly, in whose name every thing had been done for two years past, respect for the words law and republic, prevailed over every other consideration. The battalions disbanded: some returned to their own homes, others joined Leonard Bourdon, and the Place de la Commune was deserted. Those who guarded, and those who came to attack it, drew up in the neighbouring streets, in order to close all the outlets.

People had such an idea of the resolution of the conspirators, and were so astonished to find them almost motionless in the Hotel de Ville, that they were fearful of approaching. Leonard Bourdon began to fear that they had undermined the Hotel de Ville, but this was not the case. They were confusedly deliberating, and proposing to write to the armies and to the provinces; but they knew not in whose name they should write, and durst not take any decisive course. Had Robespierre ventured, like a man of decision, to have shown himself, and have marched to the convention, she would in good sooth have been placed at the utmost peril. But he was a mere orator; and, besides, he became sensible, and all his partisans became also sensible with him, that public opinion had abandoned them. The end of that frightful system had arrived; the convention was every where obeyed, and the outlawries produced a magical effect. Even had Robespierre been endued with greater energy, he must have been discouraged by these circumstances, superior to any individual force. The decree of outlawry completely astounded every one, when from the Place de la Commune it came down to the Hotel de Ville. Payan, who received it, read it aloud, and, with great presence of mind, added to the list of the persons outlawed, the people of the galleries, which was not in the decree. Contrary to his expectation, the people of the galleries made their way out in alarm, to avoid sharing in the anathema launched against them by the convention. Then it was that the conspirators were seized with the utmost dismay. Henriot went down to the Place to harangue the gunners, but he found not a single man. "What," cried he, swearing, "do those rascals of cannoniers who saved me a few hours since desert me now?" He then went up-stairs in a rage, to announce this new intelligence to the council. The conspirators were overwhelmed with despair: they found themselves abandoned by their own troops, and hemmed in on all sides by those of the convention; they mutually accused each other, as well as reproached themselves with their misfortune. Coffinhal, an energetic man, who had been ill supported, enraged against Henriot, said to him, "It is thy cowardice, villain, that has lost us!" He rushed upon him, and seizing him round the waist, he threw him out of a window. The wretched Henriot fell upon a dunghheap, which broke the fall, and prevented it from proving mortal. Lebas shot himself with a pistol; the younger Robespierre threw himself out of a window; Saint-Just continued calm and immovable, holding a weapon in his hand, but without attempting to use it against himself; Robespierre at length decided to terminate his career, and found in this extremity the courage to inflict death upon himself, and shot himself with a pistol, but entering above the lip, the ball merely pierced his cheek, and inflicted a wound that was by no means dangerous.

At this moment a few bold men, one Dulac, and Meda a gendarme, and several others, leaving Bourdon with his battalions in the Place de la Commune, went up, armed with swords and pistols, and entered the hall of the council, at the very instant when the two reports of fire-arms were heard. The municipal officers were going to take off their scarfs, but Dulac threatened to sabre the first who should attempt to take it from him. Everybody remained still: they seized upon all the municipal officers, the Payans, the Pleuriots, the Dumas's, the Coffinhals, &c.: the wounded were carried away on shutters, and were brought in triumph to the convention. It was now three o'clock in the morning—shouts of victory rang around the hall, and made the roof echo. Shouts of "Liberty for ever! The constitution for ever! Down with the tyrants!" arose on all sides. The president uttered these words: "Representatives! Robespierre and his accomplices are at the door of your hall; will you have them brought before you?" "No, no," was replied from all sides; "to execution with the conspirators!"

Robespierre was conveyed with his friends to the hall of the committee of public welfare. He was laid upon a table, and some pieces of pasteboard were placed under his head. He had retained his presence of mind, and appeared composed. He wore a blue coat, the same that he wore at the festival of the Supreme Being, nankeen breeches, and white stockings, which amidst the tumult he had let fall over his shoes. The blood flowed from his wound, and he was wiping it away with a pistol-bag. From time to time persons about him gave him bits of paper, which he used to wipe his face. In this state he remained several hours exposed to the curiosity and abuse of a crowd of people. When the surgeon came to dress his wound, he raised himself up, got down from the table, and seated himself in an arm-chair. He underwent a painful dressing without a murmur. With the insensibility and sullenness of humbled pride, he made no reply to any observation. He was then conveyed, along with Saint-Just, Couthon, and the others, to the Conciergerie. His brother and Henriot had been picked up, half dead, in the streets adjoining the Hotel de Ville.

The outlawry dispensed with the formalities of a trial; all that was necessary was to prove the identity. On the morning of the following day, the 10th Thermidor, (28th July,) the culprits, to the number of twenty-one, appeared before that tribunal whither they had sent so many victims. Fouquier-Tinville produced evidence of identity, and at four in the afternoon, he caused them to be conveyed to execution. The populace, who had long forbore to attend the executions, hastened thither on that day with great eagerness. The scaffold had been erected in the Place de la Révolution. An immense crowd filled the Rue Saint Honoré, the Tuileries, and the Grande Place. Numerous relatives of the victims followed the carts, pouring forth imprecations upon them; many went up to them desiring to see Robespierre; the gendarmes pointed him out to them with their swords; when the culprits had reached the scaffold, the executioners showed Robespierre to the populace; they took off the bandage fastened round his jaw, and wrung from him the first cry of pain he up to that time uttered. He suffered with the same phlegmatic composure he had displayed for the last twenty-four hours. Saint-Just died with the courage which he had always exhibited. Couthon was dejected; Henriot and the younger Robespierre were nearly dead from the effects of their wounds. Shouts of applause accompanied every descent of the fatal knife, and the multitude manifested extraordinary joy. The rejoicing was universal throughout Paris. In the prisons loud singing was heard, people embraced one another in a species of intoxication, and paid as much as thirty francs for the newspapers reporting the recent events. Although the convention had not declared that it abolished the system of terror, and although the victors themselves were either the originators or the apostles of that system, it was considered as terminated with Robespierre; to such a degree had he identified himself with all its horrors.

Such was that happy event, which terminated the ascending movement of the Revolution, so that it now commenced its retrograde movement. The revolution had, on the 14th of July, 1789, overthrown the ancient feudal constitution; she had on the 5th and 6th of October dragged the king from his court to ensure the possession of his person; she had then framed a constitution for herself, and had committed it to his keeping in 1791, as an experiment. Soon having to be dissatisfied with this trial, and despairing of ever reconciling the court to liberty, she had stormed the Tuileries on the 10th of August, and thrown Louis XVI. into prison. When Austria and Prussia were advancing to destroy her, she threw down, to use her own awful language, she threw down, as the gauntlet of defiance, the head of a king, and the lives of six thousand prisoners; she entered in a most uncompromising manner into that struggle, and repelled the allies by her early exertions. Her wrath augmented the number of her enemies; the increase of her enemies and of her danger redoubled her wrath and converted it into rage. She violently tore those sincere republicans from the sanctuary of the laws, who, not comprehending these extremities, sought to moderate them. Then she had to fight one-half of France, La Vendée, and Europe. By the effect of this continual action and reaction of impediments upon her will, and of her will upon obstacles, she mounted at last to the highest degree of danger and exasperation. She erected scaffolds, and sent a million of men to the frontiers. Then, sublime and atrocious at the same time, she was observed to destroy with a blind fury, and to direct the national energies with surprising promptness and with the profoundest views of prudence. Converted again, by the necessity for energetic action, from a turbulent democracy to an absolute dictatorship, she became well regulated, silent, and formidable. During the entire of the latter part of 1793 till the beginning of 1794, she progressed onward, reconciled by the imminence of the danger which surrounded her. But when victory had crowned her efforts, at the end of 1793, a discord would then arise, for generous and mighty hearts, tranquilized by success, cried, "Mercy to the vanquished!" But all hearts were not yet tranquilized; the salvation of the revolution was not evident to the minds of all; the pity of some excited the fury of others, and there were extravagant spirits who wished, instead of a regular government, a tribunal of death. The dictatorship struck down the two new parties which impeded its march. Hébert, Ronsin, and Vincent, perished with Danton and Camille-Desmoulins. The revolution thus continued its career, covered itself with glory from the commencement of 1794, vanquished all Europe, and overwhelmed it with confusion. This was the period when pity was to gain the ascendancy over rage. But then it happened what always will come to pass: out of the incident of a day they desired to complete a system. The heads of the government had systematized violence and cruelty, and when the dangers and excitements were past, they still wished to murder more and more; but the public indignation was everywhere roused. To this opposition they would have replied by the accustomed expedient—death! Then it was that one and the same cry issued from their rivals in power and from the threatened colleagues, and this cry was the signal for a general insurrection. It required a few moments to shake off the numbness of fear; the effort soon proved successful, and the system of terror was overthrown.

It may be asked, what would have happened if Robespierre had gained the ascendancy? The state of desertion in which he found himself, proves that this could never have taken place. But even had he been conqueror, he must either have yielded to the general feeling, or have ultimately fallen. Like all usurpers, he would have been compelled to substitute for the horrors of faction a calm and mild system. But besides this, the disposition of such an usurper did not belong to him. Our revolution had too great a range to permit that the same man, who was deputy to the constituent assembly in 1789, should be proclaimed emperor or protector in 1804, in the church of Notre-Dame. In a country less advanced and of less extent, as England then was, where the same person might still be tribune and general, and combine the two functions, a Cromwell might be both a party man at the beginning, and a usurping soldier at the conclusion. But in a revolution so extended as ours, in which the war had been so terrible and so overpowering, wherein the same individual could not occupy at one and the same time the tribune and the camp, party men first devoured one another; after them came the military men, and a soldier finally remained the ultimate master.

Robespierre, then, could not act with us the part of a usurper. How came it that he was permitted to survive all those famous revolutionists, so far his superiors in genius and in might? Danton, for example? Robespierre was a man who was incorruptible, and a good reputation is requisite for captivating the crowd. He was without sympathy, and pity in revolutions destroys its pos-sector. He was possessed by an obstinate and pertinacious pride, and this is the only means of keeping oneself constantly present to people's minds. With these qualifications he necessarily survived all his rivals. But he was of the worst species of men. A devotee without passions, without the vices to which passions are exposed, but yet without the courage, the greatness, and the sensibility which ordinarily accompany them; a devotee living for nothing else than to satisfy his pride and his creed, hiding himself in the hour of danger, coming forth to attract adoration after the victory had been gained by others, is one of the most odious beings that could have bore absolute rule over men, and one would also say the most vile, if he had not possessed a strong conviction and acknowledged incorruptibility.

THE events of the 9th and 10th Thermidor had occasioned rejoicings that even the lapse of several days could not tranquillize. The excitement was general. A great number of persons who had left their province to conceal themselves in Paris hurried to the public vehicles, to carry to their homes the tidings of the general deliverance. They were every where stopped upon the road to detail the particulars. On receiving intelligence of these happy events, some returned to their dwellings which they had long since quitted; others, buried in subterraneous retreats, ventured to appear again in the light of day. The prisoners detained in the numerous prisons in France began to hope for liberty, or at least they ceased to dread the scaffold.

No explanation was as yet tendered as to the nature of the revolution which had just taken place; nobody as yet came to inquire how far the surviving members of the committee of public welfare were disposed to continue the revolutionary system, or how far the convention was disposed to enter into their views; all they saw, all they comprehended, was but one thing, the death of Robespierre. It was he who had been the head of the government; it was to him were imputed the imprisonments, the executions, in short, all the acts of the late tyranny. Robespierre being dead, it seemed that everything must be changed and resume a different appearance.

After the termination of any great event, the public expectation eagerly demands to be satisfied as to its results. After two days dedicated to the receipt of congratulations, in listening to addresses, in all of which were repeated the same words, Catiline is no more, the republic is saved; in rewarding acts of courage; in voting monuments to perpetuate the memory of the great event of the 9th [Thermidor]; the convention at length became occupied with those measures her situation demanded.

The popular commissions instituted for the trial of the prisoners, the revolutionary tribunal composed by Robespierre, and the bar of Fouquier-Tinville, were still in operation, and needed but a sign of encouragement to continue their terrible functions. In the very sitting of the 11th Thermidor (29th July) the purification of the popular commissions was proposed and decreed. Elie Lacoste directed attention to the revolutionary tribunal, and proposed its suspension until it should be reorganized upon different principles, and composed of other men. The motion of Elie Lacoste was adopted, and, in order not to delay the trial of Robespierre's accomplices, it was agreed to appoint, during that very sitting, a provisional commission to supersede the revolutionary tribunal*. In the evening sitting, Barrère, who continued his office of reporter, came for the purpose of announcing a victory, the entrance of the French into Liege; and he subsequently addressed the assembly upon the state of the committees which had from time to time been retrenched, and reduced by the scaffold or by missions to a small number of members. Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, had expired on the preceding day [28th July]. Héault-Sczelles had died with Danton. Jean-Bon-Saint-André and Prieur (of La Marne) were [absent]

* There was more than one tribunal erected for revolutionary purposes. There was first, the tribunal of the 17th of August, which was instituted at Paris on the 17th of August, 1793, for the trial of those who were accused of having been the first to fire in the affair of the Tuilleries of the 10th of August. Then there was the revolutionary tribunal established by the national convention at the suggestion of Danton, the 28th of March, 1793. The style of this tribunal was tribunal criminel extraordinaire révolutionnaire, and it was composed of nine members; its judgments were without appeal, and involved the confiscation of the estates of those whom it condemned. And lastly, the present tribunal mentioned in the text, which was suppressed the 31st of May, 1795. Trans.

on mission. All that remained were Carnot, who was solely occupied with the war department; Prieur (of the Côte d'Or), commissioned with the furnishing arms and ammunition; and Robert Lindet, who had to controul the supplies of provision and trade; Billaud-Varennes and Collot d'Herbois, charged with the correspondence and the administrative bodies; and lastly, Barrère with the reports. Out of twelve, therefore, there remained but six. The committee of general safety was more complete, and was perfectly adequate to its functions. Barrère proposed to replace the three members who had expired on the preceding day upon the scaffold, by three new members in the interval, and until the general remodelling of the committees, which was fixed for the 20th of every month, but which had been discontinued ever since the tacit consent given to the dictatorship. This was commencing the discussion of great questions: were they going to discharge all those men who had sided with the late government? Were they going to change not only men but things, to alter the form of the committees, to take precautions against their too great influence, to limit their powers,—in a word, to effect a complete revolution in the administration? Such were the questions raised by Barrère's proposition. In the first place, opposition was exhibited against that hasty and dictatorial mode of proceeding which consisted in proposing and appointing the members of the committees at one and the same sitting. A motion was made that the list should be printed, and the nomination adjourned. Dubois-Crancé went still further, and complained against the prolonged absence of the members of the committees. "If they had," as he said, "appointed a successor to Héault-Sechelles, and had not still suffered Prieur (of La Marne) and Jean-Bon-Saint-André to be continually absent on mission, they would have been more certain of having a majority, and not have hesitated so long as to attacking the triumvirs." He then argued that men exhausted themselves by the exercise of power, and that it made them contract dangerous tendencies. Consequently he proposed that it should be decreed from thenceforward no member of the committees should be authorized to go on mission, and that every committee should be renewed as to a fourth part of its members once in every month. Cambon carrying the discussion still further, said that the entire government ought to be reorganized. The committee of public welfare had, according to him, usurped everything; and the result was, that its members, were they even to labour night and day, could not perform their task, and that the committees of finance, of legislation, and of general safety, were reduced to a perfect nullity. Consequently there was a necessity for creating a new distribution of powers, so as to prevent the committee of public welfare from being overloaded, and the others from being annulled.

The discussion being thus excited, they were about to lay hands on all the departments of the revolutionary government. Bourdon (of the Oise), whose opposition to Robespierre's system was well known, since he was to have been one of its first victims, checked this inconsiderate movement. He said that up to that time they had possessed an able and vigorous government; that they were indebted to it for the salvation of France and for glorious victories; that they ought to pause before they carelessly laid hands upon its organization; that all the hopes of the aristocrats were about reviving; and that, in protecting themselves from a new tyranny, they ought to modify, but with caution, an institution to which they owed such important results. However, Tallien, the hero of the 9th [Thermidor], was desirous that certain questions at least should be entered into, and he saw no impropriety in settling them at once. Why not, for example, decree at once that the committees should be renewed by the fourth part every month? This proposition of Dubois-Crancé's, submitted in another form by Tallien, was received with enthusiasm, and adopted amidst shouts of Vive la république! To this measure, the deputy Delmas was desirous of adding one other. "You have just been drying up the well-spring of ambition," said he to the assembly: "to render your decree perfect in all points, I propose that you decide that no member shall be able to return to a committee for one month after he shall have gone out." The motion of Delmas was received as the preceding, and was forthwith carried. These principles being admitted, it was settled on all hands that a commission should present a new plan for the organization of the committees of government.

On the following day, six members were chosen to replace the dead or absent members of the committee of public welfare. On this occasion, the presentation made by Barrère was not confirmed. They nominated Tallien, to reward him for his courage, Bréard, Thuriot, and Treilhard, members of the first committee of public welfare; lastly, the two deputies Laloi and Échassériaux senior, this last-named individual being well-versed in matters of finance and political economy. The committee of general safety also underwent changes. There was a great clamour on all sides against David, who was said to be devoted to Robespierre, and also against Jagot and Lavicomterie, who were accused of having been horrible inquisitors. A great number of voices called for their removal: it was decreed. In order to fill their places and to complete the committee of general safety, they appointed several of those militants of the 9th to succeed them, namely, Legendre, Merlin (of Thionville), Goupilleau (of Fontenay), André Dumont, Jean Debry, and Bernard (of Saintes). Next they unanimously repealed the law of the 22nd Prairial. Great indignation was expressed against the decree which allowed the imprisonment of a deputy before he had been previously heard by the convention,—a fatal decree which had consigned to death illustrious victims, associated with the recollection of all then present, Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, Héault-Sechelles, &c. The decree was repealed. It was not enough that things were to be changed: there were men whom the public resentment could not pardon. "All Paris," exclaimed Legendre, "demands at your hands the justly merited punishment of Fouquier-Tinville." This motion was instantly decreed, and Fouquier-Tinville was placed under accusation. "No one can sit any longer by the side of Lebon," cried another voice; and all eyes were fixed on the proconsul who had dabbled the city of Arras with blood, and whose excesses had provoked remonstrances even under Robespierre, Lebon was immediately decreed with arrest. They returned to the case of David, whom they first contented themselves with excluding from the committee of general safety, and he also was placed under arrest. The same measure was taken against Heron, the principal of the agents of that police instituted by Robespierre; against General Rossignol, already a well-known character; and against Hermann, president of the revolutionary tribunal under Dumas, and who had become, through Robespierre's influence, the chief of the commission of the tribunals.

Thus the revolutionary tribunal was suspended, the law of the 22nd Prairial repealed, the committees of public welfare and general safety in part recomposed, and the principal agents of the late dictatorship arrested and prosecuted. The character of the late revolution was plainly enough declared; every body gave the rein to their hopes, to complaints of every description. The persons under confinement, who filled the prisons, and their families, said to one another with joy, that they were at length about to enjoy the results of the event of the 9th. Before that happy moment, the relations of the suspected durst not appeal even for the purpose of urging the most legitimate reasons, whether it were for fear of awakening the attention of Fouquier-Tinville, or from the apprehension of being imprisoned themselves for having solicited in behalf of aristocrats. The reign of terror had passed by. The meetings of the sections were again resumed; formerly abandoned to sans-culottes, who were paid forty sous per day, they were immediately filled by persons who had just revisited the light of day, by relatives of the prisoners, by the fathers, brothers, or sons of the victims sacrificed by the revolutionary tribunal. A desire to deliver their kinsfolk animated some, revenge actuated others. They made demands at all the sections for the liberation of the prisoners, and they repaired to the convention to obtain this boon. These demands were referred to the committee of general safety, which was charged with the review of the application of the law of suspected persons. Although the committee still comprehended the greater number of those individuals who had signed the orders of arrest, yet the force of circumstances and the association of new members could not fail to incline it to clemency. It began, in fact, by adjudicating a multitude of liberations. Some of its members, Legendre, Merlin, and others, went through the prisons, to hear petitions, and diffused joy there by their presence and their words; others sitting night and day, received the petitions of relatives, who thronged to apply for discharges. The committee was directed to enquire whether the alleged suspected persons had been imprisoned as coming within the description of the law of the 17th of September, and if those causes were specified in the warrants of arrest. This was simply nothing more than recurring to a more precise execution of the law of the 17th of September; still it was sufficient to empty the prisons almost entirely. The indecent haste of the revolutionary agents had in fact been so great, that they had frequently made arrests without stating distinctly the causes of arrest, and without giving the required notice of them to the prisoners. These were released, as they had been confined, that is, en masse. Joy, less turbulent, then became more heartfelt: it was diffused among families, which recovered a father, a brother, or a son, of whom they had long been deprived, and whom they had even looked upon as doomed to the scaffold. They even set at liberty those men whose lukewarmness or whose connexions had rendered them suspected by a jealous authority, as also those whose patriotism, although well-attested, could not save them from the consequences of their opposition. That youthful general, who, by uniting on one of the slopes of the Vosges the two armies of the Moselle and the Rhine, had raised the blockade of Landau by a movement worthy of the greatest commanders, Hoche, imprisoned for his opposition to the committee of public welfare, was liberated and restored to his family, and to those armies he was destined to lead again to victory. Kilmaine, who saved the army of the north by retreating from Caesar's camp in August 1793, and was thrown into prison for that admirable retreat, was also set at liberty. That young and beautiful female, who had acquired such empire over Tallien, and who, from the recesses of her prison, had never ceased to stimulate his courage, was delivered by him, and became his wife. The discharges every day increased, without the petitions which overwhelmed the committee becoming less numerous. "Victory," said Barrère, "has just determined a period when the country can be indulgent without danger to itself, and can consider faults of incivism as atoned for by a temporary imprisonment. The committees are constantly adjudicating upon the discharges petitioned for; they are incessantly employed in repairing individual errors or acts of injustice. Very soon all traces of private revenge will disappear from the soil of the republic; but the concurrence of persons of both sexes about the doors of the committee of general safety only serves to retard labours so beneficial to the citizens. We make due allowance for the very natural anxiety of families; but why retard, by solicitations reflecting upon the legislators, and by too numerous assemblies, the rapid march which national justice ought to take at this period?"

The committee of general safety was, in fact, beset with solicitations of every description. The women, in particular, exerted their influence to obtain acts of clemency; even on behalf of known enemies of the revolution more than one deception was practised upon the committee: the dukes of Aumont and Valentinois were liberated under fictitious names, and a great many others saved themselves by means of the same subterfuge. There was no great harm in that; for, as Barrère had observed, victory had marked the epoch when the republic could become mild and indulgent. But the report that got wind, that the committee were setting at liberty a great number of aristocrats, was likely to awaken the revolutionary mistrusts, and to destroy the kind unanimity with which measures of clemency and peace were welcomed.

The sections were agitated, and became tumultuous. It was not possible, in fact, that the relatives of prisoners or of victims, that the suspected persons recently liberated, that all those, in short, to whom freedom of speech was restored, should confine themselves to seeking reparation for former severities, without also demanding vengeance.

Almost all were furious against the revolutionary committees, and complained loudly against them. They were for remodelling, nay, even for suppressing them entirely, and these discussions produced some disturbances in Paris. The section of Montreuil came to denounce the arbitrary acts of its revolutionary committee; the section of the French Pantheon declared that its committee had lost its confidence; that of the Social Contract likewise took severe measures in regard to its committee, and appointed a commission to examine its registers.

This was only a natural reaction of the moderate class, long reduced to silence and to terror by the inquisitors of the revolutionary committees. These movements could not fail of striking the attention of the Mountain.

That terrible Mountain had not perished with Robespierre, and had survived him. Some of its members had remained convinced of the uprightness, of the integrity of Robespierre's intentions, and did not believe that he ever meant to usurp. They looked upon him as the victim of Danton's friends, and of the corrupt party whose remains he had not been able to destroy; but it was a very small number who held this opinion. The great majority of the mountaineers, staunch republicans, enthusiasts, regarding with horror every scheme of usurpation, had lent their assistance to the 9th Thermidor, not so much with a view to overthrow a sanguinary system, as to strike a rising Cromwell. Without doubt they found such revolutionary justice as Robespierre, Saint-Just, Couthon, Fouquier, and Dumas had administered, iniquitous, but they had no intention to diminish one jot the energy of the government, or give any quarter to those who were termed the aristocrats. The greater part were pure and rigid men, who had no concern in the dictatorship and its acts, and in no wise felt interested in supporting it; but at the same time, jealous revolutionists, who were by no means desirous the 9th Thermidor should be converted into a reaction, and be made available for the purposes of a party. Among those of their colleagues who had united to overthrow the dictatorship, they saw with distrust men who had the character of rogues, men of profuse expenditure, friends of Chabot and Fabre d'Eglantine; in short, members of the speculating, stock-jobbing, and corrupt party. They had supported them against Robespierre; but they were ready to fight with them, if they perceived any tendency in them either to refrigerate the revolutionary energy, or to turn the late events to the advantage of any faction whatever. They had accused Danton of corruption, of federalism, or Orleanism, and of royalism; it is not surprising that suspicions of the like nature should rise up against his victorious friends. Besides, no attack had been yet directed; but the numerous releases, and the general feeling against the revolutionary system, began to revive serious apprehensions.

The real authors of the 9th Thermidor, to the number of fifteen or twenty, and of whom the principal were Legendre, Fréron, Tallien, Merlin (of Thionville), Barras, Thuriot, Bourdon (of the Oise), Dubois Crancé, and Lecointre (of Versailles), were not more favourably disposed than their colleagues to royalism and to counter-revolution; but, excited by the danger and by the conflict, they were more decidedly declared against the revolutionary laws. They had, moreover, much of that tendency to leniency which had ruined their friends, Danton and Desmoulins. Surrounded, applauded, and solicited, they were hurried away more than their colleagues of the Mountain into the system of clemency. It was even probable that many of them had made some sacrifices to their novel position. To render services to distressed families, to receive testimonials of the warmest gratitude, to efface the remembrance of former severities, was a part which presented its temptations. Already those who distrusted their complaisance, as well as those who confided in it, gave them a distinctive appellation: they called them the Thermidorians.

Warm discussions frequently took place on the subject of the enlargements. Thus, for example, upon the recommendation of a deputy, who said that he knew one of them as belonging to his department, the committee ordered him to be set at liberty, immediately on this another deputy of the same department made a grievance of this release, and declared that an aristocrat had been enlarged. These wranglings, coupled with the new appearance of a multitude of well-known enemies of the revolution, who showed themselves overjoyed, provoked a measure which was adopted, without its being at first considered of any importance. It was settled that there should be printed a list of every person released by order of the committee of general safety, and that beside the name of the discharged individual, there should be inscribed the name of the person who had petitioned in his behalf, and who had made himself responsible for his principles.

This measure produced a most unpleasant sensation. Writhing under the recent oppression which they had undergone, many citizens were afraid to see their names entered into a list which might be made available for the exercise of fresh severities, should the system of terror ever be again established. Many of those who had already solicited and obtained discharges were sorry for it, and many others would not apply for more. Bitter complaints were made in the sections of this return to measures which disturbed confidence and the public rejoicing, and the revocation of such measures was earnestly called for.

On the 26th Thermidor some remarks were made in the assembly in regard to the agitation prevailing in the sections of Paris. The section of Montreuil had come to denounce its revolutionary committee. The answer returned was, that it ought to address itself to the committee of general safety. Duhem, deputy of Lille, who although totally unconcerned in the acts of the late dictatorship, was a friend of Billaud, and concurred in all his opinions, and convinced that it was not expedient that the revolutionary authority should relax its severity, declaimed violently against aristocracy and moderatism, which, as he said, already lifted their audacious heads, and imagined that the 9th Thermidor had taken place merely for their advantage. Baudot and Taillefer, who had shown a courageous opposition under the rule of Robespierre, but who were quite as staunch Mountaineers as Duhem, and Vadier, a distinguished member of the old committee of general safety, asserted also that the aristocracy was about to make a movement, and that although the government ought certainly to be just, it ought at the same time to be inflexible. Granet, deputy of Marseilles, who sat with the Mountain, made a proposition which further increased the agitation of the assembly. He insisted that the prisoners already released, if the persons who answered for them did not come forward to give their names, should be immediately re-incarcerated. This proposition excited a great tumult. Bourdon, Lecointre, and Merlin (of Thionville) opposed it with all their might. The discussion, as it almost always happens on such occasions, travelled out of the lists to the political state of the country, and each party briskly attacked the other upon the intentions they were supposed to harbour. "It is time, indeed," exclaimed Merlin (of Thionville), "that all the factions should no longer progress in the steps that led to the throne of Robespierre. Nothing should be done by halves, and it must be confessed that in the affair of the 9th Thermidor, the convention has done a great deal too much by halves. If she has left tyrants here, they ought at least to be silent." Great cheering succeeded these words of Merlin, addressed particularly to Vadier, one of those who had spoken against the movements of the sections. Legendre spoke after Merlin. "The committee," said he, "is well aware that it has been taken by surprise in the release of some aristocrats; but their number is not great, and they will soon again be imprisoned. Why accuse one another? why look upon each other as enemies, when our intentions are, bating some slight differences, the same? Let us restrain our passions, if we would ensure and accelerate the success of the Revolution. Citizens, I demand of you the repeal of the law of the 23d, which orders the printing of the lists of the citizens who have been set at liberty. That law has dispelled the public joy, and frozen all hearts." Tallien followed Legendre; he was heard with the greatest attention, as the principal of the Thermidorians. "For some days past," said he, "all good citizens have observed with pain, that some one is endeavouring to sow dissension among you, and to revive those animosities which ought to be buried in the grave of Robespierre. On entering this place a note was put into my hands, which informs me that several members were to be attacked in this sitting. No doubt it is by the enemies of the republic that such rumours gain credit; let us beware of supporting them by our dissensions." Cheers interrupted Tallien; he resumed, "Continuators of Robespierre's history," he exclaimed, "hope not for success; the convention is determined to perish, rather than endure a new tyranny. The convention wills an inflexible but a just government. It is possible that some patriots have been deceived in regard of certain prisoners; we are no believers in the infallibility of men. But only denounce those persons irregularly discharged, and they shall be again incarcerated. For my own part, I can make the sincere avowal, that I had much rather see twenty aristocrats at liberty to-day, who may again be apprehended to-morrow, than a single patriot remaining in fetters. What! can the republic, with its twelve hundred thousand armed citizens, be afraid of a few aristocrats! No; she

Tallien, although frequently interrupted by cheers, experienced thunders of applause when he concluded his speech. After these general explanations, they returned to the consideration of the law of the 23d; and to the new declaration which Granet wanted to add thereto. The partisans of the law maintained that no one ought to be afraid of declaring himself while performing a patriotic act, such as that of petitioning for a citizen unjustly detained. The opponents of the law replied, that nothing can be more dangerous than the lists; that those of the twenty thousand and of the eight thousand had been the cause of continual disturbance; that those whose names were inscribed therein had lived in dread; and that were there any further tyranny to be apprehended, the persons included in the new lists would never be at rest. At length a mutual explanation took place. Bourdon proposed to print the names of the discharged prisoners, without adding the names of those who answered for them, and solicited their liberation. His motion was favourably received, and it was settled that they should print no more than the names of the persons discharged. Tallien, who was not satisfied with this middle course, immediately reascended the tribune. "Since you have decreed," said he, "to print the list of the citizens restored to liberty, you cannot refuse to publish the list of those citizens who caused them to be imprisoned. It is but just that one should be made acquainted with those who have denounced and caused good patriots to be incarcerated." The assembly, taken by surprise by Tallien's motion, at first deemed the proposition just, and forthwith decreed it. Scarcely had the vote been made, before several members of the assembly changed their opinion. "Here is a list," said one, "which will be inconsistent with the previous one; this is civil war." This expression was soon repeated throughout the hall, and several voices exclaimed: This is civil war! "Yes," rejoined Tallien, who had again mounted the tribune, "Yes, this is civil war. I am of your opinion. Your two decrees will cause two classes of men to set their faces against each other, who never can be reconciled to each other. But it was my object in submitting to you the second decree, to make you sensible of the inconveniences of the first. Now I propose to you to repeal both of them." There was a cry from all quarters of "Yes, yes, the repeal of the two decrees!" Amar himself called for it, and the two decrees were repealed. The idea of printing any list was therefore thrown aside, owing to the clever and bold artifice Tallien had just practised upon the assembly.

This sitting restored a feeling of security to a great number of persons who began to lose it; but it proved that the passions of all were by no means allayed, and that all contests were not yet terminated. The parties had all been stricken in their turn, and had lost their most illustrious members: the royalists at several periods; the Girondists on the 31st of May; the Dantonists in Germinal; the extravagant Mountaineers on the 9th Thermidor. But if the most illustrious leaders had perished, their parties survived; for parties are not extinguished by a single blow, and those that remain bestir themselves long afterwards. These parties were now about to dispute amongst themselves alternately for the control of the revolution, and to recommence an arduous and blood-stained career. In fact, it came to this, that those minds who by the excitement of the danger had mounted to the highest degree of exasperation, should return progressively to the point from which they had started. During this reaction, power would necessarily be shifted from hand to hand, and the same conflicts of passions, systems, and authority, would again be witnessed.

After having bestowed these preliminary attentions on the ameliorating of many severities, the convention considered as to the organization of the committees and of the provisional government, which was, as we know, to rule France until the general peace. A preliminary discussion had arisen, as we have just observed, upon the committee of public welfare, and the question had been referred to a commission commissioned with the preparation of a new plan. It became a matter of pressing necessity that this should be attended to; and this was what in fact the assembly did in the early part of Fructidor (August). The convention was placed between two opposite systems and perils: the fear of damning that authority on which the salvation of the revolution depended, and the apprehension of reviving tyranny. It is a property of human nature, to fear dangers that are past, and to take precautions against what cannot occur again. The tyranny of the late committee of public welfare had proceeded from the necessity for duly performing an extraordinary task amidst obstacles of every description. A few men had offered themselves to do what an assembly knew not how to, nay, durst not perform itself; and amidst the unheard-of toils for fifteen months, they had not been able either to declare the objects of their operations, or to render an account of them to the assembly, other than in a very general manner; they had not even the time to deliberate amongst themselves, but every one applied himself, as absolute master, to the duty that had devolved upon him. They had thus become so many compulsory dictators, whom circumstances, rather than ambition, had rendered all-powerful. Now that the task was nearly achieved, and the extreme dangers were past, a similar power could no longer create itself, the occasion not requiring it. It was puerile to take such precautions against a danger which could have no existence; nay, in this prudence there existed a grave inconvenience, that of enervating authority and of divesting it of all its energy. Twelve hundred thousand men had been raised, fed, armed, and conveyed to the frontiers; but it was necessary to provide for their maintenance, for their direction, and this was again a task that required great application, extraordinary capacity, and very extensive powers.

The principle of renewal of the committees by one-fourth every month had been already decreed; and it had been moreover decided that the members going out could not obtain re-admission before the expiration of a month. These two restrictions, while they prevented a new dictatorship, also stood in the way of every beneficial mode of administration. It was impossible that there could be any continuity, any constant application, any secrecy in a ministry thus continually renewed. In this organization no sooner had a member made himself acquainted with the course of business than he was forced to leave it; and if an aptitude was manifested, like that of Carnot, for war, of Prieur (of the Côte d'Or) and Robert Lindet for administration, and of Cambon for the finances, it was lost to the state at the appointed term; for the absence of a month, required by law, rendered the advantages of the anterior re-election almost nugatory.

But a reaction necessarily took place. An extreme centralization of power was to be succeeded by a minute subdivision to the other extreme, and quite as dangerous, though perhaps in a different way. The former committee of public welfare, who took supreme cognizance in regard to what concerned the welfare of the state, had a right to summon the other committees and to make them report upon their operations; it had thus possessed itself of all that practically concerned the duties of each of them. To prevent in future such usurpations, the new organization distinguished the functions of the committees and rendered them independent of one another. Sixteen committees [or boards] were thus established:—

1. The committee of public welfare.
2. The committee of general safety.
3. The committee of finances.
4. The committee of legislation.
5. The committee of public instruction.
6. The committee of agriculture and the arts.
7. The committee of trade and provisions.
8. The committee of public works.
9. The committee of convyance by post.
10. The military committee.
11. The committee of the navy and the colonies.
12. The committee of public relief.
13. The committee of division.
14. The committee of minutes and archives.
15. The committee of petitions, correspondence, and despatches.
16. The committee of the inspectors of the national palace.

The committee of public welfare was composed of twelve members; it still retained the direction of the military and diplomatic operations; it was charged with the levy and equipment of the armies, the selection of generals, the plans of campaign, &c.; but these were the extent of its duties. The committee of general safety, composed of sixteen members, took charge of the police. The committee of the finances, composed of forty-eight members, had the superintendence of the revenue, the treasury, the mint, the assignats, &c. The committees were enabled to assemble together for the consideration of such matters as concerned them generally. Thus the absolute authority of the former committee of public welfare was divided among a number of rival authorities, subject to embarrassment and inconvenience in their progress. Such was the new organization of the government. In the mean time other reforms hardly deemed less urgent than the preceding were effected. The revolutionary committees established in the smallest boroughs, and empowered to exercise inquisition there, were the most vexatious and the most abhorred of the institutions attributed to Robespierre's party. To render their action less extensive and less annoying, their number was reduced to a single one for each district. There was, however, to be one in every commune of eight thousand souls, whether it were the chief town of a district or not. In Paris, the number was reduced from forty-eight to twelve. These committees were to be composed of twelve members, the signature of at least three members was required to a summons to appear, and the signature of seven for a warrant of arrest. Like the committees of government, they were subject to renewal by one-fourth every month. In addition to all these arrangements the convention added others not less important, by deciding that the meetings of the sections should not in future take place but once in each decade, and that on every decade, and that the citizens who attended should no longer be paid forty sous for the sitting. To render the popular assemblies less frequent, and above all to cease paying the lower classes for attending them, was confining the demagogic spirit within narrower limits. It was also cutting off an abuse which had been carried to excess in Paris. Payment was made by the section as for twelve hundred members present, although there were scarcely three hundred who actually attended. The present answered for the absent, and they alternately rendered each other this service. Thus this mechanic militia, so devoted to Robespierre, were dismissed, and sent back to their labour.

The most important measure adopted by the convention was the purification of the individuals composing all the local authorities, revolutionary committees, municipalities, &c. It was then that, as we have observed, the most fervid revolutionists were to be found, they had become in each petty locality what Robespierre, Saint Just, and Couthon had been in Paris, and they had exercised their powers with all the grossness of inferior authorities. The decree of the revolutionary government, in suspending the constitution till the peace, had prohibited elections of all kinds, in order to obviate disturbances and to centralize authority in the same hands. The convention, from absolutely similar motives, namely, to prevent conflicts between the Jacobins and the aristocrats, supported the provisions of the decree, and committed to the representatives on mission the burden of purifying the institutions throughout all France. This was the only way to assure itself of the choice and the direction of the local authorities, and to prevent mutual collisions between the two factions. Lastly, the revolutionary tribunal, recently suspended, was restored to its functions. The judges and juries were not yet all appointed: those who had already met were to enter on their office immediately, and to try agreeably to the laws existing before those of the 22d Pluvial. These laws were still very dreadful, but the persons selected to administer them, and the docility with which extraordinary jurisdictions follow the direction of that government which creates them, were considered a guarantee against fresh cruelties.

All these reforms were carried into effect between the 1st and the 15th Fructidor (the end of August). One more important institution still remained to be re-established, namely, the liberty of the press. No law at present prescribed its limits; it was even sanctioned in an unlimited manner in the declaration of rights; nevertheless, it had in point of fact been proscribed under the system of terror. A single imprudent word being at that time sufficient to compromise the lives of citizens, how could they have dared to write? The fate of the unfortunate Camille Desmoulins had clearly proved the state of the press at that period. Durrand and Mailane, an ex-constituent, and one of those timid spirits who had become mere ephemerides during the storms of the convention, desired that the liberty of the press should be formally guaranteed anew. "We have never been able," said that excellent man to his colleagues, "to make ourselves heard in this place, without being exposed to abusive language and threats. If you care for our opinion in the discussions that shall in future arise, if you are desirous that we should contribute, by our intelligence, to the common cause, you must give new securities to those who may feel disposed either to speak or to write."

Some few days afterwards, Frélon, who had been the friend and colleague of Barris in his mission to Toulon, the also intimate friend of Danton and Camille-Desmoulins, and since their death, the most vehement enemy of the committee of public welfare, Frélon added his opinion to that of Durrand and Mailane, and called for the unbounded liberty of the press. Opinions, however, were divided on this subject. Those who had lived under constraint during the late dictatorship, and who now wished to give their opinions on all subjects with freedom, as well as those who felt disposed to cause a reaction energetically against the Revolution, demanded a formal declaration to guarantee the liberty of speech and writing. The Mountaineers, who anticipated the use that was intended to be made of this liberty, who saw a torrent of recriminations in preparation against those men who had exercised any functions during the reign of terror, many others also, without entertaining any personal apprehension, appreciated the dangerous instrument with which the counter-revolutionists, already swarming from every quarter, were to be furnished, were opposed to an express declaration. They assigned as a reason, that the declaration of rights sanctioned the liberty of the press, that to sanction it anew was superfluous, since it was no more than a declaration of an already recognized right, and that to entertain an idea of rendering it unbounded, was committing a grand imprudence. "You are going, then," said Boudon (of the Oise) and Cambon, "to permit royalism to lift its head, and to print whatever it pleases against the institution of the republic." All these propositions were referred to the competent committees, to examine if it were expedient to make a new declaration upon this subject.

Thus the provisional government destined to direct the Revolution till the peace was entirely modified, agreeably to the new tendencies towards clemency and liberality which manifested themselves since the 9th Thermidor. The government committees, the revolutionary tribunal, and local administrations, were recognized and purified; the liberty of the press was declared, and every thing announced the commencement of a new career.

The effect which these reforms could not fail to produce were not long in being felt. Hitherto, the party of the fervid revolutionists were to be found in the government itself, the committees were composed of this party, and it ruled the convention, it predominated at the Jacobins, it filled the municipal institutions and the revolutionary committees with which all France was covered, now being dispossessed, it was about to find itself out of the government, and about to form a hostile party against it.

The Jacobins had been suspended on the night between the 9th and 10th Thermidor. Legendre had locked up their hall, and had the keys of it on the bureau of the convention. The keys were restored, and the society was permitted to reassemble on condition of purifying itself. Fifteen of the oldest members were chosen to investigate the conduct of all the clubists during the night between the 9th and 10th. They were to admit such only as on that memorable night had been at their posts as citizens, instead of repairing to the commune to conspire against the convention. While this purification was going on, the old members were admitted into the hall as provisional members. The purification commenced. An inquiry concerning each of them would have been difficult, they contented themselves with administering interrogatories to them, and they were tried by their answers. It is easy to conceive that such a scrutiny must have been made with great lenity, since it was the Jacobins sitting in judgment on themselves. In a few days, more than six hundred members were reinstalled, upon their simple declaration, that during that memorable night they had been at the post assigned to them by their duties. The society was soon recomposed on its previous footing, and was filled by all those individuals who, as having formerly been devoted to Robespierre, Saint Just, and Couthon, grieved for them as martyrs of liberty and as victims of the counter-revolution. In conjunction with the parent society, there still existed that notorious electoral club, to which those retired who had to make motions that could not be entertained at the Jacobins, and where all the great events of the revolution were planned. It sat daily at the Evêché, and was composed of old Cordeliers, the most determined Jacobins, and men most compromised during the reign of terror. The Jacobins and this club naturally became the asylum of those agents whom the new purification was about to drive from their posts and thus did not fail to come to pass. The judges and juriers of the revolutionary tribunal, the members of the forty-eight revolutionary committees of Paris, amounting to about four hundred, the agents of the secret police of Saint Just and Robespierre, the messengers (porteurs d'ordre) of the committees, who formed the hind of the notorious Heron, the clerks of the different administrations, in short, agents of every description, now excluded from their offices, joined the Jacobins and the electoral club, either as being already members of them, or as upon a new introduction. There it was that they vented their complaints and their resentment. They were alarmed for their safety, and decided the vengeance of those whom they had persecuted, they regretted, moreover, those lucrative offices which they had lost, and especially those who, as being members of the revolutionary committees, had been able to add pecuniations of every description to their official income. The association of such men composed a violent and an obstinate party, to whose natural impetuosity of opinion was now added the irritation of injured interest. What was passing in Paris was occurring throughout all France. The members of the municipalities, of the revolutionary committees, and of the directories of districts, held their assemblies in the societies in correspondence with the parent society, and there vented in common their apprehensions and their animosities. They had on their side the low populace, also divested of its employment, inasmuch as they were no longer paid forty sous for attending the meetings of the sections.

Out of hatred to this party, and for the purpose of opposing it, another was formed, which in fact was no other than a revival. It comprehended all those who had suffered or kept silence during the rule of terror, and who thought that the moment had arrived for rousing themselves and for directing in their turn the progress of the revolution. We have seen, while we were upon the subject of the discharges, that the relatives of the prisoners or of the victims again made their appearance in the sections, and there bestowed themselves either to cause the prisons to be thrown open, or to denounce and punish the revolutionary committees. The new progress of the convention, those reforms already begun, increased the hopes and the courage of these first opponents. They belonged to all those classes that had been sufferers, whatever were their rank, but particularly to the trading classes, to the bourgeoisie, to that industrious, opulent, and moderate tiers-état, which, as having been monarchic and constitutional with the constituents, and republican with the Girondists, were absolutely lost sight of since the 31st of May, and had been exposed to persecutions of every description. In its ranks were concealed the now very rare relics of a nobility, who dared not as yet complain of their abasement, but which complained of the rights of humanity violated in their order, and also some partisans of royalty, creatures or agents of the old court, who had not ceased to raise obstacles to the revolution, by throwing themselves among all the rising oppositions, whatever might be their system and character. It was, as usual, the young men of these different classes who declared themselves with the greatest warmth and energy, for youth is always the first to rise against an oppressive sway. They filled the sections, the Palais Royal, and all places of public resort, and expressed their opinion against whom they termed the Terrorists in the most energetic manner. They professed the noblest motives of action. Some of them had seen their families persecuted, others were afraid lest they should some day see their own persecuted, if the reign of terror were reestablished, and they swore to oppose it with all their might. But the secret of the opposition of many of them lay in the military requisition, some had escaped it by concealing themselves; others had left the armies on hearing of the 9th Thermidor, to these were to be added the writers, who had been latterly persecuted, and were always as ready as the young to join in any opposition, they were already filling newspapers and pamphlets with violent diatribes against the system of terror.

The two parties declared themselves in the warmest and most hostile manner, upon the modifications applied by the convention to the revolutionary system. The Jacobins and the Clubbists cried out against the aristocracy. They complained of the committee of general safety, which discharged the counter-revolutionists, and of the press, of which a cruel use was already made against those who had saved France. The measure which wounded them most was the general purification of all the authorities. They did not venture precisely to find fault with the renewal of the individuals, for that would have been to avow motives of too personal description, but they inveighed against the mode of re-election. They asserted, that the right of the people to choose their magistrates should be restored, that the appointment of the members of the municipalities, of the districts, of the revolutionary committees, by the deputies on mission, was an undue arrogation of power, that to reduce the sections to one sitting the decade, was in fact to violate the right of the citizens to assemble for the purpose of deliberating on public affairs. These complaints were inconsistent with the principle of the revolutionary government, which forbade any elections till the peace, but parties do not care much about inconsistencies when their interest is at stake, the revolutionists knew that a popular election would have brought them back to their posts.

The tradesmen in the sections, the young men at the Palais Royal and in places of public resort, and the writers in the newspapers, loudly demanded the unlimited freedom of the press, made complaints that they still observed, in the existing committees, and in the administration, too many agents of the late dictatorship; they already ventured to present petitions against the representatives who had fulfilled certain missions; they vilified all the services which had been rendered, and began to abuse the convention itself. Tallien, who, in his quality of principal Thermidorian, considered himself as peculiarly responsible for the new impression that had been given to affairs, would have wished that the turn things had taken were steady, without wavering in one sense or the other. In a speech full of subtle distinctions between the rule of terror and the revolutionary government, from which it was to be collected, that without resorting to systematic cruelty, it was, nevertheless, necessary to retain sufficient energy, Tallien proposed to declare, that the revolutionary government was confirmed, that, consequently, the primary assemblies ought not to be convoked for the purpose of new elections; he also proposed to declare, that all the means of terror were prescribed, and that proceedings directed against such writers as had freely expressed their opinions should be considered as means of terror.

These propositions, which presented no precise measure, and which were merely a confession of faith of the Thermidorians who wanted to place themselves between the two parties without favouring either, were referred to the three committees of public welfare, general safety, and legislation, to which every thing that related to those questions was referred.

These means, however, had not for their object the tranquilizing of party feeling. They continued to utter invectives against one another with the same violence, and what peculiarly contributed to increase the general uneasiness, and to multiply the subjects of complaint and accusation, was the financial situation of France, which was more deplorable perhaps than it had ever yet been at the most calamitous epochs of the Revolution.

Notwithstanding the victories of the republic, the assignats had experienced a rapid fall, and in trade did not count at more than a sixth or an eighth of their nominal value, it was this that produced a frightful confusion in every description of exchange, and rendered the maximum more impracticable and more vexatious than ever. It evidently was no longer the want of confidence that depreciated the assignats, for no one could now entertain any fear for the existence of the republic, but it was their excessive regularity in increasing issue in exact proportion to their fall. The taxes, collected with difficulty, and paid in paper, furnished scarcely a fourth or a fifth of what the republic required monthly for the extraordinary expenses of the war, which the government was obliged to supply by fresh issues. So, since the preceding year, the quantity of assignats in circulation, which it had hoped to reduce by the means of various combinations to the extent of two thousand millions, had, on the contrary, risen to four thousand six hundred millions.

To this excessive accumulation of paper money, and the depreciation which ensued thereon, were added all the calamities resulting either from the war, or from the unheard of measures which it had called into operation. It will be recollected, that in order to establish a forced relation between the nominal value of the assignats and merchandize, the public had desired the law of the maximum, which regulated the prices of all commodities, and did not allow the dealers to raise them in direct proportion to the depreciation of the paper, it will also be recollected, that to these measures had been added the system of requisitions, which gave to the representatives or to the agents of the administration power to forcibly purvey all the commodities necessary for the armies and the great communes, paying for them in assignats at the rate fixed by the maximum. These measures had certainly saved France, but they had also introduced extraordinary derangement into commercial relations and the current circulation.

We have already seen what were the principal inconveniences of the maximum, the establishment of two markets, the one public, in which the dealers exposed only their inferior goods and in the least possible quantity, the other clandestine, in which they sold all their best commodities for money and at an unrestricted price, a general hoarding of produce, which the farmers contrived to withdraw from the utmost vigilance that could be exerted by the agents authorized to make the requisitions, lastly, derangement and stagnation in manufactures, because the makers could not receive back, by the price at which their manufactures were assessed, the bare prime cost. All these inconveniences of a twofold system of trade, the hoarding of articles of ordinary consumption, and the check upon manufactures, had kept constantly increasing. There were in every place two systems of commerce established, the one public and insufficient, the other secret and usurious. There were two qualities of bread, two qualities of meat, two qualities of every thing, one for the rich, who could pay in money, or exceed the maximum; the other for the poor man, the mechanic and the pensioner, who could not pay more than the nominal value of the assignat. The farmers became every day more astute in withdrawing their produce; they made false declarations; they did not thresh their corn, and pretended that hands were scarce,—a want that was really felt, for the war had absorbed more than fifteen hundred thousand men; they excused themselves upon the score of the bad weather, which in point of fact had not turned out so favorable as had been expected in the early part of the year, when at the fiute of the Supreme Being, thanks had been offered up to heaven for the victories of the republic and the abundance of the crops. As for the manufacturers, they had entirely stopped work. We have seen, that in the preceding year, the law, in order that it should not press hard upon the shopkeepers, had been obliged to recur to the original manufacturers, and to fix the prices of goods at the very place of manufacture, with the mere addition of the cost of carriage; but this law in its turn had become harsh in its operations. The raw material and workmanship having, like every thing else, universally risen in price, the manufacturers could no longer secure the return of the prime cost, and had stopped work. It was the same with the merchants. The freight of India goods, for example, had risen from 150 to 400 francs per ton; insurances from 5 and 6 per cent, to 50 and 60. The great merchants could no longer dispose of produce when imported at the price fixed by the maximum, and they also declined to export. As we have elsewhere remarked, in forcing one price, all must have been forced; but that was impossible.

Time had disclosed other inconveniences peculiar to the maximum. The price of corn had been fixed in an uniform manner throughout all France. But as the production of corn varied both in respect of its cost and its abundance in various provinces, the legal rate did not regard the relative value in each locality. The power left to the municipalities to fix the prices of all commodities, brought about another kind of confusion. When commodities were scarce in one commune, the authorities raised their price; goods were then brought thither to the prejudice of the neighbouring communes; so that there was sometimes a glut in one place and scarcity in another, just as the regulators of the tariff pleased; and the operations of commerce, instead of being regular and natural, were capricious, unequal, and convulsive.

The results of the forced requisitions were still more mischievous. Requisitions were resorted to for serving the armies with provisions, for furnishing the great manufactories of arms and the arsenals with what they needed, for provisioning the great communes, and sometimes for supplying manufacturers with such materials as they required. It was the representatives, the commissioners with the armies, and the agents of the commission of trade and provisions, who were empowered to make forced requisitions. In the pressing moment of danger, requisitions were made with hurry and confusion. It frequently occurred that they crossed one another in their subject of forced purveyance, and that the party served with the requisition, knew not whom he was to furnish. The requisitions were almost always unlimited.

Sometimes the whole of a commodity in a commune or a department was laid under requisition. Then the farmers or the dealers could no longer sell, except to the agents of the republic. Trade became interrupted, the subject of the requisition lay for a long time without being taken away or paid for, and its facility of disposal was stopped. In the confusion resulting from the emergency, the distances were not taken into consideration, and that department which might be the most remote from the commune or the army which it was meant to supply, was laid under requisition; it was in this that the means of transit had extraordinarily increased. Many rivers and canals were deprived of water by an extraordinary drought. Wheel-carriage was all that was left, and agriculture was deprived of its horses to draw the wains. This extraordinary demand, coupled with a forced levy of forty-four thousand horses for the army, had made them very scarce, and almost exhausted the means of carriage. In consequence of these ill calculated and frequently useless movements, enormous quantities of articles of subsistence or other commodities were accumulated in the public magazines, heaped together without care, and exposed to all sorts of peculation. The cattle obtained by the republic were badly fed; they arrived in a lean state at the slaughter houses, and hence arose a scarcity of fatty substances, suet, tallow, &c. To insufficient means of transit were therefore added waste, and frequently the most mischievous frauds. Corrupt factors secretly sold at the highest rate commodities which they had obtained at the maximum by means of requisitions. This fraud was also practised by dealers and manufacturers, who having solicited an order of requisition for the purpose of supplying themselves, subsequently sold at the current price what they had obtained at the maximum.

These different causes, coupled with the effects of the continental and maritime war, had reduced commerce to a deplorable state. There was no longer any communication with the colonies, which were rendered nearly inaccessible by the English cruisers, and almost all of them ravaged by war. The principal of our colonies, Saint-Domingo, was subjected to fire and sword by the different parties who disputed its possession. This combination of circumstances already rendered external communications almost impracticable. Another revolutionary measure had also lent its aid in bringing about this state of isolation; this was the sequestration directed against the property of foreigners with whose nation France was at war. The reader will call to mind that the convention, in ordering this sequestration, had intended to put a stop to the jobbing in foreign paper, and to prevent capitalists from slunning the assignats and investing their capital on bills of exchange on Frankfort, Amsterdam, London, and other places. The seizure of the securities that the Spaniards, German, Dutch, and English, held against France, had provoked a similar measure on the part of the European powers, and all circulation of negotiable securities between France and Europe had ceased. There no longer existed any relations with the neutral countries, the Levant, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, and the United States; but the commission of trade and provisions had availed itself of them, for the purpose of procuring corn, iron, and various articles necessary for the navy. For this purpose the commission had put all the paper under requisition, and had given the French bankers the amount in assignats, and made use of it in Switzerland, Sweden, Denmark, and America, to pay for the corn and the other commodities which it purchased.

The entire trade of France was therefore confined to the supplies which the government obtained in foreign countries by means of the securities forcibly taken by the requisition from the French bankers. Scarcely any commodities brought by free trade reached the French ports; and when they did, they were immediately laid under requisition, which, as we have just shown, utterly discouraged the merchants, who had paid enormously for freight and insurance, and were obliged to sell at the maximum. The only commodities that were at all plentiful in the ports were those derivable from prizes from the enemy. But some were withdrawn from circulation by requisitions, others by the prohibitions issued against the produce of hostile nations. Nantes and Bordeaux, already ravaged by civil war, were reduced by this falling off of trade to absolute stagnation and to extreme distress. Marseilles, which formerly subsisted by its intercourse with the Levant, saw its port blockaded by the English, its principal merchants dispersed by the system of terror, its soap-manufacture destroyed or transferred to Italy; so that all its trade now consisted in a few disadvantageous exchanges with the Genoese. The towns in the interior were not in a less deplorable state. Nîmes had ceased to furnish her silks, which she formerly exported to the amount of twenty millions. The opulent city of Lyons, demolished by bombs and mining explosions, now lay in ruins, and no longer manufactured those rich tissue-stuffs with which it formerly supplied commerce to the amount of more than sixty millions. A decree, which had intercepted the goods intended for the rebel communes, had detained a considerable quantity in the neighbourhood of Lyons, of which one portion must necessarily have remained in that city, and the other have passed through it on its way to the numerous points to which the southern road leads. The towns of Châlons, Mâcon, and Valence, had availed themselves of this decree to intercept the goods travelling along that much frequented road. The manufacture of Sedan had been obliged to temporarily abandon the manufacture of fine cloths, so as to be solely occupied in the manufacture of cloth for the troops; and the principal manufacturers were moreover prosecuted as accomplices of the movement planned by Lafayette after the 10th of August. The departments of the North, the Pas-de-Calais, the Somme, and the Aisne, deriving their opulence from the cultivation of flax and hemp, had been entirely ravaged by the war. Towards the west, in the unfortunate La Vendée, more than six hundred square leagues had been wholly laid waste by fire and sword. The lands were partly forsaken, and numbers of cattle roved about at random, without pasture, and without shelter. Lastly, wherever particular misfortune had not aggravated the general calamities, the war had exceedingly thinned the number of hands, and terror with some and a political bias in regard to others, had either withdrawn from, or rendered a considerable number of laborious citizens disgusted with labour. Many indeed preferred the clubs, the municipal councils, the sections, where they received forty sous for making a stir and exciting themselves, instead of attending to their workshops and fields.

Hence arose confusion in the markets; scarcity of the necessaries of life; interruption in manufactures as the effect of the maximum; injudicious removals, useless accumulations, and waste of commodities; exhaustion of the means of conveyance, owing to the requisitions; interruption of communication with all the neighbouring nations, in consequence of the war; maritime blockade, and the sequestration of foreigners' effects; devastation of manufacturing towns and of several agricultural districts by civil war; want of hands, occasioned by the requisition; idleness induced by the predilection contracted for political life:—such is the picture presented by France, saved from the sword of the foreign enemy, but exhausted for a moment by the unprecedented efforts that had been required of her.

Let the reader figure to himself two parties fighting with each other after the 9th Thermidor, whereof one was attaching itself to revolutionary means, as indispensable, and as desirous of prolonging for an indefinite period a state of things purely transitory; and the other irritated at the inevitable evils of an extraordinary organization, forgetting the services rendered by that organization, and desiring its abolition as being atrocious; let him figure to himself two parties of this nature contending with each other, and he will readily conceive how many subjects of reciprocal accusation they would find in the state of France. The Jacobins complained of the relaxation of the laws, of the violation of the maximum by the farmers, the shopkeepers, and the rich traders, of the inefficient execution of the laws against stockjobbing, and of the depreciation of the assignats; they consequently renewed the outcry of the Hébertists against the rich, the monopolizers, and the stockjobbers. Their adversaries, on the contrary, venturing for the first time to attack the revolutionary measures, raised an outcry against the excessive issue of the assignats, against the iniquities of the maximum, against the tyranny of the requisitions, against the calamities inflicted upon Lyons, Sedan, Nantes, and Bourdeaux, and lastly, against the prohibitions and impediments of every description which paralyzed and ruined commerce. These were, together with the liberty of the press and the mode of nomination of the public functionaries, the usual topics of the petitions of the clubs or of the sections. All remonstrances in respect thereof were referred to the committees of public welfare, of finances, and of commerce, in order to report thereupon and impart their views.

Two parties were thus arrayed against each other, seeking and finding in what had been done, and in what was yet doing, continual subjects of attack and recrimination. All that had taken place, were it good or evil, was imputed to the members of the old committees, who were made the butt of every attack by the authors of the reaction. Although they had contributed to overthrow Robespierre, it was alleged that they had quar-

telled to satisfy their own ambition, and for a share in the system of tyranny, but that at bottom they were of the same opinions, that they possessed the same principles, and meant to continue the same system for their own advantage. Among the Thermidorians was Leconte (of Versailles), a man of violent and indiscreet habits, who expressed himself with an impudence by no means approved of by his colleagues. He had formed the design of denouncing Billaud-Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, and Billaud, members of the old committee of public welfare, as also David, Vadier, Amar, and Vauland, of the committee of general safety, as accomplices and continuators of Robespierre's system. He could not, and durst not, prefix the same charge against Carnot, Prieur (of the Côte d'Or), and Robert Lindet, whom public opinion entirely distinguished from their colleagues, and who had the reputation of being exclusively occupied in those matters to which the salvation of France had been attributed. He did not venture to attack further than the members of the committee of general safety, because they were not all alike condemned by public opinion. He communicated his design to Tallien and Legendre, who endeavoured to dissuade him from it. He nevertheless persisted in its execution, and at the sitting of the 12th Fructidor (August 29th), he presented twenty six articles of accusation against the members of the former committees. These twenty six articles were, in point of fact, nothing more than vague imputations of their having been accomplices in the system of terror with which Robespierre had oppressed the convention and France, of having contributed to the arbitrary acts of the two committees, of having signed the orders of proscription, of having turned a deaf ear to all the remonstrances of citizens unjustly prosecuted, of having greatly contributed to the death of Danton, of having defended the law of the 22nd Prairial, of having knowingly permitted the convention to remain in ignorance that this law was not the work of the committee, of not having denounced Robespierre when he seceded from the committee of public welfare, lastly, of not having done anything on the 8th, 9th, and 10th Thermidor, to protect the convention from the designs of the conspirators.

As soon as Leconte had finished reading these twenty six articles, Goujon, deputy of the Ain, a young, sincere, and fervent republican, and also a disinterested Mountainee, for he had taken no part in those acts for which the late government was reproached, Goujon rose and addressed the assembly with every demonstration of intense mortification. "I am deeply afflicted," said he, "when I see how coolly and gingerly folks come hither to sow the seeds of dissension, and to propose the ruin of the country. Sometimes they come to solicit you to brand, by the appellation of the system of terror, all that has been done for a year past, at others they propose that you should accuse men who have rendered great services to the revolution. They may be guilty, for aught I know. I was with the armies, and therefore can give no opinion, but if I had possessed documents criminating members of the convention, I would not have produced them or have brought them here without great pain. But, on the contrary, pray observe how very coolly some can plunge the dagger into the bosom of men valuable to the country for their important services! Observe, also, that the charges preferred are directed also against the convention itself. Yes, it is the convention that is accused. It is the French people who are brought to trial, since both submitted to the tyranny of the infamous Robespierre. J. Debry told you just now that it is the aristocrats who bring forward or suggest all these propositions."—"And the robbers," added some voices—"I move," resumed Goujon, "that the discussion instantly cease." Many deputies opposed this motion. Billaud Varennes dated forward to the tribune, and urgently solicited that the discussion should be continued. "Most assuredly," said he, "if the facts alleged be proved, we are great culprits, and our heads ought to fall. But we defy Leconte to prove them. Ever since the fall of the tyrant, we are made the butt of every maligner, and we declare that life is of no value to us, if they are to carry every thing their own way." Billaud proceeded, and stated that he and his colleagues had for a long time contemplated the 9th Thermidor, that, if they defied it, it was because circumstances compelled them so to do, that they had been the first to denounce Robespierre, and to tear from him the mask with which he concealed himself, that, if they made the death of Danton a crime, he would charge himself first and foremost with the guilt of it, that Danton was an accomplice of Robespierre's, that he was the rallying point of all the counter-revolutionists, and, if he had lived, liberty would have been undone. "For some time past," exclaimed Billaud, "we have seen intriguers bestirring themselves, robbers." "The word is uttered," cried Boudon, interrupting him, "it must be proved."—"I undertake to prove it for one," said Duhem. "We will prove it for others," added several voices of the Mountain. This was the charge which the Mountainees were always ready to prefix against the friends of Danton, almost all of whom had become Thermidorians. Billaud, who, amidst this tumult and these interruptions had not quitted the tribune, demanded the institution of proceedings, that the guilty might be known. Cambon succeeded him, and said that the snare laid for the convention should be avoided, that the aristocrats wanted to force her to dishonour herself by bringing some of her members into disrepute, that if the committees were guilty, she was also guilty, "and the whole nation along with her," added Boudon (of the Oise). Amidst this tumult, Vadier appeared in the tribune with a pistol in his hand, saying that he would not survive the calumny, if they did not allow him to exculpate himself. Several members surrounded him, and obliged him to descend. Thuriot, the president, declared that he would break up the sitting if the tumult did not abate. Duhem and Amar desired the discussion to be continued, as a duty they owed to the inculpated members. Thuriot, one of the warmest Thermidorians, but who for all that was a zealous Mountainee, saw with concern that such questions were agitated. He addressed the assembly from his chair, and said, "On one hand the public interest requires that such a discussion as this should instantly cease, on the other, the interest of the inculpated persons requires that it should continue. let us reconcile both one and the other by passing to the order of the day on Lecointre's proposition, and declaring that the assembly has received this proposal with the deepest indignation." The assembly eagerly adopted the suggestion of Thuriot, and passed to the order of the day, by thus condemning Lecointre's motion.

All those who were sincerely attached to their country had witnessed this discussion with the deepest concern. How, in fact, was it possible to revert to the past, to distinguish the evil from the good, and to discern to whom was to be imputed the tyranny they had undergone? How ascertain the part of Robespierre and of the committees who had divided between themselves the supreme power, that of the convention who had patiently endured them, and lastly, that of the nation, who had tolerated alike the convention, and the committees, and Robespierre? Besides all this, how was that tyranny to be tried? Was it a crime of ambition, or the energetic and unreflecting action of men desirous of saving their cause at any price, and hoodwinking themselves as to the means they adopted? How distinguish, in this confused action, the exact proportion of cruelty, ambition, mistaken zeal, and sincere and energetic patriotism? To distinguish between so many obscurities, to judge the innermost thoughts of so many men, was impossible. It was necessary to forget the past, to receive from the hands of those who had just been excluded from power, France as saved, to regulate disorderly movements, to soften too cruel laws, and to consider that in politics it is far better to repair evils than to avenge them.

Such were the sentiments of discreet men. The enemies of the revolution manifested the highest satisfaction in the course Lecointre had taken; and on perceiving that the discussion was closed, they gave out that the convention was afraid, and had not dared to grapple with questions too perilous for her consideration. On the contrary, the Jacobins and the Mountaineers, still fully possessed with their fanaticism, and in no wise disposed to disavow the system of terror, did not shrink from the discussion, and were enraged at its termination. The next day, the 13th Fructidor (30th August), a great number of the Mountaineers got up, saying that the president had on the preceding day taken the assembly by surprise in inducing it to close the discussion; that he had expressed his sentiments without quitting the chair; that as president he had no opinion to give; that the closing of the discussion was an injustice; that it was a duty owing to the inculpated members, to the convention itself, and to the revolution, to freely enter into a discussion which the patriots had no reason to dread. To no purpose did the Thermidorians, Legendre, Tallien, and others, who were accused of having prompted Lecointre, move that the discussion should be stopped. The assembly, who had not lost the habit of paying deference and giving way to the Mountain, consented to annul its vote of the preceding day and opened the lists. Lecointre was called to the tribune to read his twenty-six articles, and to support them by documentary evidence.

Lecointre had not been able to collect the documents in support of this singular procedure, for it would have been necessary to procure evidence of what had passed in the privacy of the committees, so as to enable any one to judge in how great a degree the accused members had participated in what was called the tyranny of Robespierre. On each article Lecointre could only appeal to public notoriety, such speeches delivered at the Jacobins or in the assembly, or the originals of some orders of arrest, which of themselves proved nothing. At every new grievance alleged, the furious Mountaineers cried, The documents! the documents! and they would not let him speak without producing written proofs. Lecointre, in most cases being utterly incapable of furnishing any, appealed to the recollection of the assembly, asking if it had not always deemed Billaud, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrere, to have acted in perfect unison with Robespierre. But this proof, the only possible one, showed the absurdity of such a mode of trial. With such proofs it would have been demonstrated that the convention was an accomplice of the committee, and France of the convention. The Mountaineers would not suffer Lecointre to finish. "Thou art a calumniator," said they, and they compelled him to proceed to another alleged grievance. Scarcely had he read the next before they again roared out, The documents! the documents! and as Lecointre had none to produce, they went on shouting, Go on with the next! In this manner he went on to the twenty-sixth article, without being able to prove what he advanced. He had but one reason to urge, namely, that the trial was a political one, and did not admit of the ordinary form of discussion, to which it might fairly have been replied, that it was highly impolitic to institute such an investigation. After a long and stormy sitting, the convention declared his accusation scandalous and vexatious, and thus restored the former committees to public estimation. This scene had imparted to the Mountain all its previous energy, and to the convention some of its former deference for the Mountain. Billaud-Varannes, and Collot-d'Herbois, however, gave in their resignations as members of the committee of public welfare. Barrere went out by way of rotation. Tallien, on his part, voluntarily resigned; and the four were succeeded by Delmas, Merlin, (of Douai), Cochin, and Fourcroy. Thus all that were left of the old members of the great committee of public welfare were Carnot, Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or), and Robert Lindet. At the committee of general safety, the operation of renewal by a fourth part also took place. Elie Lacoste, Vouland, Vadier, and Moses Bayle went out. They were deficient in their full number, as David, Jagot, and Lavicomterie, had been previously excluded by a decision of the assembly; these seven members were succeeded by Bourdon (of the Oise), Colombelle, Meaulle, Clauzel, Mathieu, Mon-Maynu, and Lesage Senault.

An unforeseen and purely accidental event increased the agitation which prevailed. The powder mills of Grenelle took fire and blew up. This sudden and frightful explosion filled Paris with consternation, and it was believed to be the effect of a new conspiracy. The aristocrats were immediately accused, and the aristocrats in their turn accused the Jacobins. New attacks took place in the tribune between the two parties, without bringing any thing to light. To this event succeeded another. In the evening of the 23rd Fructidor (September the 9th), Tallien was returning home when a man wrapped up in a great coat rushed upon him, saying, "I was waiting for thee—thou shalt not escape me." At the same moment, being close to him, fired a pistol and wounded him in the shoulder. Next day there was a fresh uproar in Paris; it was said that people could no longer hope for quiet; that two parties, inveterately hostile to each other, had sworn perpetually to disturb the republic. Some attributed the attempt on the life of Tallien to the Jacobins, others to the aristocrats, while others again went so far as to say that Tallien, imitating the example of Grange-Neuve before the 10th of August, had procured himself to be wounded in the shoulder to furnish matter of accusation against the Jacobins, and thus have an opportunity of calling for their dissolution. Legendre, Merlin (of Thionville), and other friends of Tallien rushed with vehemence to the tribune, and maintained that the crime of the preceding night was the work of the Jacobins. "Tallien," said they, "has not deserted the cause of the revolution; nevertheless some madmen allege that he has gone over to the moderatists and the aristocrats. It cannot therefore be the latter who could have been possessed with the idea of assassinating him, it can be none else than those madmen who accuse him, that is to say the Jacobins. Merlin denounced their last sitting, and repeated this expression of Duhem: "The toads of the fen (marais) are raising their head; so much the better, it will be the easier to cut off." Merlin, with his accustomed boldness, called for the dissolution of that celebrated club, who had rendered, he said, the greatest services, who had powerfully contributed to overturn the throne, but who, no longer having any throne to overturn, now wanted to overturn the convention itself. Merlin's conclusions were not acquiesced in, but as usual, the facts were referred to the competent committees for them to report upon. References of this kind had already been made upon all those questions which divided the two parties. Reports had been called for upon the question of the press, upon the assignats, upon the maximum, upon the requisitions, upon commercial restrictions, and in short, upon every thing that had become a subject of controversy and division. It was then desired that all these reports should be consolidated, and the committee of public welfare was directed to present a general report on the present state of the republic. The preparation of this report was committed to Robert Lindet, the member that possessed the greatest intelligence in respect of the actual state of things, because he belonged to the old committees, and was the most disinterested in those questions, because he had been exclusively engaged in serving his country by undertaking the laborious department of supplies and conveyance. The day for hearing this report read was appointed for the fourth sans-culottide * of the year II. (20th of Sept. 1794.)

This report and the decrees which were to be grounded thereupon were impatiently looked for, and considerable agitation prevailed during this interval. It was at the garden of the Palais Royal that the young men of Paris in league against the Jacobins were accustomed to meet. There it was that they read the newspapers and pamphlets that appeared in great number against the late revolutionary system, sold by the booksellers in the galleries. They frequently formed themselves in small companies there, and from thence they went to disturb the sitting of the Jacobins. On the second sans-culottide, one of these small companies had formed; it was composed of those young men who, to distinguish themselves from the Jacobins, dressed well, wore high cravats, and were on that account called Muscadins †. It was in one of these groups that a party present said that if any thing happened, they ought to meet together at the convention, and that the Jacobins were intriguers and villains. A Jacobin would have replied. A quarrel ensued; one party shouted, The convention for ever! Down with the Jacobins! Down with Robespierre's tail! the other party cried, Down with the aristocrats and the Muscadins! The convention and the Jacobins for ever! The tumult soon increased. The Jacobin who had spoken, and the small number of those who supported him, were severely handled; the guard hastened to the spot, dispersed the assemblage, which was already very considerable, and prevented a general engagement.

On the next day but one, being that fixed for the presentation of the report of the three committees of public welfare, legislation, and general safety, Robert Lindet was at length heard. He had to draw a sad description of France. Having traced the successive career of the factions and the progress of Robespierre's power to his fall, he demonstrated the existence of two parties, the one composed of ardent patriots, who had their fears for the revolution and for themselves; and the other of weeping families, whose relations had been sacrificed or were still suffering in prison. "Perturbed spirits," said Lindet, "imagine that the government is likely to be deficient in energy; they employ all possible means to propagate their opinion and their apprehensions. They send deputations and addresses to the convention. These fears are chimerical. In your hands the government will retain all its strength. Can the patriots, can the public functionaries ever suppose that the services that they have rendered can be effaced from memory? What courage must they not have demonstrated in accepting and discharging perilous duties! But now France recalls them to their occupations and their professions, which they have too long forsaken. They know that their functions were temporary; that power retained too long by the same hands becomes a subject of uneasiness; and they ought not to be afraid that France will ever abandon them to resentment and malice."

Lindet next proceeded to consider the situation of the party of those who had suffered, continued by saying, "Restore those to their liberty whom hatred, malice, and the misdirection of public functionaries, and the fury of the late conspirators, have caused to be thrown en masse into the lock-up, houses; at once discharge from custody the labourers, the mercantile men, the relatives of the young heroes who are defending the country. The arts have been persecuted; yet it is by them that you have been taught to forge the thunderbolt; it is by them that the art of the Mongolfiers has served to discover the truth of the omens, it is by them that metals are prepared and purified, that hides are tanned and rendered fit for use in a week. Protect them, and relieve them. Many serviceable men are still inmates of prisons."

Robert Lindet then drew a picture of the agricultural and commercial state of France. He demonstrated the calamities resulting from the assignments, the maximum, the requisitions, the interruption of the communications with foreign countries. "Labour," said he, "has lost much of its activity, in the first place, because fifteen hundred thousand men have been sent off to the frontiers, while a multitude of others have devoted themselves to civil war, and in the next place, because the minds of men distracted by political passions, have been diverted from their habitual occupations. There are new funds brought into cultivation, but many also are neglected. The corn is not thrashed, the wool is not spun, the grower neither steep, then, flax, or peat and beat their hemp. Let us endeavour to repair evils so numerous and so diversified. Let us restore peace to the great maritime and manufacturing cities. Put an end to the demolition of Lyons. With peace, discretion, and oblation of what is past, the Nantes, the Bordeaux, the Marseilles and the Lyonsese will resume their occupations. Let us repeal the laws so inimical to commerce, let us restore to merchandise its course of traffic, let us permit exportation, that we may be able to import what we want. Let the towns and the departments cease to complain of the government, who they say has exhausted their resources in articles of subsistence, who has not observed equitable arrangements, but has imposed the burden of requisitions in an unequal manner. O that those who thus complain could cast their eyes on the vivid relations, the declarations and the addresses of their fellow citizens of other districts. They would there see the same complaints, the same remonstrances, the same energy inspired by the feeling of the same wants. Let us recall peace of mind and labour to the country, let us bring back the artisans to their work shops, the agriculturists to their fields. But above all, added Lindet, let us strive to bring back union and confidence among us. Let us cease to reproach one another with our calamities and our faults. Have we always been, could we always be, what in fact we wished to be? We have all strided in the same career, some have fought with courage and with judgment, others have dashed themselves, in their boiling ardour, against those very obstacles they purposed to destroy and overthrow. Who would think of questioning us, and calling us to account for those movements it is impossible to foresee and to direct? The revolution is accomplished! It is the work of all! Show me the generals, the soldiers, that have barely done no more in war than what they ought to have done, and have known how to stop at that point where cool and calm reason would have suggested that they should stop! Were we not in a state of war with numerous and most dreadful enemies? Have not some reverses inflamed our courage and roused our indignation? What has happened to us is nothing else but what happens to all men thrown to an infinite distance out of the ordinary course of life."

This report, so judicious, so impartial, and so perfect, was received with applause. Every one approved of the sentiments which it contained and it had been much to be desired that all had been capable of sharing them. Lindet then proposed a series of decrees, which were not less favourably received than his report, and immediately adopted.

By the first decree, the committee of general safety and the representatives on mission were empowered to examine the petitions of traders, labourers, artists, fathers and mothers of citizens then in the armies, who were either themselves or had relatives in prison. By a second decree, the municipalities and the committees of sections were bound to declare the grounds of their refusal, when they withheld certificates of civism. This was an act of justice rendered to those who were necessarily complaining of the system of terror, and deciding its revival. A third decree directed the preparation of a moral instruction, tending to excite a love of industry and the laws, to enlighten the citizens with respect to the principal events of the revolution, and appointed to be read to the people on the fetes of the decrees. A fourth decree ordered the plan of a normal school for training young professors, with a view to the diffusion of education and knowledge throughout France.

To these decrees were added several others, enjoining the committees of finances and of commerce with the least possible delay to investigate,—

1 The advantages of the free exportation of articles of luxury, on condition of causing the importation into France of the same amount in merchandise of every description.

2 The advantages or disadvantages of the free exportation of the surplus necessaries of life, upon the condition of a return and of various formalities.

3 The most advantageous means of throwing into commerce the commodities appropriated from communes in rebellion, and returned under the government seal.

4 Lastly, the claims of the merchants who, by virtue of the law of sequestration, were obliged to deposit in the district chests the sums which they owed to the foreigners with whom France was at war.

We see that these decrees were intended to give satisfaction to those who complained of having been persecuted, and that they comprehended some of the measures capable of ameliorating the state of commerce. The Jacobin party alone had no decree peculiar to itself, but none was required. It had not been either persecuted or oppressed, it had merely been deprived of power, it therefore had no reputation to ask for. All that could be done was to assure it with regard to the intentions of government, and Lindet's report was framed and written with this object in view. Accordingly, the effect of this report and of the decrees which accompanied it acted favourably with respect to the prevailing parties.

The public mind appeared to be somewhat tranquillized. On the following day, the last of the year, and the fifth sans culottide of the year II (September 21, 1794), the fête which had long been settled for placing Marat in the Pantheon and excluding Mirabeau therefrom, was celebrated. It was at this time no longer in consistence with the state of public opinion and feeling. Marat was no longer so much a saint, or was Mirabeau so great a sinner, as that so many honours should be awarded to the sanguinary apostle of terror, and so much ignominy inflicted on the greatest orator of the revolution; but in order not to alarm the Mountain, and to avoid the appearance of too speedy a reaction, the fête was not countermanded. On the appointed day, the remains of Marat were conveyed with pomp to the Pantheon, and those of Mirabeau were ignominiously withdrawn by a side door.

Thus the supreme power, in its ebb from the Jacobins and the Mountainers, was now possessed by the partisans of Danton and of Camille-Desmoulins; in short, by the indulgents, who now constituted the Thermidorians. These latter, however, while they strove to repair the evils produced by the revolution, while they released the suspected, and endeavoured to restore some liberty and some security to commerce, still kept on terms of respect and attention with the Mountain, whom they had ousted, at the very time they were awarding to Marat the place they had so unceremoniously taken from Mirabeau.

CHAPTER XXIV.

CONTINUATION OF MILITARY OPERATIONS—SURRENDER OF CONDÉ, VALENCIENNES, LANDRECIES, AND LE QUESNOY—THE ALLIES DISCOURAGED—BATTLE OF THE OURTHE AND LA ROER.—PASSAGE OF THE MEUSE—OCCUPATION OF THE ENTIRE LINE OF THE RHINE—SITUATION OF THE ARMIES AT THE ALPS AND AT THE PYRENEES.—SUCCESS OF THE FRENCH AT ALL THESE POINTS.—STATE OF LA VENDEE AND BRITANNY; WAR OF THE CHOUANS. PUISAYE, PRINCIPAL ROYALIST AGENT IN BRITANNY—RELATIONS OF THE ROYALIST PARTY WITH THE FRENCH PRINCES AND THE FOREIGN POWERS.—INTRIGUES IN THE INTERIOR; THE PART PLAYED BY THE EMIGRANT PRINCES.

MILITARY operations were by no means so vigorously carried on towards the end of the season. Our two great armies of the North as also the Sambre and Meuse, which had entered Brussels in Thermidor (July), and then proceeded, the one to Antwerp, the other to the Meuse, had remained a long time inactive, waiting for the reduction of the fortresses of Landrecies, Le Quesnoi, Valenciennes, and Condé, which had been lost during the preceding campaign. On the Rhine, General Michaud was employed in remodelling his army, in order to repair the check of Kayserslautern, and awaited a reinforcement of fifteen thousand men drawn from La Vendée. The armies of the Alps and Italy having made themselves masters of the great chain, encamped on the heights of the Alps, while waiting for the approval of a plan of the invasion, proposed, it was said, by that same young officer who had decided the taking of Toulon and of the lines of Saorgio. At the eastern Pyrenees, Dugommier, after his success at Boulou, had stopped for a considerable time to reduce Collioure, and now was blockading Bellegarde. The army of the western Pyrenees was still organizing itself. This protracted inaction which marked the middle of the campaign, and which must be imputed to the important events in the interior, and to faulty combinations, might have seriously detracted from our successes, had the enemy known how to have seized the opportunity. But so much confusion prevailed among the allies, that they never thought of taking advantage of our error, which had no other effect than to retard for some short period the extraordinary run of our successes.

Nothing could demonstrate worse management than our inactivity in Belgium, in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, and on the banks of the Meuse. The surest means of accelerating the capture of the four last fortresses, would have been to drive further and further from them those large armies which could have relieved them. By taking advantage of the disorder into which the victory of Fleurus and the retreat consequent upon it, had thrown the allies, it would have been easy to have soon reached the Rhine. Unfortunately, a great ignorance yet prevailed as to the art of making the most of victory, an art the most important and the rarest of all, because it regards victory as being not so much the consequence of one successful attack, as the result of vast combinations. To accelerate the surrender of the four fortresses, the convention had issued a formidable decree, much the same as all those which followed one another from Prairial to Thermidor. Standing upon the reason that the allies occupied four French fortresses, and that every thing is allowable in order to get rid of an enemy, she decreed that if the enemy's garrisons did not surrender within twenty-four hours after they were summoned, they should be put to the sword. The garrison of Landrecies alone surrendered. The commandant of Condé returned this admirable answer, that one nation has not a right to decree the dishonouring of another. Le Quesnoi and Valenciennes continued to defend themselves. The committee, sensible of the injustice of such a decree, resorted to a subtlety for the purpose of evading its execution, and at the same time of sparing the convention the necessity of repenting it. It assumed that the decree, not having been notified to the commandants of the three fortresses, was as yet unknown to them. Before notifying it to them, the committee ordered general Scherer to push the works with sufficient activity, so as to make the summons more impressive, and to afford the hostile garrisons a good reason for capitulating. Valenciennes accordingly surrendered on the 12th Fructidor (August 29th); Condé and Le Quesnoi a few days afterwards. These fortresses, which had cost the allies so much during the preceding campaign, were thus recovered by us without any great exertions, and the enemy retained not a single point of our territory in the Netherlands. On the other hand, we were masters of all Belgium as far as Antwerp and the Meuse.

Moreau had just taken Slnys and returned into line; Sch  rer had sent Osten's brigade to Pichegru, and rejoined Jourdan with his division. Owing to this junction, the army of the north, under Pichegru, amounted to more than seventy thousand men actually under arms, and that of the Meuse, under Jourdan, to one hundred and sixteen thousand. The administration, exhausted by the efforts which it had made for the sudden equipment of these armies, was able to provide but very imperfectly for their supply. The deficiency was supplied by requisitions, conducted with as much consideration as possible, and in accordance with the utmost military forbearance. The soldiers contrived to dispense with the most necessary articles. They no longer encamped under tents, but bivouacked under the branches of trees. The officers, without appointments or paid with assignments, lived like the common soldier, ate the same bread, marched on foot like him, and with the knapsack at their back. Republican enthusiasm and victory supported these armies, the best conducted and the bravest that France ever possessed.

The allies were in a singular state of confusion. The Dutch, ill-supported by the English, and doubting their good faith, were disunited. They formed a cordon before their fortresses, so as to gain time for putting them in a state of defence, an operation which ought to have been long before finished. The duke of York, as presumptuous as he was ignorant, knew not how to avail himself of his English troops, and took no decisive step. He retired towards the lower Meuse and the Rhine, extending his wings sometimes towards the Dutch, at others in the direction of the Imperialists. However by being in junction with the Dutch, he might have still had fifty thousand men at his disposal, and have attempted, on the flanks of one or the other of the armies of the north or the Meuse, one of those bold movements which General Clerfait, in the following year, and the archduke Charles, in 1796, knew so well how to execute seasonably and with such propriety, and of which a great captain has since given so many memorable examples. The Austrians, entrenched along the Meuse, from the mouth of the R  r to that of the Ourthe, were disheartened by their reverses, and in want of necessary supplies. The prince of Cobourg, whose reputation was entirely tarnished by his last campaign, had given up his command to Clerfait, of all the Austrian generals the most worthy to retain it. It was not yet too late to draw near to the duke of York, and to act en masse against one of the two French armies; but the Austrians thought of nothing else than protecting the Meuse. The cabinet of London, alarmed at the course events were taking, had sent envoy after envoy to excite the zeal of Prussia, to claim from her on her part the execution of the treaty of the Hague, and to induce Austria, by promises of relief, to defend with vigour the line which her troops yet occupied. A meeting of English, Dutch, and Austrian ministers and generals took place at Maestricht, and it was settled that the banks of the Meuse should be protected.

At length in the middle of Fructidor (very early in September), the French armies were again put in motion. Pichegru advanced from Antwerp towards the mouth of the rivers. The Dutch committed the oversight of separating themselves from the English. They ranged themselves to the number of twenty thousand men along Bergen-op-Zoom, Breda, and Gertruydenberg, with their backs to the sea, in a position that no longer allowed them to produce any effect for the fortresses they meant to cover. The duke of York, with his English and Hanoverians, retired upon Bois-le-Duc, effecting a junction with the Dutch by a chain of posts, which the French army could take the moment it made its appearance. At Baxtel, on the bank of the Dommel, Pichegru overtook the rear-guard of the duke of York, surrounded two battalions, and cut them off. Next day, on the banks of the Aa, he fell in with general Abercromby, took some prisoners from him also, and contrived to press upon the duke of York, who hastened to cross the Meuse at Grave, under the guns of the place. In this march Pichegru had taken, by this mode of proceeding, fifteen hundred prisoners; he arrived on the banks of the Meuse on the second sans-culottide (the 18th September).

Meanwhile, Jourdan was advancing on his part, and put himself in readiness to cross the Meuse. The Meuse has two principal rivers which fall into it, the Ourthe, which joins it near Liege, and the R  r, which falls into it near Ruremonde. These tributary streams form two lines, dividing the country between the Meuse and the Rhine, and which must be successively carried before the latter river can be attained. The French, masters of Liege, had crossed the Meuse, and had recently disposed themselves in front of the Ourthe; they lined the Meuse from Liege to Maestricht, and the Ourthe from Liege to Comblaine-en-Pont, thus forming an angle of which Liege was the apex. Clerfait had ranged his left, in rear of the Ourthe, upon the heights of Sprimont. These heights are bordered on one side by the Ourthe, and on the other by the Ayvaille, which falls into the Ourthe. General Latour commanded the Austrians at that place. Jourdan ordered Sch  rer to attack the position of Sprimont on the Ayvaille side, while general Bonnet was to march thither, after crossing the Ourthe. On the second sans-culottide (September 18th), Sch  rer divided his corps into three columns, commanded by generals Marceau, Mayer, and Hacquin, and proceeded to the banks of the Ayvaille, which flows in a deep bed between two steep banks. The generals themselves set the example, plunged into the water and led their soldiers to the opposite bank, in spite of a formidable firing of artillery. Latour had continued motionless on the heights of Sprimont, preparing to fall upon the French columns as soon as they should have crossed the river. But no sooner had they climbed the steep bank, than they fell upon the position without giving Latour time to prevent them. They attacked him briskly, while general Hacquin was advancing upon his left flank, and while general Bonnet, who had crossed the Ourthe, was marching upon his rear. Latour was then obliged to decamp, and to fall back upon the imperial army.

This attack, well conceived and executed with spirit, was as honourable for the commander-in-chief as for his army. This conflict gained us thirty-six pieces of cannon, and one hundred baggage waggons; it caused a loss to the enemy of fifteen hundred men, killed as well as wounded, and decided Clerfait to abandon the line of the Ourthe. That general, on seeing his left beaten, was in fact apprehensive lest his retreat upon Cologne should be cut off. Consequently he quitted the banks of the Meuse and the Ourthe, and fell back upon Aix-la-Chapelle.

All that was left to the Austrians was the line of the Rôer. They occupied that river from Dueren and Juliers all the way from its falling into the Meuse, that is, to Ruremonde. They had ceded all that part of the course of the Meuse which is comprised between the Ourthe and the Rôer, between Liege and Ruremonde; all they had left for them was no more than that which lay between Ruremonde and Grave, the point by which they connected themselves with the duke of York.

The Rôer was the line which it behoved them to defend stoutly, so that they should not lose the left bank of the Rhine. Clerfait concentrated all his forces on the banks of the Rôer, between Dueren, Juliers, and Linnich. He had for some time previous constructed considerable works to secure his line, he had placed his advanced corps beyond the Rôer, upon the elevated plain of Aldenhoven, protected by intrenchments; he next occupied the line of the Rôer and its steep banks, and was encamped behind this line with his army and a formidable train of artillery.

On the 10th Vendémiaire, year III. (October 1, 1794), Jourdan found himself facing the enemy with all his forces. He ordered general Schérer, commanding the right wing, to bear upon Dueren, crossing the Roer at all the fordable points; general Hatry was to cross nearly in the centre of the position at Altorp; also Championnet's and Marlot's divisions, supported by cavalry, were to take the elevated plain of Aldenhoven, situated in advance of the Roer, to scour the plain, to cross the water, and to mask Juliers, in order to prevent the Austrians debouching thence; General Lefèvre had orders to make himself master of Linnich, and to cross at every one of the fords to be found in that neighbourhood; lastly, Kléber, who was near the mouth of the Rôer, received orders to proceed up the river to Ratem, and to cross over at that ill-defended point, for the purpose of covering the battle on the side towards Ruremonde.

Next day, the 11th Vendémiaire, the French put themselves in motion along the whole line.

One hundred thousand young republicans marched at once with an order and a precision worthy of more experienced troops. They had never yet exhibited in so great a number on the same field of battle. They advanced towards the Rôer, the object of their exertions. Unfortunately, they were still remote from that place, and it was not till near mid-day that they reached it. The general, in the opinion of military men, had committed but one oversight, that of taking a point of departure too distant from the point of attack, and in not taking the whole day to approach nearer to the enemy's line. General Schérer, commanding the right, directed his brigades upon the different points of the Rôer, and ordered general Hacquin to cross considerably above, at the ford of Winden, with a view to get round at the rear of the enemy's left flank. It was eleven o'clock when he made these arrangements. It took Hacquin a long time to travel the circuit marked out for him. Schérer waited for him to arrive at the point assigned before he dashed with his division into the Rôer, and he thus gave Clerfait time to prepare all his means along the heights of the opposite bank. It was three o'clock; at length Schérer, who would not wait any longer, put his divisions in motion. Marceau plunged into the water with his troops, and crossed at the ford of Mirveiller; Lorges did the same, bore towards Dueren, and drove the enemy from that place after a sanguinary conflict. The Austrians abandoned Dueren for a moment; but after falling back, they returned in more considerable force. Marceau immediately threw himself into Dueren, to support Lorges's brigade at that place. Mayer, who had crossed the Rôer a little above at Niederau, and had been received by a murderous fire of artillery fell back also upon Dueren. It was at that place that the action was hottest. The enemy, who as yet brought only his advanced guard into action, was formed in rear upon the heights, with sixty pieces of cannon. He lost no time in using them, and poured a shower of grape shot and balls upon the French. Our young soldiers, encouraged by the generals, stood firm. Unfortunately Hacquin did not yet make his appearance on the left flank of the enemy, a manœuvre upon which the fate of the battle was expected to depend.

At the same moment there was fighting at the centre, on the advanced elevated plain (plateau) of Aldenhoven. The French had got thither by using the bayonet. Their cavalry was deployed there, and received and withstood several charges. The Austrians, seeing that the Rôer had been crossed above and below Aldenhoven, had abandoned that plateau and retired to Juliers, on the other side of the river. Championnet, who had pursued them to the very glacis, cannonaded, and was in return cannonaded by the artillery of the place. At Linnich Lefèvre had repulsed the Austrians, and joined the Rôer, but having found the bridge burnt, he occupied himself in rebuilding it. At Ratem, Kléber had encountered sweeping batteries, and answered them by a heavy fire of artillery.

The main action, therefore, was on the right in the direction of Dueren, where Marceau, Lorges, and Mayer were crowded together, who were all of them awaiting Hacquin's movement. Jourdan had ordered Hatry to fall back upon Dueren, instead of making good his passage across the river at Altorp; but the passage across the water was too lengthy for this column to be of any service at the decisive point. At last, at five in the evening, Hacquin appeared at Latour's left flank. Thereupon the Austrians, seeing themselves exposed on their left to Hacquin, and that they had Lorges, Marceau, and Mayer in front of them, decided upon retreating, and drew back their left wing, the same that had been engaged at Sprimont. On their extreme right, Kléber threatened them by a bold movement. The bridge which he wanted to throw across being too short, the soldiers had demanded permission to dash through the river. Kléber, to keep up their ardour, collected all his artillery, and played upon the enemy on the opposite bank. The Imperialists were then obliged to retire at this point, and it was not long before they quitted all the others. They abandoned the Rœr, leaving eight hundred prisoners, and three thousand men wounded.

Next day, the French found Juliers evacuated, and they were able to pass the Rœr at all points. Such was the important battle that won us the definitive conquest of the left bank of the Rhine. It is one of those by which general Jourdan best merited the gratitude of his country and the esteem of military men. Nevertheless the critics have censured him for not having taken a point of departure nearer to the point of attack, and for not having brought the bulk of his force to bear upon Mirvœiller and Dueren.

Clerfait took the high road to Cologne; Jourdan followed him, and took possession of that town on the 15th Vendémiaire (October 6); he seized Bonne on the 20th (October 20th), Kléber accompanied Marescot to besiege Maestricht.

While Jourdan was so valiantly performing his task, and taking possession of the important line of the Rhine, Pichegru on his part was preparing to cross the Meuse, so as next to reach the Wahl, a principal branch of the Rhine, near the mouth of that river. According to what we have been just now relating, the duke of York had crossed the Meuse at Grave, leaving Bois-le-Duc to its own forces. Pichegru, before he attempted the passage of the Meuse, was to have made himself master of Bois-le-Duc. This was no easy task at this time of year, and with an insufficiency of artillery for a siege. However, the audacity of the French and the discouragement of the enemy rendered every thing possible. Fort Crèvecoeur, near the Meuse, exposed to a battery seasonably directed upon a point where the enemy had believed a battery could not have been thrown up, surrendered. The artillery found there served to forward the siege of Bois-le-Duc. Five consecutive attacks daunted the governor, who surrendered the place on the 19th Vendémiaire (10th October). This unhopèd-for success gave the French a firm footing, and furnished them with considerable ammunition for pushing their operations beyond the Meuse and to the bank of the Wahl.

Moreau, who formed the right, had since the victories of the Ourthe and the Rœr advanced as far as Venloo. The duke of York, alarmed at this movement, had withdrawn all his troops to the other side of the Wahl, and abandoned the entire space between the Meuse and the Wahl or the Rhine. Nevertheless, perceiving that Grave (on the Meuse) would soon be left without communications and without support, he recrossed the Wahl, and undertook to defend the space comprised between those two streams. The ground, as is always the case near the mouths of great rivers, was lower than the bed of the streams; it presented extensive pastures, intersected by canals and causeways, and inundated in certain parts. General Hammerstein, stationed intermediately between the Meuse and the Wahl, had increased the difficulty of access by cutting off the roads, by covering the dykes with artillery, and throwing bridges over the canals which his army was to destroy as it retired. The duke of York, whose advanced guard he formed, was placed in the rear, on the banks of the Wahl, in the camp of Nimeguen.

On the days of the 27th and 28th Vendémiaire (October 18 and 19), Pichegru made two of his divisions cross the Meuse by a bridge of boats. The English, who were under the cannon of Nimeguen, and Hammerstein's advanced guard along the canals and dykes, were too far off to prevent this passage. The rest of the army landed on the other side, under the protection of these two divisions. On the 28th, Pichegru decided upon attacking the works that covered the intermediate space between the Meuse and the Wahl. He launched four columns, forming a mass superior to the enemy, into those pastures overflowed and intersected by canals. The French defied with extraordinary courage the fire of the artillery; they next threw themselves into the ditches up to their shoulders in water, while the sharpshooters, from the margins of the ditches, fired over their heads. The enemy retired in alarm, without thinking of any thing but saving his artillery. He sought refuge in the camp of Nimeguen, on the banks of the Wahl, whither the French were soon to follow him and daily defy him.

Thus towards Holland, - as well as towards Luxemburg, the French had at length been able to attain that formidable line of the Rhine, which nature seems to have assigned as a boundary to their fine country, and which the French have always been ambitious of acquiring as a frontier. Pichegru, it is true, being stayed in his progress by Nimeguen, was not yet master of the course of the Wahl; and if he should think of conquering Holland, he saw before him numerous streams, fortified places, inundations, and a frightful season; but he now almost touched the so-much-desired line, and with one more bold exploit he might be able to enter Nimeguen on the isle of Bomme, and effect a firm position upon the Wahl. Moreau, styled the general of sieges, had by an act of boldness just entered Venloo; and Jourdan occupied a strong position on the Rhine. Along the Moselle and Alsace, the armies had likewise just reached that great river.

Since the check of Kayerslautern, the armies of the Moselle and of the Upper Rhine, commanded by Michaud, had spent their time in reinforcing themselves by detachments drawn from the Alps and La Vendée. On the 14th Messidor (July 2), an attack had been attempted along the whole line from the Rhine to the Moselle, on the two slopes of the Vosges. This attack, too divided in its operation, did not meet with success. A second attempt, founded on better principles, had been made on the 25th Messidor (July 13). The greatest exertions had been brought to bear upon the centre of the Vosges, with a view to gain possession of the passes, and had caused, as it always did, a general retreat of the allied armies beyond Frankenthal. The committee had then ordered a diversion upon Trèves, of which the French took possession, to punish the elector. By this movement, a principal regiment was placed en flèche between the imperial armies of the Lower Rhine and the Prussian army of the Vosges, without their ever thinking to take advantage of this situation. However, the Prussians, at length taking advantage of a diminution of our forces towards Kayerslautern, had again attacked us unawares, and brought us back in rear of Kayerslautern.

Fortunately, Jourdan had just been victorious on the Rôur; and Clerfuit had just then recrossed the Rhine at Cologne. The allies had not then the courage to remain in the Vosges; they retired, abandoning the whole Palatinate to us, and throwing a strong garrison into Mentz. All that remained to them were Luxemburg and Mentz on the left bank. The committee immediately gave orders for their blockade. Kléber was called from Belgium to Mentz, to direct the siege of that place, which he had assisted to defend in 1793, and where he had commenced his distinguished career. Thus our conquests were extended on all points, and every where carried us up to the Rhine.

At the Alps, the same cessation from action continued, and the great chain still remained ours. The plan of invasion, ably devised by general Bonaparte, and communicated to the committee by the younger Robespierre, who was on a mission to the army of Italy, had been adopted. It consisted in forming a junction between the two armies of the Alps and of Italy in the valley of Stura, so as to overrun Piedmont. Orders had been given for marching when news of the events of the 9th Thermidor arrived; the execution of the plan was then suspended. The commanders of the fortresses, who had been obliged to give up part of their garrisons, the representatives, the municipalities, and all the partisans of reaction, alleged that this plan had for its object to ruin the army, by throwing it into Piedmont, to open Toulon again to the English, and to serve the secret designs of Robespierre; Jean-Bon-Saint-André, who had been sent to Toulon to superintend the repairs of the ships of war there, and who entertained schemes relative to the Mediterranean, proved himself one of the greatest opponents to this plan. Young Bonaparte was even accused of being an accomplice of the Robespierres, on account of the confidence with which his talents and his designs had inspired the younger of the two brothers. The army was brought back in disorder to the great chain, where it resumed its positions. The campaign concluded with a brilliant advantage. The Austrians, conjointly with the English, determined to make an attempt on Savona, so as to cut off the communication with Genoa, which by its neutrality rendered great service to the provision trade. general Colloredo advanced with a regiment of from eight to ten thousand men, but made no great haste in his march, and gave the French time to prepare themselves. Fallen upon amid the mountains by the French, whose movements were directed by general Bonaparte, he lost eight hundred men, and retreated disgracefully, reproaching the English, who in their turn accused him. The communication with Genoa was put on its old footing, and the army was confirmed in all its positions.

At the Pyrenees our successes were again renewing their career. Dugommier was still besieging Bellegarde, with the intention of making himself master of that place before descending into Catalonia. La Union had desired by means of a general attack on the French line to come to the relief of the besieged; but repelled at every point, he had recently withdrawn himself, and the fortress, more discouraged than ever by this rout of the Spanish army, had surrendered on the 6th Vendémiaire (27th September). Dugommier, feeling quite secure on his rear, put himself in readiness to advance into Catalonia. At the western Pyrenees, the French, shaking off their inaction, had recently overrun the valley of Bastan, taken Fontarabie, and Saint-Sebastian, and favoured by the climate of those countries, made their preparations as they did at the eastern Pyrenees, to make the most of their successes in spite of the approach of winter.

In La Vendée the war had continued. It was not brisk and dangerous, but slow and devastating. Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Charette had at length shared the command among them. Since the death of Larochejacquelein, Stofflet had succeeded him in Anjou and Upper Poitou; Sapinaud had still retained the small division of the centre; Charette, who had distinguished himself by the campaign of the last winter, when, with almost an annihilated force he had yet contrived to elude the pursuit of the republicans, took the command in Lower Vendée; but he aspired to the general command. They had met at Jallais, and had entered into articles dictated by the abbé Bernier, the curé of Saint-Laud, the councillor and friend of Stofflet, and vicegerent in his name. This abbé was quite as ambitious as Charette, and desired such a combination as should furnish him with the means of exercising over all the chiefs the influence he possessed over Stofflet. They agreed to form a supreme council, under whose orders every thing for the future was to be done. Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Charette reciprocally confirmed to each other their respective commands of Anjou, the Centre and Lower Vendée. M. de Marigny, who had survived the great Vendean expedition to Granville, having infringed one of the orders of this council, was seized. Stofflet had the cruelty to order him to be shot upon a report of Charette. This act of severity was attributed to jealousy, and it produced a most unfavourable impression on all the royalists.

The war, without any possible result, became nothing else than a war of devastation. The republicans had established fourteen intrenched camps, which inclosed the whole insurgent country. From these camps issued incendiary columns, who, under the chief command of general Turreau, executed the formidable decree of the convention. They burned the woods, the hedges, the brushwood, frequently the villages themselves, seized the harvest and the cattle, and, acting pursuant to the decree which ordered every inhabitant who had not taken part in the rebellion to retire to the distance of twenty leagues from the insurgent country, treated as enemies every one they met with. The Vendéans, who in order to maintain themselves, had not ceased to cultivate their lands amidst these horrid scenes, defended themselves against this kind of warfare in such a way as to render it endless. On a signal from their leaders, they formed sudden assemblages, fell upon the rear of the camps, and took them by storm, or, allowing the columns to advance, they rushed upon them when they had got into the heart of the country; and if they succeeded in breaking the column, they killed them all to the very last man. They then seized upon the arms and ammunition, which they were extremely desirous of possessing; and without having done any thing to make an impression upon a very superior enemy, they did no more than procure the means of continuing this glorious warfare.

Such was the state of things on the left bank of the Loire. On the right bank, in that part of Brittany which is comprehended between the Loire and the Vilaine, a new gathering had been formed, chiefly formed out of the remains of that Vendean column destroyed at Savenay, and of the peasants inhabiting those plains. M. de Scépeaux was its leader. This corps was nearly of the same strength as that of M. de Sipinaud, and connected La Vendée with Brittany.

Brittany had become the theatre of a war in every respect different from that of La Vendée, and not the less deplorable. The Chouans, to whom we have already alluded, were smugglers, whom the discontinuance of the barriers had left without occupation, young men who had refused to comply with the requisition, and some Vendéans, who, like those of M. de Scépeaux, had escaped from the rout of Savenay. They abandoned themselves to the pursuit of plunder among the rocks and spacious woods of Brittany, particularly in the great forest of Petite. They did not form, like the Vendéans, numerous bodies capable of keeping the field; they marched in bands of from thirty to fifty, stopped couriers and the public conveyances, and murdered the justices of the peace (juges de paix), the mayors, the republican functionaries, and, above all, the purchasers of the national property. As for those who were not purchasers but farmers of such property, they called on them, and compelled payment of the sum lent to them. They generally undertook the destruction of bridges, the breaking up of roads, the cutting off the shafts of carts, the prevention of the conveyance of consumable goods to the towns. They made terrible threats to those who carried their produce to the markets, and they executed those threats by plundering and burning their property. Not being able to occupy the country in military fashion, their object evidently was to subvert it by preventing the citizens from accepting any office under the republic, by punishing the acquisition of national property, and by starving the towns. Less united and less strong than the Vendéans, they were nevertheless more formidable, and truly deserved the appellation of brigands.

They had a secret leader, whom we have already mentioned, M. de Puisaye, a member of the constituent assembly. He had retired after the 10th of August to Normandy, had engaged heart and hand, as we have already observed, in the federalist insurrection, and after the defeat of Vernon, had fled to Brittany, to conceal himself, and there gathered together the remains of the conspiracy of La Rouerie. To great intelligence and extraordinary skill in uniting the elements of a party, were joined extreme activity of body and mind, with an overweening ambition. Puisaye, struck by the peninsular position of Brittany, with the great extent of its coast, with the peculiar disposition and appearance of its soil, covered with forests, mountains, and impenetrable retreats, struck above all by the rudeness of its inhabitants, speaking a foreign language, and consequently deprived of all communication with the other inhabitants of France, entirely subjected to the influence of the priests, and three or four times as numerous as the Vendéans,—Puisaye conceived that he should be able to excite in Brittany an insurrection much more formidable than that which had the Catholic hierarchy, the d'Elbées, the Bonchamps, and the Lescures for leaders. Above all, the vicinity of England, and the convenient intermediate situation of the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, had inspired him with the plan of inducing the cabinet of London to concur in his designs. He was therefore fore by no means desirous that the energy of the country should be wasted in useless pillage, and he laboured to organize it in such a manner, as that he might be able to hold it entirely under his own hand. With the assistance of the priests, he had caused all the men capable of bearing arms to be enrolled in registers opened in the parishes. Each parish formed a company, every canton a division, the united divisions formed four principal divisions, those of Morbihan, Finistère, Côtes du Nord, and Ille et Vilaine, all four of them depending upon a central committee which represented the supreme authority of the country. Puisaye presided in the central committee, in the capacity of commander in chief, by means of these correspondences he made his orders known throughout the whole province. He recommended to his followers, until his vast projects could be put in execution, to commit as few hostilities as possible, that they might not draw too many troops after them into Brittany, and to content themselves with providing ammunition and preventing the carriage of provisions to the towns. But the Chouans, by no means adapted for the kind of general war which he was contemplating, abandoned themselves individually to robbery, which was more profitable to them, and more to their taste. Puisaye therefore hastened to put the finishing stroke to his work, and purposed, as soon as he should have completed the organization of his party, to go to London, in order to open a negotiation with the English cabinet and the French princes.

As we have already seen, in the account of the preceding campaign, the Vendéans had not yet put themselves in communication with foreign powers. They had sent to them M. de Tinténiac, to inquire who they were, and what number they were, and what was their object, and to offer them arms and assistance if they would make themselves masters of any one port on the coast. It was this that had induced them to march to Granville, and to make that attempt, with the disastrous conclusion of which we are already acquainted. The squadron of Lord Moula, after having cruised to no purpose off our coasts, had carried to Holland the relief intended for La Vendée. Puisaye hoped to call forth a similar expedition, and to come to some understanding with the princes, who had not yet expressed any gratitude, or given any encouragement to the insurgent royalists of the interior.

The princes, on their side, having no great expectation as to support from foreign powers, began to cast back their eyes on their possessions in the interior of France. But none about them were disposed to turn to account the devotedness of the brave men who were ready to sacrifice themselves in their cause. Some aged lords, some old friends, had followed Monsieur, who had become regent, and fixed his residence at Vevon, since the com-

try in the neighbourhood of the Rhine was no longer habitable except for military men. The prince of Condé, a brave but inefficient man, continued collecting upon the upper Rhine all those who were desirous of making their fortune by their sword. A number of young nobility followed the count d'Artois in his travels, and had accompanied him as far as Saint Petersburg. Catharine had given the prince a magnificent reception; she had presented him with a frigate, a million of money, a sword, and the brave count de Vauban, to induce him to make good use of it. She had, moreover, promised the most effectual assistance the moment the prince should have landed in La Vendée. This descent, however, never took place; and the count d'Artois had returned to Holland, to the head-quarters of the duke of York.

The situation of the three French princes was neither brilliant or prosperous. Austria, Prussia, and England had refused to recognize the regent; for to recognize any other sovereign of France than the sovereign de facto, was to interfere with domestic affairs, which no foreign power desired to have the appearance of doing. At this time in particular, when they were beaten, all of them affected to say that they had taken up arms merely on behalf of their own security. To recognize the regent brought another inconvenience along with it: it would have been pledging themselves not to make peace till after the destruction of the republic, an event on which they did not further reckon. In the mean time the powers did not discard the agents of the princes, but did not admit them to possess any public character. The duke d'Harcourt at London, the duke d'Havre at Madrid, and the duke de Polignac at Vienna, transmitted notes little read and hardly attended to, and were rather the second-hand dispensers of the very scanty relief granted to the emigrants, than the organs of an acknowledged power. Hence the highest dissatisfaction at the conduct of the foreign powers prevailed in the three emigrant courts. They began to discover that this admirable zeal of the allied powers in the cause of royalty concealed the most violent enmity against France. Austria, by displaying her flag at Valenciennes and Condé, had, in the notion of the emigrants, called forth an outburst of French patriotism. Prussia, of whose pacific intentions they had already some glimmerings, had, they said, failed in all her engagements. Pitt, who of all the allied powers, was the most positive and the most supercilious towards them, was also the most hateful to them. He was never styled otherwise than as the perfidious Englishman, and they said that they ought to take his money and cheat him afterwards, if they could. They pretended that on Spain alone any reliance could be placed; Spain alone was a faithful cousin, and a sincere ally; and it was only upon her that all their expectations should be founded.

The three petty fugitive courts, at present so little in unison with the allied powers, did not live on the best terms with one another. The court of Verona, indisposed to take an active part, giving to the emigrants orders that were ill-obeyed, making communications to the cabinets that were little heeded, by agents who were not recognized, was filled with distrust of the two others, became jealous of the active part performed by the prince of Condé upon the Rhine, and of the nature of the consideration which his unenlightened but energetic courage gained him the cabinets, and envied even the travels of M. the count d'Artois in Europe. The prince of Condé, on his part, quite as destitute of intelligence as he was brave, would not enter on any settled design, and did not exhibit any great anxiety in respect of the two courts that would not fight. Lastly, the little court collected at Arnheim, disliked both the mode of life it was forced to lead at the Rhine, as well as the superior authority to which it was obliged to submit at Verona, and therefore kept close to the English head-quarters, under the pretext of various designs upon the coast of France.

Cruel experience having taught the French princes that they could not depend upon the enemies of their country for the restoration of their throne, they were fond of observing that they must thenceforward rely solely on their partisans in the interior and on La Vendée. Ever since terror had ceased to reign in France, the violent agitators had unfortunately begun to breathe, as well as honest men. The correspondence of the emigrants with the interior had been recently revived. The court of Verona, by the agency of count d'Entraigues, corresponded with one Lomaitre, an intriguer, who had been successively an advocate, secretary to the council, pamphleteer, and prisoner in the Bastille, and who finished by being the agent of the princes. With him were associated a man named Laville-Hearniois, formerly master of the requests, and a creature of Calonne, and one Brothier, preceptor of the nephews of the abbé Maury. Applications were made to these intriguers for particulars concerning the situation of France, the state of parties, and their political tendencies, and plans of conspiracy. In return they sent intelligence very often the falsest possible; they made empty boasts of their pretended intercourse with the heads of the government, and strove with all their might to persuade the French princes that every thing was to be expected from a movement in the interior. They were directed to correspond with La Vendée, and especially with Charette, who from his protracted defence, became the hero of the royalists, but with whom they had not yet been able to open any negotiation.

Such was then the situation of the royalist party in France, both abroad and at home. It was carrying on in La Vendée a war, less alarming from its dangers than afflicting by its ravages; this party was forming in Brittany extensive, but as yet distant projects, subject moreover to a very difficult condition, the union and the co-operation of a multitude of individuals; out of France this party was disunited, held in little consideration, and met with little support; at length, being disabused as to the efficacy of relief from the foreign powers, it entertained a puerile correspondence with the royalists of the interior.

The republic therefore had not much to fear from the efforts of Europe and royalty. Apart from the painful contemplation of the ravages in La Vendée, the republic had cause to congratulate herself upon her splendid triumphs. Having been saved from invasion in the preceding year, she had amply revenged herself by her conquests in this ; she had acquired Belgium, Dutch Brabant, the countries of Luxemburg, Liège, and Juliers, the electorate of Trèves, the Palatinate, Savoy, Nice, a fortress in Catalonia, and the Valley of Bastan, and thus maintained a threatening aspect towards Holland, Piedmont, and Spain at one and the same time. Such were the results of the great efforts of the celebrated committee of public welfare.

CHAPTER XXV.

WINTER OF THE YEAR III. ADMINISTRATIVE REFORMS IN ALL THE PROVINCES.—CHANGE IN SOCIAL MANNERS, THE THERMIDORIAN PARTY; THE "JEUNESSE DORÉE." THE WITHDRAWING ROOMS OF PARIS.—CONTENT OF THE TWO DOMINANT PARTIES IN THE SECTIONS; STORMY DEBATES AND TUMULTUOUS SCENES.—VIOLENCES COMMITTED BY THE REVOLUTIONARY PARTY AT THE JACOBINS AND AT THE ELECTORAL CLUB.—DECREES CONCERNING THE POPULAR SOCIETIES.—DECREES IN RESPECT OF THE FINANCES. MODIFICATIONS IN THE "MAXIMUM" AND IN THE REQUISITIONS.—TRIAL OF CARRIER.—AGITATIONS IN PARIS AND THE INCREASING EXASPERATION OF THE TWO PARTIES.—ATTACK UPON THE HALL OF THE JACOBINS BY THE "JEUNESSE DORÉE."—THE JACOBIN CLUB CLOSED.—RETURN OF THE SEVENTY-THREE DEPUTIES IMPRISONED AFTER THE THIRTY-FIRST OF MAY TO THE ASSEMBLY.—CONDEMNATION AND EXECUTION OF CARRIER.—PROSECUTIONS COMMENCED AGAINST BILLAUD-VARENNE, COLLOT-D'HERBOIS, AND BARRÈRE.

WHILE the events we have been relating were occurring on the frontiers, the convention continued its reforms. The representatives commissioned to remodel the administrations traversed France, in every place reducing the number of the revolutionary committees, composing them of other individuals, causing to be arrested as accessories of Robespierre's system those whose notorious excesses would not permit them to be left unpunished, changing municipal functionaries, reorganizing the popular societies, and purifying them of the most violent and most dangerous men. This operation was not always carried into effect without opposition. At Dijon, for instance, the revolutionary organization was found more compact than any where else. The same persons, members at one and the same time of the revolutionary committee, of the municipality, and of the popular society, made every body there tremble. They imprisoned arbitrarily both travellers and inhabitants, inscribed upon the list of emigrants all those whom they were pleased to place there, and prevented their obtaining certificates of residence by intimidating the sections. They had incorporated themselves into regiments under the character of a revolutionary army, and compelled the commune to allow them pay. They followed no calling, but attended the meetings of the club, they and their wives, and dissipated at orgies, where nothing but goblets were used, the double produce of their appointments and their rapacities. They corresponded with the Jacobins of Lyons and Marseilles, and made use of them as go-betweens of communication with those of Paris. The representative Casal had the greatest difficulty in dissolving this combination; he dismissed every one of the revolutionary authorities, selected twenty or thirty of the most moderate members of the club, and delegated to them the task of purifying the remainder.

When they were expelled from the municipalities in the provinces, the revolutionists did there as they did in Paris; they usually retired to the Jacobin Club. If the club had been purified, they either obtruded themselves into it again after the departure of the representatives, or formed another. There it was that they made more violent speeches than ever, and indulged in all the frenzy of rage and fear, for they beheld vengeance every where. The Jacobins of Dijon dispatched an inflammatory address to those of Paris. At Lyons they exhibited a no less dangerous body; and as the city was still under the weight of the terrible decrees of the convention, the representatives had great trouble to keep their fury within bounds. At Marseilles they were more audacious; adding the excitement of their party to the warmth of local character, they formed a considerable body, beleaguered a room where the two representatives, Anguis and Serres, were at table, and sent delegates to them who, sword and pistol in hand, came to demand the release of the imprisoned patriots. The two representatives displayed the greatest firmness; but being ill supported by the gendarmes, who had invariably seconded the cruelties of the late system, and who had gone so far as to consider themselves accessories of and responsible for it, they narrowly escaped being strangled and murdered. However, several Parisian battalions, which were at that moment at Marseilles, came to the rescue of the two representatives, and dispersed the mob. At Toulouse, also, the Jacobins excited commotions. They had there four individuals: a director of the posts, a secretary for the district, and two comedians, who had made themselves leaders of the revolutionary party. They had formed a committee of superintendence for the whole of the south, and extended their tyranny far beyond Toulouse. They were opposed to the reforms and the imprisonments ordered by the representatives d'Artigoyte and Chaudron-Rousseau, they roused the popular society, and had the audacity to declare through that medium that those two representatives had forfeited the confidence of the people. Overmastered, however, they were clapped in prison with their principal accomplices.

These scenes were repeated every where, with more or less violence, according to the character of the inhabitants of the provinces. Nevertheless the Jacobins were in every place suppressed. Those of Paris, the leaders of the combination, were in the greatest alarm. They perceived the capital violently opposed to their doctrines; they learned that in the departments public opinion, less prompt to manifest itself than in Paris, was not the less decided against them. They knew that they were everywhere called cannibals, partisans, accomplices, and continuators of Robespierre. They found themselves supported, it is true, by the mob of dismissed officials, by the electoral club, by a violent and frequently victorious minority in the sections, and by a portion of the members of the convention, some of whom still sat in their club; but they were not the less alarmed at the direction public feeling had taken, and pretended that a plot had been concocted for dissolving the popular societies, and after them, the republic.

They prepared an address to the corresponding societies, as a reply to the attacks to which they were subjected. "They are seeking," said they, "to destroy our fraternal union; they are contriving how to break a fa^çces so formidable to the enemies of equity and of liberty. They accuse us, they pursue us with the darkest imputations. Aristocracy and moderatism are raising their audacious heads. The fatal reaction occasioned by the fall of the tyrant is perpetuated, and from amidst the storms raised by the enemies of the people a new faction has sprung up, which tends to the dissolution of every one of the popular societies. This faction harasses and strives to excite the public opinion, it carries its audacity to such a height, as to hold us forth as a rival power to the national representation,—us who, always fighting and identifying ourselves with the public opinion throughout all the perils to which the country has been exposed. It accuses us of being the continuators of Robespierre's system, and we have in our registers the names of those only who, in the night between the 9th and 10th Thermidor, occupied the post which the danger of the country assigned to them. But we will reply to these vile calumniators by constantly fighting against them. We will answer them by the purity of our principles and of our actions, and by an unshaken attachment to the cause of the people which they have betrayed, to the national representation which they aim at dishonouring, and to that equity which they detest."

They affected, as we see, a high respect for the national representation. They had even, in one of their sittings, given up to the committee of general safety one of their members, for having said that the principal conspirators against liberty were in the body of the convention itself. They circulated their address in all the departments, and particularly in the sections of Paris.

The party which was opposed to them became daily bolder. It had already adopted colours, distinguishing manners, places, and watchwords. This party, especially in its origin, as we have already observed, consisted of young men, either belonging to persecuted families, or who had evaded the requisition. The women had joined them; they had passed the last winter in fearful anxiety, they resolved upon spending the present in festivities and amusements. Finaute (November and December) was at hand. They were eager to relinquish the appearances of indigence, of simplicity, nay, even that wretchedness which had long been f-ected during the reign of terror, for brilliant dresses, elegant manners and entertainments. They bound themselves in one common cause with the young enemies of a ferocious democracy; they excited their zeal, they made politeness and attention to dress a law with them. Fashion resumed again its sway. It required the hair to be plaited in tresses, and fastened at the back of the head with a comb. This practice was borrowed from the soldiers, who arranged their hair in that manner to protect themselves from sword cuts, and it was intended to intimate that the wearers had recently borne a part in the victories of our armies. Large cravats, black or green collars were worn, according to the custom of the Chouans, and above all, crapes round the arm, as being the relative of a victim of the revolutionary tribunal. We see what a singular medley of ideas, recollections, and opinions presided over these fashions of the golden age of youth (jeunesse dorée), for that was the name which was given to it at the time. In the evening, in the withdrawing rooms, which now again opened, brilliant compliments rewarded those young men who had displayed their courage in the sections, at the Palais Royal, in the garden of the Tuileries, as also those writers who, in the thousand pamphlets and publications of the day, had launched the keenest sarcasms against the revolutionary canaille. Fricton had become the most distinguished of the journalists. He was the editor of the Orateur du Peuple, which soon acquired celebrity. This was the journal read by the golden age of youth, and in which it sought its instruction of the day.

The theatres were not yet opened; the actors of the comédie Française were still in prison. For want of this place of resort, people went to show themselves at concerts given at the Feydeau theatre, where was to be heard a melodious voice which began to charm the Parisians, that of Garat. There assembled what might be called the aristocracy of the time, some nobles who had not quitted France, opulent men who had ventured to show themselves again, and contractors who no longer dreaded the terrible severity of the committee of public welfare. The women appeared there in a costume which, according to the practice of the time, was meant to be antique, and was copied from David. They had long relinquished powder and hoops; they wore fillets round their hair; the form of their gowns approached as near as possible to the simple tunic of the Greek women; instead of high heeled shoes, they wore that covering for the foot which we see in ancient statues, a light sandal, fastened by ribbons crossing one another round the leg. The young men, with hair turned up and black collar, filled the pit of the Feydeau, and sometimes applauded the elegant and singularly-dressed females who came to cast a lustre on those assemblies.

Madame Tallien was the most beautiful and the most admired of those ladies who introduced the new taste. Her drawing room was the most brilliant and the most frequented. Being the daughter of Cabarus the Spanish banker, the wife of a president at Bordeaux, and recently married to Tallien, she was connected with the men both of the old and of the new regime. She was indignant against the system of terror, as well from resentment as from natural kindness, she had sympathized with all the unfortunate, and, whether at Bordeaux or at Paris, she had not ceased for a moment to act the part of petitioner in their behalf, a part which she performed we are told with irresistible grace. It was she who had softened the proconsular rigour exhibited by her husband in the Gironde, and who had brought him back to more humane sentiments. Her desire was that his part should be that of a mediator, and that he should heal those disorders the revolution had occasioned; she drew around her all those who had contributed with Tallien to the events of the 9th Thermidor, and sought to gain them over by complimenting and holding out hopes to them that the public would acknowledge their services, and grant that oblivion of the past which so many of them needed, as also that power which now seemed to be promised to the adversaries, rather than to the advocates of terror. She was surrounded by amiable women, who contributed to this plan of such a pardonable seduction. Among them the widow of an unfortunate general, Alexandre Beauharnais, a young creolian, fascinating not so much on account of her beauty, as for her extreme gracefulness, was most conspicuous. To these parties were invited simple and enthusiastic men, who led a life of austerity and turmoil. They were caressed, sometimes rallied on their dress, on their manners, and on the severity of their principles. They were placed at table by men whom they would lately have persecuted as aristocrats, as newly-enriched speculators, and plunderers of the public property; they were thus forced to feel their own inferiority beside models of the ancient politeness and good society. Many of them, being in contracted circumstances, lost their dignity together with their rudeness; others who, from the strength of their understanding, knew how to maintain their rank, and to gain those advantages of the drawing room so frivolous and so soon acquired, were nevertheless not proof against delicate flattery. Many a member of a committee, adroitly solicited at a dinner party, rendered a service, or suffered his vote to be influenced.

Thus a woman, sprung from a financier, married to a magistrate, and who had become, as one of the relics of the old state of society, the wife of an ardent revolutionist, undertook to reconcile simple, sometimes coarse, and almost always fanatical men, with elegance, taste, pleasures, ease of manners, and indifference as to opinions. The revolution, brought back from that extreme point of fanaticism and grossness (which was certainly a great point), advanced nevertheless too rapidly towards the oblivion of republican manners, principles, and we may almost say, resentments. The Thermidorians were reproached with this change. They were accused of giving way to it, of producing it, of accelerating its motion, and the reproach was just.

The revolutionists kept aloof from these drawing rooms and from these concerts. If some few of them ventured to appear there, they left them only to go to their tribunes to inveigh against the Cabanists, the aristocrats, the intriguers, and the contractors, whom Madame Tallien drew along in her train. They, for their part, had no other meetings than their clubs and their assemblies of sections, to which they resorted, not to seek pleasure, but to give vent to their passions. Their wives, who were called the fiuries of the guillotine, because they had frequently formed a circle round the scaffold, appeared in popular costume in the tribunes of the clubs, to applaud the most violent motions. Several members of the convention still attended the sittings of the Jacobins; some earned thither their celebrity, but they were silent and gloomy; such were Collet d'Herbois, Billaud-Varennes, and Carrier. Others, as Duhem, Cras-sous, and Lanot, went thither from attachment to the cause, but without the personal reason of defending their revolutionary conduct.

It was at the Palais-Royal, in the circle of the convention, in the tribunes, and in the sections, that these two parties came into collision. In the sections in particular, where they had to deliberate and to discuss, extremely violent quarrels took place. The address of the Jacobins to the corresponding societies was about that very time hawked from one to another, and some insisted on having it read there. A decree also enjoined the reading of the report of Robert Lindet on the state of France, a report which presented so faithful a picture of it, and expressed so precisely the sentiments with which the convention and all honest men were animated. The reading of these documents furnished occasion every decade for the warmest disputes. The revolutionists called loudly for the address of the Jacobins, and their adversaries for Lindet's report. A frightful uproar was the consequence. The members of the old revolutionary committees took down the names of all those who mounted the tribune to oppose them, and, as they wrote them, they exclaimed, "We will exterminate them." The habits which they had contracted during the reign of terror had made the words to kill, to guillotine, so familiar to them, that they had them constantly in their mouths. They thus gave occasion for its being said that they were making new lists of proscription, and intended to revive the system of Robespierre. Fights frequently took place in the sections; sometimes victory was undecided, and by ten o'clock there was no possibility of reading any thing. The revolutionists, who did not scruple to exceed the lawful hour, would then wait till their adversaries, who affected to obey the law, had withdrawn, and then they read what they pleased, and deliberated on any subjects they wished to discuss.

Scenes such as these were daily reported to the convention, and complaints were made against the old members of the revolutionary committees, who were, it was said, the authors of all these disturbances. The electoral club, more noisy of itself than all the sections put together, had just urged the patience of the assembly to the utmost, by an address of the most dangerous kind. It was, as we have said, in this club that the men most compromised always met, and that the most daring schemes were conceived. A deputation from this club came to demand that the election of the municipal magistrates should be restored to the people; that the municipality of Paris, which had not been re-established since the 9th Thermidor, should be re-constituted; and lastly, that instead of a single meeting a decade, each section should be allowed to hold two. On this last petition a great number of deputies rose, made the most vehement complaints, and demanded measures against the members of the old revolutionary committees, to whom they attributed all the disturbances. Legendre, though he had disapproved Lecointre's first attack upon Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, said that it was necessary to go further back, that the source of the evil lay in the members of the former committees of government, that they abused the indulgence which the assembly had shown them, and that it was high time to punish their ancient tyranny, in order to prevent a new one.

This discussion excited a fresh tumult, more violent than the first. After long and deplorable recriminations, the assembly, encountering nothing else than questions too excitable to be discussed, or otherwise impracticable, passed a second time to the order of the day. Various modes of repressing the extravagancies of the popular societies and the abuse of the right of petition were over and over again discussed. It was moved to annex to Lindet's report an address to the French people, expressing in a still more precise and energetic manner the sentiments of the assembly and the new course which it intended to pursue. This idea was adopted. Richard, who had just returned from the army, insisted that this was not enough; that it was necessary to govern vigorously; that addresses signified nothing, because all the petition-makers would not fail to reply to them; and that people ought not to be suffered to use at the bar such language as in the streets would cause those who dared to utter it to be apprehended. "It is high time," said Bourdon (of the Oise), "that some important truths should be addressed to you. Do you know why your armies are constantly victorious?—because they observe strict discipline. Have a good police in the state, and you will have a good government. Do you know whence proceed the everlasting attacks directed against yours?—from the abuse by your enemies of all that is democratic in your institutions. They take delight in reporting that you will never have a government, that you will be for ever involved in anarchy. It may then be possible that a nation constantly victorious should not know how to govern itself. And would the convention, knowing that this alone prevents the completion of the revolution, neglect to provide for it? No, no; let us undeceive our enemies. It is by the abuse of the popular societies and of the right of petition that they aim at destroying us. It is this abuse that must be repressed."

Various expedients were submitted for suppressing the abuse of popular societies without destroying them. Pelet, in order to deprive the Jacobins of the support of several mountaineer deputies who belonged to their society, and especially Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and other dangerous leaders, proposed to forbid members of the convention from becoming members of any popular society whatever. This suggestion was adopted. But a great number of remonstrances arose from the Mountain. It was urged that the right of meeting, for the purpose of enlightening themselves on the subject of the public interests, was a right belonging to all the citizens, and of which a deputy could no more be deprived than any other member of the state; that consequently the decree adopted was a violation of an absolute and inviolable right. The decree was rescinded. Dubois-Cranceé made another motion. Explaining the manner in which the Jacobins had purified themselves, he showed that this society contained within its body the very same persons who had so misguided it under Robespierre. He maintained that the convention possessed the right of purifying it anew, precisely in the same manner as it did by her commissioners in respect of the societies in the departments; and he proposed to refer the question to the competent committees, that they might devise a suitable mode of purifying, and the means of rendering the popular societies useful. This new motion was also carried.

This decree made a great noise at the Jacobins. They cried out that Dubois-Cranceé had deceived the convention; that the purifying ordained after the 9th Thermidor had been strictly executed; that there was no pretext for its repetition; that all of them were worthy to sit in that illustrious society, which had rendered such services to the country; that, in fact, they had nothing to fear from the severest examination, and that they were ready to submit themselves to the judgment of the convention. Consequently they settled that a list of all their members should be printed, and carried to the bar by a deputation. On the following day, the 13th Vendémiaire (4th October), they were less tractable; they said that the decision adopted the preceding evening was injudicious; that to deliver a list of the members of the society to the assembly was to recognize in them the right of purification, which belonged to no one; that as all citizens had a right to meet unarmed, to confer together on questions of public interest, no individual could be declared unworthy of becoming a member of a club; that by consequence, purification was contrary to all law, and that they ought not to carry the list to the bar. "The popular societies," exclaimed Giot, a furious Jacobin, and one of those agents retained at the armies, "the popular societies belong exclusively to themselves. Were it otherwise, the infamous court party would have purified that of the Jacobins, and you would have seen these benches, which ought to be occupied by virtue, sullied by the presence of the Jaucourts and the Feuillants. Well! the court itself, which was no respecter of persons, durst not attack you; and shall that which the court dared not attempt be undertaken at the very moment when the Jacobins have sworn to overthrow all tyrants, be they who they may, and to be ever submissive to the convention? I have just come from the departments; I can assure you that the existence of the popular societies is in extreme jeopardy; I have been treated as a villain, because the designation of Jacobin appeared on the face of my commission. I was told that I belonged to a society composed entirely of brigands. There are secret intrigues to cut you off from the other societies of the republic; I have been so fortunate as to prevent the separation, and to knit more closely the bonds of fraternity between you and the society of Bayonne, which Robespierre had calumniated in the midst of you. What I have just been saying of one commune equally applies to all. Be discreet, continue to adhere to principles and to the convention, and, above all, do not recognize any authority that assumes the right of purifying you." The Jacobins applauded this speech, and settled that they would not carry this list to the convention, but await its decrees.

The electoral club was much more tumultuous. Since its last petition it had been expelled from the Evêché, and had taken refuge in a room of the Museum, close by the convention. There, in a night sitting, amid the furious shouts of those who attended it, and the stamping of the women who filled the galleries, it declared that the convention had gone beyond the duration of her powers; that she had been commissioned to try the late king and to frame a constitution; that she had performed both; and that, consequently, her task was performed and her powers determined.

Those scenes at the Jacobins and at the electoral club were again denounced to the convention, who referred the whole to the committee commissioned to submit to her the draught of a decree relative to the abuses of the popular societies. She had voted an address to the French people, in conformity with a motion already made, and had despatched it to the sections and to all the communes of the republic. This address, couched in firm yet discreet language, repeated, in a more positive as well as in a more precise manner, the sentiments expressed in Lindet's report. This address became the subject of fresh contentions in the sections. The revolutionists wanted to prevent its being read, and set themselves against what was voted in reply to the addresses of approval. On the contrary, they contrived to cause the adoption of addresses to the Jacobins, in order to express to them the interest they felt in their cause. It frequently happened, after they had carried a vote, that an accession of strength came to their adversaries' relief, and then they were expelled, and the section, thus renewed, came to a contrary decision. Thus also were to be seen several sections who presented two inconsistent addresses, one to the Jacobins, the other to the convention. In the first were extolled the services of the popular societies, with the strongest expressions in favour of their retention; in the other, they said that the section, delivered from the yoke of anarchists and terrorists, came at length to express without restraint its desires to the convention, to offer her its arms and its life, so as to put down at once the continuators of the system of Robespierre and the agents of royalism. The convention was present at these debates while the bill relative to the police of the popular societies was in agitation.

This bill was brought in on the 25th Vendémiaire (16th October). Its principal object was to break down the combination that all the Jacobin clubs were forming in France. Affiliated with the parent society, and corresponding regularly with her, and obeying her orders, they constituted a most extensive party, ably organized, which had one centre and one rule of action; and it was this that the present decree wanted to destroy. The decree prohibited "all affiliations and federations, as well as all correspondence in a corporate (collectif) name between popular societies." It purported, moreover, that no petitions or addresses could be made in a corporate name, in order to put a stop to these imperious manifestoes, which the delegates of the Jacobins or the electoral club brought and read at the bar, and which, in many instances, had been acted upon as so many orders to the assembly. Every address or petition was to be individually signed. Thus the means of prosecuting the authors of dangerous propositions would thus be provided, and it was expected that the necessity of signing would more readily disunite them. A list of the members of every society was to be immediately prepared, and to be placarded in the place of meeting. No sooner was this decree read to the assembly than a multitude of voices were raised to oppose it. "They want," said the Mountaineers, "to destroy the popular societies; they forget that they have saved the revolution and liberty; they forget that they are the most powerful means of bringing the citizens together and preserving their energy and patriotism; by prohibiting their correspondence, they attack the inherent right of citizens of every degree to correspond with each other, a right quite as inviolable as that of meeting peaceably to confer on questions of public interest.

Lejeune, Duhem, and Crassous, all of them Jacobins, and deeply interested in setting aside this decree, were not the only persons who thus expressed themselves. The deputy Thiбаudeau, a settled republican, unconnected with either Mountaineers or Thermidorians, appeared himself to be alarmed at the consequences of this decree, and moved its adjournment, apprehensive lest it might strike at the very existence of the popular societies. There is no desire to annihilate them, replied the Thermidorians, the originators of this decree, we only want to subject them to a salutary control. Amidst this conflict, Merlin (of Thionville) exclaimed, "President, call the opposers to order. They allege that we want to extinguish the popular societies, when the present subject-matter is the regulating their present constitution." Rewbell, Bentabolle, and Thuriot demonstrated that the question did not concern suppression. "Are they to be prevented," said they, "from assembling peaceably and unarmed to confer on the public interests? Assuredly not; that right is inviolate. They are only prevented from forming affiliations and federations, and no more is done with respect to them than has been already done in regard to the departmental authorities. These latter, according to the decree of the 14th Frimaire, which constitutes the revolutionary government, can neither correspond or effect any mutual combination. Can it be permitted that the popular societies should be allowed to do what has been forbidden to the departmental authorities? They are forbidden to correspond in a corporate name, and no one right is thereby violated: every citizen can assuredly correspond from one end of France to the other; but do citizens correspond through a president and secretary? It is this official correspondence between powerful and constituted bodies that it is desired, and with good reason, to prevent, in order to destroy a federalism more monstrous and more dangerous than that of the departments. It is by these affiliations, and by this correspondence, that the Jacobins have contrived to exercise a substantive influence over the government, and to assume a part in the direction of affairs, which ought to belong to the national representation itself."

Bourdon (of the Oise), one of the principal members of the committee of general safety, and, as we have seen, a Thermidorian, frequently in opposition to his friends, exclaimed, "The popular societies are not the people. I only see the people in the primary assemblies. The popular societies are a collection of men, who have chosen themselves, like monks, and who have at last completed an exclusive and permanent aristocracy, styling itself the people, and which now is about to station itself beside the national representation, to suggest, to modify, or to oppose, its resolutions. By the side of the convention I see another representation springing up, and that representation has its seat at the Jacobins." Great cheering here interrupted Bourdon; he proceeded in the following terms: "So little excitement do I carry into this contest, that, in order to secure unity and peace, I would cheerfully say to the people, 'Choose between the men whom ye have appointed to represent you, and those who have sprung up by the side of them; what signifies it, so that ye have an uniformity of representation?'" fresh cheering interrupted Bourdon; he resumed: "Yes," he exclaimed, "let the people choose between yourselves and the men who have wanted to proscribe the representatives entrusted with the national confidence, between yourselves and the men who, in connexion with the municipality of Paris, wanted a few months since to assassinate liberty. Citizens, would ye make a glorious peace? would ye attain the ancient boundaries of Gaul? Offer the Belgians, the people bordering on the Rhine, a pacific revolution, a republic without a conflict of representation, a republic without revolutionary committees stained with the blood of citizens. Say to the Belgians, to the people of the Rhine: 'Ye want an imperfect liberty, we give it to you entire, only sparing you the dreadful calamities which preceded its introduction, by sparing you the sanguinary ordeal through which we have ourselves passed.' Think on this, citizens, that in order to deter the neighbouring nations from uniting with you, a statement has gone forth that you have no settled government, and that treating with you, they know not whether to address themselves to the convention or to the Jacobins. Impart, on the other hand, unity and community to your government, and you will perceive that no nation is alienated from yourselves and your principles; you will see that there is no nation that hates liberty."

Duham, Crassous, and Clausel proposed at least the adjournment of the decree, saying that it was too important to be passed so suddenly; they all of them at once desired to be heard; Merlin (of Thionville) required leave to move against them, with that fervid spirit which he brought to the tribune, and displayed in the field of battle. The president allowed them to be heard in succession, Dubarran, Lavasseur, and Ronme were also heard against the decree, and Thuriot for it. At length Merlin a second time rushed to the tribune, "Citizens," said he, "when the question was as to whether the republic should be founded, you decreed for it without reference to a committee and without report; to-day the question is hardly any thing less than to found the republic the second time, by saving her from the popular societies which have put themselves in combination against her. Citizens, we must not be afraid to enter this cavern in spite of the blood and the carcases which obstruct the entrance; have the courage to advance fearlessly into it, expel the villains and the murderers, and leave none else therein save the good citizens who will calmly balance the great interests of the country. I exhort you to pass this decree, which saves the republic, as you did that which created her, that is, without reference to a committee or report."

Merlin was applauded, and the decree was forthwith voted article by article. This was the first blow given to that celebrated society, which up to that day had made the convention herself tremble, and served to impress her with a revolutionary aspect. It was not so much the provisions of the decree, in many respects easily evaded, as the courage to pass it, that were of importance on this occasion, and these provisions could not but forewarn the Jacobins of their approaching dissolution. Upon meeting that evening in their hall, they made their comments upon the decree and the way in which it had been passed. The deputy Lejeune, who in the morning had opposed its adoption with all his might, complained that he had not been seconded; he said that few members of the assembly had taken part in the debate to defend that society of which they were members; "There are," said he, "members of the convention, celebrated for their revolutionary and patriotic energy, who this day have preserved a reprehensible silence. Either those members are guilty of tyranny of which they are accused, or they have laboured for the public welfare. In the first instance, they are guilty, and ought to be punished; in the second, their task is not yet finished. After having made way by their toils for the successes of the defenders of the country, they ought to defend the principles and the rights of the people which are attacked. Two months ago, you were incessantly speaking in this tribune about the rights of the people, you, Collot and Billaud; why have ye now ceased to defend them? Why are ye silent, now that a multitude of objects claim the exercise of your courage and your intelligence?"

Billaud and Collot ever since the accusation which had been preferred against them, had observed a gloomy silence. Being thus called upon by their colleague Lejeune to explain, and charged with not having stood up for the society, they spoke out and declared, that if they kept silence it was from prudential motives, and not from want of moral courage; that they were fearful of injuring by their support the cause taken up by the patriots, that for some time past, the apprehension of obstructing the discussions had been the only cause of their reserve; that moreover, being accused of lording it over the convention, they had rather desired that their keeping themselves in the background should afford a sufficient reply to their accusers; that they were in raptures to find themselves called upon by their colleagues to emerge from this voluntary obscurity, and in some measure authorized to devote themselves again to the cause of liberty and of the republic.

Satisfied with this explanation, the Jacobins cheered them, and returned to the consideration of the law passed in the morning; they consoled themselves with saying that they would correspond with all France by means of the tribune. Goujon called upon them to respect the law just enacted. They promised to do so, but one Terrasson laid before them an expedient as a substitute for their correspondence, while they professed obedience to the law, namely, that a circular letter should be prepared, not written in the name of the Jacobins and addressed to other Jacobins, but signed by all the free men assembled in the hall of the Jacobins, and addressed to all the freemen in France meeting in popular societies. This scheme was adopted with great exultation, and the draught of a circular of this kind was resolved upon.

We see how much the Jacobins cared about the threats of the convention, and how little they were inclined to profit by the lesson that it had just given them. While waiting till new facts should provoke further measures in regard to them, the convention set about prosecuting the task that Robert Lindet had allotted her in his report, and to discuss the questions he had proposed. The question was how the mischievous effects of a violent system, as applied to agriculture, commerce, and finances, could be repaired, and in what manner all classes of society could be restored to security, and the tendency to order and industry revived. But here there was as much conflict as ever upon difference of system, and every one seemed as much disposed to lose his temper on this as well as on every other subject.

The requisitions, the maximum, the assignats, the sequestration of the property of foreigners, provoked not less violent attacks upon the old government, than the imprisonments and the executions. The Thermidorians, extremely inexperienced in matters of public economy, earnestly applied themselves, from a spirit of reaction, to censure in bitter and abusive terms all that had been done in that way; and yet if, in the general administration of the state during the preceding year, there was any thing that could not be blamed, and was completely justified by necessity, it was the administration of the finances, provisions and supplies. Cambon, the most influential member of the committee of finances, had brought the revenue into the most excellent order: he certainly had caused a great quantity of assignats to be issued, but this was the only resource; and he had his bickerings with Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon for not allowing sundry revolutionary expenses. As for Lindet, who took charge of the transport and requisition service, he had laboured with admirable zeal to draw from abroad, to make requisitions in France, and to convey the necessary supplies either to the armies or to the great communes. The method of requisitions was violent, but it was acknowledged to be the only practicable mode, and Lindet had done his best to avail himself of it with the greatest consideration. Besides all this, he could not answer for the correctness of every one of his agents, or for the conduct of all those who had a right to make requisitions, such as the municipal functionaries, the representatives, and the commissioners at the armies.

The Thermidorians, and Tallien in particular, made the most foolish and the most unjust attacks upon the general system of these revolutionary ways and means, and against the mode of employing them. According to them, the primary cause of all the evils was the too abundant issue of assignats; it was that disproportionate issue that had depreciated them, and they now bore no corresponding proportion with the necessities of life and commodities in general. Thus it was that the maximum had become so oppressive and so calamitous, because it compelled the seller or the satisfied creditor to accept a nominal value, which was daily becoming more and more illusory. There was not in all those objections any thing new, nor did they contain any useful hint; in particular, no remedy was suggested, and every body knew the fact as well as themselves; but Tallien and his friends laid the excessive issue of assignats to the charge of Cambon, and seemed thus to lay all the calamities of the state at his door. They likewise reproached him with the sequestration of the property of foreigners, a measure which, having provoked reprisals against the French, had interrupted the negotiation of paper securities, had destroyed every kind of credit, and had utterly ruined trade. So far as concerned the commission of supplies, the same censors accused it of having harassed France by requisitions, of having disbursed enormous sums to foreigners in the purchase of corn, and of leaving Paris in a state of destitution at the approach of a severe winter. They therefore proposed to call him to a severe account.

Cambon's integrity was acknowledged by all parties. To an ardent zeal for the due administration of the finances, he united an impetuous temper, so that an unjust reproach made him lose all self-control. He had sent word to Tallien and his friends, that he would not attack them so long as they did not annoy him; but that upon the first aspersion cast upon him, he would pursue them in the most determined manner. Tallien had the imprudence to add newspaper articles to his attacks from the tribune. Cambon no longer contained himself, and in one of the numerous sittings dedicated to the discussion of these matters, he rushed to the tribune, and thus apostrophized Tallien: "Ah! dost thou then attack me? wouldst thou cast a slur upon my integrity? Well, then, I will prove that thou art a robber and a murderer. Thou hast not rendered thy accounts as secretary of the commune, and I have proof of this at the committee of the finances; thou hast authorized an expenditure of fifteen hundred thousand francs for an object which will cover thee with infamy; thou hast not rendered thy accounts for thy mission to Bordeaux, and what is more, I have evidence of all this at the committee. Thou wilt ever be suspected of being accessory to the crimes of September, and I shall shortly prove to thee by thine own words that participation therein which must for ever make thee hold thy peace." Cambon was interrupted: he was told that these personalities were foreign to the discussion, that nobody had impeached his integrity, that the only question was as to his financial system. Tallien stammered out a few faltering words, and said that he would not answer personalities against himself, but only go to what touched upon the general question. Cambon then demonstrated that the assignats had been the only resource of the revolution; that the expenditure had amounted to three hundred millions per month; that amidst the disorder which prevailed, the receipts had furnished scarcely one-fourth of that sum; that it had been necessary to make up the deficiency every month with assignats; that there was no mystery as to the quantity in circulation, and that it amounted to six thousand four hundred millions; that on the other hand, the national property represented twelve thousand millions, and afforded ample means for redeeming the republic; that he had, at the peril of his life, saved five hundred millions that Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon had proposed to appropriate for certain expenses; that he had long opposed the maximum and the foreign sequestration; and that as for the board of trade being obliged to pay for corn abroad at the rate of twenty-one francs per quintal, and to part with it in France for fourteen, it was not to be wondered at that this commission should have incurred an enormous expense.

These wranglings, so imprudent on the part of the Thermidorians, who, whether right or wrong, did not enjoy the most immaculate reputation, and who thus fell upon a highly honourable, well informed, though very violent man, caused the assembly a great waste of time. Although these attacks had ceased on the part of the Thermidorians, Cambon would not let the matter rest, but daily repeated in the tribune, "Accusez-moi, vilie rabble! Come, then, examine my accounts, and judge of my conduct." "Pray be quiet," cried one or the other to him, "nobody denies your integrity;" but he reverted to the subject every day. Amidst this conflict of personalities, the assembly took, as far as she could, the measures best adapted to repair or to mitigate the evil.

The convention ordered a general statement of the finances, exhibiting the receipts and the expenditure, and a special report upon the means of withdrawing a portion of the assignats from circulation, but however without having recourse to divesting them of their monetary character, and so as not to render them worthless. On the motion of Cambon, she disclaimed the use of a paltry financial resource, which gave rise to many extortions, and was in conflict with the prejudices of many of the provinces, that of melting down the church plate. This plate had been at first estimated at one thousand millions. In reality it did not amount to more than thirty millions. It was settled that it should no longer be allowed to be touched, and that it should remain in the custody of the communes. The convention then strove to correct the most serious inconveniences of the maximum. Some voices already cried out for its abolition; but the fear of a disproportionate rise of prices prevented the assembly from yielding to this impulse of the reactionists. All that was considered was, how the law could be modified. The maximum had contributed to the destruction of trade, because while they conformed to the tariff, the merchants could not get a return, either of the premiums of freight or insurance. In consequence all colonial produce, all the necessaries of life, all raw materials brought by foreigners into our ports, were released from the maximum and from requisitions, and might be sold unrestrictedly to any person whomsoever. The same exemption was granted to merchandise taken in prizes, for such lay in the ports without being disposed of to purchasers. The uniform maximum of corn was attended with an extremely serious inconvenience. The growth of corn being more expensive and less abundant in certain provinces, the prices received by the farmers in those provinces did not even repay their outlay. It was decided that the prices of corn should vary in every department, according to the prices of 1790, and that they should be advanced two-thirds more. By thus causing a rise in the price of provisions, the intention was to raise the yearly pay, the salaries and the income of small annuitants; but this idea, proposed in good faith by Cambon, was vehemently opposed as insidious by Tallien, and postponed.

They were next occupied with the subject of the requisitions. That these might no longer be general, unlimited, or confused, and that they might no longer exhaust the means of conveyance, it was settled that the commission of supplies should alone have authority to make requisitions; that it should not have the power to lay under requisition, either the entire bulk of any article, or the whole of the productions of any department, but that it should specify the subject, its nature, and its quantity, the time of delivery and of payment; that requisitions should be made in exact proportion to the necessity, and in the district nearest to that which required virtualising. The representatives with the armies were the only persons empowered, on an emergent case, either from a want of provisions or a rapid movement, to compel the necessary requisitions off-hand.

The question of the sequestration of foreign securities was warmly agitated. Some argued that the subjects of a government ought not to be personally identified with its wars; that every government should allow its subjects to peaceably continue their mutual intercourse and their exchange, and confine their attacks to the armies; that the French had seized no more than twenty-five millions, whereas of theirs one hundred millions had been seized; the twenty-five millions ought to be restored to enable us to return the one hundred; that the sequestration was ruin to our bankers, for they were obliged to deposit at the treasury what they were indebted to foreigners, while they did not receive what foreigners owed them, foreign governments constantly seizing it by way of reprisals; that the continuance of this measure rendered French commerce suspected even by neutrals; lastly, that the circulation of negotiable securities having ceased, it was necessary to pay in money for part of the supplies procured from the neighbouring countries. Others replied to these arguments, that if a distinction were to be made in war in favour of the subjects of a government, in future bullets and cannon balls were to be projected against the heads of the kings only, and not against their soldiers; that we should restore to English trade the vessels taken by our privateers, and only retain the ships of war; that if we were to restore the sequestered twenty-five millions, the example would not be followed by the hostile governments, and the hundred millions of French property would still be impounded; and that to restore the circulation of paper securities, would in fact be furnishing the emigrants with the means of receiving funds.

The convention durst not settle the question, and merely decided that the sequestration should be taken off with regard to the Belgians, whom conquest had in some degree restored to a state of peace with France, as also in respect of the merchants of Hamburg, who were guiltless of the war declared by the empire, and whose bills represented corn supplied to France.

To all these measures of restitution adopted for the benefit of agriculture and commerce, the convention added all those that were likely to restore security and to renew confidence among merchants. A decree of some standing outlawed all who had withdrawn themselves either from trial, or from being subject to a particular law; this decree was repealed, and those who had been condemned by the revolutionary commissions, as also the suspected persons who had concealed themselves, could return home. To those suspected persons who were still detained in confinement, the control of their property was restored. Lyons was declared to be no longer in a state of rebellion; her name was restored; the demolition of houses ceased; restitution was made to her of the merchandize which had been sequestered by the surrounding communes; her merchants no longer needed certificates of civism to qualify them to import or export merchandize; and all restrictions were removed from off that unfortunate city. The members of the popular commission of Bordeaux and their adherents, that is to say, almost all the Bordeaux merchants of that place had been outlawed: the decree outlawing them was repealed. A column to perpetuate infamy was to be erected at Caen in memory of their federalism; it was settled that it should not be erected. Sedan was allowed to manufacture cloths of every description. The departments of the north, the Pas-de-Calais, the Aisne, and the Somme, were relieved from the land-tax for four years, on condition of their re-establishing the cultivation of flax and hemp. Lastly, some notice was taken of unhappy La Vendée. Hentz and Francastel the representatives, general Turreau, and several others, who had executed the formidable decrees of terror, were recalled. It was affirmed, naturally enough, that they were the accomplices of Robespierre and of the committee of public welfare, who, by cruel usage, had wanted to make the war in La Vendée last for ever. Nobody knows why the committee should have entertained such an intention; but parties return one absurdity for another. Vincux was appointed to take the command in La Vendée, and young Illoche in Brittany. New representatives were despatched to those countries, on a mission to ascertain whether it were possible to induce the acceptance of an amnesty, and thus to bring about a pacification.

We see how rapid and how general was the return to different sentiments. Naturally enough, when the assembly came to survey the whole extent of the calamity, and to consider the cases of proscribed persons, that she should also take into consideration the case of her own members. For upwards of a year, seventy-three of them had been imprisoned at the Port-Libre, for having signed a protest against the 31st of May. They had written a letter demanding a trial. All that was left of the right side, being some of the members of what was called the Belly (Ventre *), rose upon a question which concerned the freedom of voting, and demanded the restoration of their colleagues. Then arose one of those stormy and interminable discussions which always take place when the past is ripped up. "Do you mean, then, to condemn the 31st of May?" exclaimed the Mountaineers; "Do you mean to stigmatize an event which up to this moment you have proclaimed glorious and salutary? Do you want to raise a faction, which by its opposition had nearly undone the republic? Do you want to revive federalism!!!" The Thermidorians, originators or approvers of the events of the 31st of May, were embarrassed; and, to postpone the decision, a report upon the seventy-three was ordered.

It is in the nature of reactions not only to endeavour to repair the evil committed, but also to seek revenge. The trial of Lebon and Fouquier-Tinville was every day demanded; the trial of Billaud, Collot, Barrère, Vadier, Voulant, and David, members of the old committees, had already been called for. The time was continually bringing propositions of this kind. The drownings (noyades) of Nantes, which had long remained a secret, were at length brought to light. One hundred and thirty-three inhabitants of Nantes, sent to Paris, to be tried by the revolutionary tribunal, did not arrive till after the 9th Thermidor; they had been acquitted, and a ready ear was afforded them in all the disclosures they made respecting the calamities of their city. Such was the public indignation, that it was found necessary to summon the revolutionary committee of Nantes to Paris. The depositions against them disclosed all the ordinary atrocities of civil war. In Paris, and at a distance from the theatre of the war, no one ever conceived that ferocity had been carried to such lengths. The accused had but one plea, which they made in defence to all the charges preferred against them: La Vendée at their gates, and the orders of Carrier the representative. Seeing that the preliminary proceedings were drawing to a close, they every day exclaimed more violently against Carrier, insisting that he should share their fate, and should himself be called to account for the acts which he had ordered. The public in general demanded the apprehension of Carrier, and his trial before the revolutionary tribunal. The convention was obliged to take some notice of this. The Mountaineers asked if, after having already imprisoned Lebon and David, and several times accused Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, it was not intended to prosecute every one of the deputies who had gone out on mission. To dispel their fears, they set about devising a decree regulating the formalities to be employed in prosecutions instituted against a member of the national representation. This decree hung long in debate, and was discussed with the greatest animosity on one side and the other. The Mountaineers, in order to prevent a new decimation, were for rendering the formalities long and difficult. Those who were called reactionists wished, on the contrary, to simplify them, in order to render summary and more certain the punishment of certain deputies, who were styled "proconsuls." It was at length decreed that every denunciation should be referred to the three committees of public welfare, general safety, and legislation, for them to decide whether there was ground for inquiry; that in case of an affirmative decision, a sort of commission of twenty-one members should be formed to make a report; that, after this report and the exculpatory defence of the accused deputy, the convention were to decide whether there was ground for the accusation, and should send the deputy before the competent tribunal.

As soon as the decree was passed, the three committees declared that there was ground for further inquiry against Carrier; a commission of twenty-one members was formed, which took possession of the documents, caused Carrier to appear before it, and took the depositions. After what had passed before the revolutionary tribunal, and the knowledge which every body had acquired of the facts, the fate of Carrier could not be doubtful. The Mountainers, although they concurred in condemning the crimes of Carrier, affirmed that if he were prosecuted it was not to punish his crimes, but to commence a long series of persecutions against the men whose energy had saved France. Their adversaries, on the contrary, hearing the members of the revolutionary committee daily demand the appearance of Carrier, and observing the procrastination of the commission of twenty-one, cried out that they wanted to save him. The committee of general safety, apprehensive lest he should take flight, had surrounded him with police agents, who never lost sight of him. Carrier, however, had no thought of flight. Some revolutionists had secretly advised him to make his escape, but he had not resolution to effect it; he appeared to be overwhelmed, and, as it were, paralyzed by the public horror. One day, perceiving that he was followed, he went up to one of the agents, asked why he followed him, and pointed a pistol at him; a scuffle ensued, the armed force interfered, and Carrier was seized and conducted to his abode. This scene excited a general disturbance in the assembly, and violent complaints at the Jacobins.

It was said that the national representation had been violated in the person of Carrier, and explanations were demanded from the committee of general safety. That committee explained how the circumstances occurred, and though severely censured, it had at least an opportunity of showing that it never had any intention of favouring the escape of Carrier. At length the commission of twenty-one made its report, and decided that there was sufficient ground for accusation before the revolutionary tribunal. Carrier made but a poor defence; he threw the blame of all the cruelties on the exasperation produced by the civil war, on the necessity of striking terror into La Vendée, still threatening; lastly, on the impulse communicated by the committee of public welfare, to which he durst not impute the drownings, but to which he attributed that inspiration of ferocious energy which had hurried away several of the commissioners of the convention. Here it was that dangerous questions, which had already been several times agitated, were again revived; the convention saw that she was again exposed to a dissension as to the part each had taken in the violent scenes of the revolution; the commissioners might fling them back upon the committees, the committees might retort them on the convention, and the convention might impute to France that inspiration which had produced such frightful but such great results, which affected every one, and were in particular induced by a situation without parallel. "Every body and every thing," said Carrier in a moment of despair, "is guilty here, even to the president's bell." The tale of the atrocities committed at Nantes had, however, excited such indignation, that not one member durst defend Carrier, or even thought of justifying him on the score of general considerations. He was unanimously decreed to be under accusation, and was sent to the revolutionary tribunal.

Thus the reaction was making rapid strides. The blows which its authors had not yet dared to strike at the members of the old committees of government, were now levelled at Carrier. All the members of the revolutionary committees, all those of the convention who had served on missions, in short, all the men who had been invested with rigorous functions, began to tremble for themselves.

The Jacobins, already stricken by a decree which forbade their affiliation and correspondence in a corporate name, had need of prudence; but since the late events it was not probable that they knew how to contain themselves, and to avoid a struggle with the convention and the Thermidorians. What had passed in regard to Carrier led in fact to a stormy meeting of their club. Crassous, a deputy and a Jacobin, depicted the means employed by the aristocracy to ruin the patriots. "The trial now going forward before the revolutionary tribunal," said he, "is its principal resource, and that on which it places the greatest reliance. The accused are hardly allowed a hearing before that tribunal; the witnesses are almost all of them persons interested in making a great noise about this affair; some of them have passports signed by Chouans; the journalists and the pamphleteers have combined in exaggerating the most trifling facts, to control public opinion, and to keep out of sight the cruel circumstances which have brought about and which explain the misfortunes that happened not at Nantes only, but throughout all France. If the convention does not take care, she will find herself dishonoured by these aristocrats, who make such a noise about this trial, in order that the entire odium should recoil upon the assembly. It is no longer the Jacobins who are to be accused of wanting to dissolve the convention, but those men who have combined to compromise and to degrade her in the eyes of France. Let, therefore, all good patriots beware; the attack against them has already commenced; let them close their ranks, and be ready to defend themselves with energy."

Several Jacobins spoke after Crassous, and repeated nearly the same sentiments. "People talk," said they, "of shootings and drownings (fusillades et noyades), but they do not recollect that the individuals for whom they feel pity had given assistance to the brigands. They do not recollect the cruelties perpetrated on our volunteers, who were hanged upon trees and shot in files. If vengeance is demanded on behalf of the brigands, let the families of two hundred thousand republicans, mercilessly slaughtered, come also to demand retribution." The highest excitement then took place; the sitting became a scene of absolute disorder, when Billaud-Varennes, whom the Jacobins reproached for his sullen silence, took his turn to speak. "The course of the counter-revolutionists," said he, "is known. When, in the time of the constituent assembly, they desired to bring the revolution to trial, they called the Jacobins disorganizers, and shot them in the Champ de Mars. After the 2d of September, when they wanted to prevent the establishment of the republic, they called them blood-drinkers (boueurs de sang), and loaded them with atrocious calumnies. They are now recommencing the same machinations; but do not let them suppose that they are to triumph. The patriots have been able to keep silence for a moment; but the lion is not dead when he slumbers, and when he awakens he exterminates all his enemies. The trench is opened, the patriots are about to rouse themselves, and to resume all their energy: we have already risked our lives a thousand times; if the scaffold yet awaits us, let us recollect that it was the scaffold that covered the immortal Sidney with glory."

This speech had an electric effect. Billaud-Varennes was cheered; the members gathered round him, vowing to make common cause with the threatened patriots, and to defend themselves to the last extremity.

In the state in which parties then were, a sitting like this could hardly fail of exciting great attention. These words of Billaud-Varennes, who had hitherto restrained himself from showing himself in either of the two tribunals, were an outright declaration of war. The Thermidorians actually regarded them as such. The next day, Bantabolle snatched up the Mountain Journal, wherein was a report of the sitting of the Jacobins, and denounced these expressions of Billaud-Varennes: The lion is not dead when he slumbers, and when he awakens he exterminates all his enemies. Scarcely had Bantabolle finished reading this sentence, when the Mountaineers took fire, loaded him with abuse, and told him that he was one of those who had caused the aristocrats to be enlarged. Duhem called him a rogue. Tallien was for hearing Bantabolle, who, alarmed at the tumult, would have descended from the tribune. He was, however, persuaded to stay there, and he then proposed that Billaud-Varennes should be called upon to explain what he meant by the awakening of the lion. Billaud spoke a few words from his place. "To the tribune!" was shouted from all quarters. He refused, but at length was obliged to ascend and address the assembly. "I shall not disavow," said he, "the opinion that I expressed at the Jacobins; so long as I conceived that the question concerned only private quarrels, I held my peace; but I could no longer hold my tongue when I saw the aristocracy rise up more threatening than ever." At the last words there was a burst of laughter in one of the galleries, and some disturbance occurred in the other. "Turn out the Chouans!" was shouted from the Mountain. Billaud continued amidst the applause of some and the murmurs of others. He said, in a faltering voice, that they had released well-known royalists, and had imprisoned the purest patriots; he cited the instance of Madame de Tourzel, governess of the royal children of France, who had just been liberated, and who might of herself form a nucleus of counter-revolution. At this last expression there was a fresh burst of laughter. He added, that the secret conduct of the committees belied the public language of the addresses of the convention; that, in such a state of things, he had good reason to speak of the necessary awakening of the patriots, for it is the sleeping of men upon the subject of their rights that leads them on to slavery.

Some cheering from the Mountain was heard in favour of Billaud; but a certain portion of the galleries and of the assembly burst forth into greater peals of laughter, and seemed only to demonstrate that insulting pity that prostrate power is apt to call forth while it is stammering forth empty words in its justification. Tallien hastened to succeed Billaud, and to repel the charges against him. "It is high time," said he, "to reply to those men who would fain turn the hands of the people against the convention." "Nobody desires that," cried some voices in the hall. "Yes, yes," rejoined others, "there are those who wish to turn the hands of the people against the convention." "It is those men," continued Tallien, "who are alarmed at seeing the sword suspended over the heads of the guilty, at seeing light thrown upon all the departments of the administration, the vengeance of the law ready to light upon assassins; it is those men who are now bestirring themselves, who pretend that the people ought to awaken, who strive to mislead the patriots by persuading them that they are all compromised; and finally, who hope, by favour of a general commotion, to prevent the prosecution of those who approve of or else abet Carrier." Universal applause interrupted Tallien. Billaud, who was by no means anxious to be deemed an accessory of Carrier, cried out from his place, "I declare that I have never approved the conduct of Carrier." No attention was paid to this protest of Billaud's. Tallien was applauded, and thus resumed: "It is impossible to suffer two rival authorities to exist any longer, or to permit members who are silent here to go away immediately, and to denounce elsewhere all that you have done." "No, no," cried several voices, "let us have no rival authorities to the convention." "It must not," proceeded Tallien, "be allowed that any one should go to any place whatever to pour forth ignominy upon the convention, and upon those of its members to whom it has committed the government. I shall not sum up," added he, "any conclusion at this moment. It is sufficient that this tribune has replied to what has been said in another; it is sufficient that the unanimity of the convention be strongly expressed against the men of blood."

Reiterated cheering showed Tallien plainly enough that the assembly had made up their minds to second any measures that might be proposed against the Jacobins. Bourdon (of the Oise) supported the sentiments of the last speaker, although in many points he differed from his friends, the Thermidorians. Legendre also raised his energetic voice. "Who are they," said he, "that blame our operations!—a handful of men of prey. Look them in the face, you will see that their countenance is covered with a varnish composed of the gall of tyrants." These expressions, which were pointed against the gloomy and atra-bilious countenance of Billaud-Varennes, were loudly applauded. "What have you to complain of," continued Legendre, "you who are incessantly accusing us? Is it because citizens are no longer sent to prison by hundreds? because fifty, sixty, or eighty persons are no longer guillotined every day? Ah! I must confess, in this our pleasure differs from yours, and that our mode of sweeping the prisons is not the same. We have gone over them ourselves; we have made, as far as we could, the distinction between the aristocrats and the patriots; if we have deceived ourselves, our heads are here to answer for it. But while we make reparation for crimes, while we are striving to make you forget that those crimes are your own, why go to a notorious society to denounce us, and to mislead the people, who, fortunately in no great number, betake themselves thither? I move," added Legendre, as he concluded, "that the convention take measures for preventing its members from going and preaching up rebellion at the Jacobins." The convention adopted the motion, and directed the committees to lay those measures before him.

The convention and the Jacobins were thus arrayed against each other; and in this state, when words were exhausted, there was nothing left but to strike a blow. The intention to destroy that celebrated society began to be no longer doubtful; all that was wanting was, that the committees should have the courage to make that proposition. The Jacobins were sensible of this, and complained in all their sittings that there was an evident determination to dissolve them. They likened the existing government to Leopold, to Brunswick, and to Cobourg, who had likewise required their dissolution. One expression in particular, uttered in the tribune, had furnished them with a fertile text for representing themselves as calumniated and attacked. It had been said, that in the intercepted letters a discovery had been made, that the committee of emigrants in Switzerland were on very good terms with the Jacobins of Paris. Had nothing more been said than that the emigrants wished for commotions which should disturb the progress of the government, they would have had good reason for saying so. A letter seized upon the person of an emigrant, stated in fact that it was foolish to expect that the revolution would be overcome by dint of arms, but that its destruction was to be looked for as the effect of its own disorders. But if, on the contrary, people went so far as to suppose that the Jacobins and the emigrants were correspondents, and in combination to attain the same object, they said a thing that was equally absurd and ridiculous, and the Jacobins desired nothing better than to see themselves accused in this fashion. Accordingly, they never ceased, for several days, to declare themselves calumniated; and Duhem, on these several occasions, required that those pretended letters should be read from the tribune.

The agitation in Paris was extreme. Numerous parties, some starting from the Palais Royal, and composed of young men with long tresses and black neckcloths, others from the faubourg Saint-Antoine, and the Rues Saint-Denis and Saint-Martin, and from all the quarters where the Jacobins predominated, met at the Carrousel, in the garden of the Tuileries, on the Place de la Révolution. Some shouted, The contention for ever! Down with the Terrorists and Robespierre's tail! others replied with cries of The convention for ever! The Jacobins for ever! Down with the aristocrats! They had their peculiar songs. The golden age of youth had adopted an air which was called the Reveil du Peuple; the partisans of the Jacobins sang that old air of the revolution rendered famous by so many victories: Allons, enfants de la patrie! They met; they sang their appropriate songs; then set up hostile shouts, and frequently attacked one another with stones and sticks; blood was spilt, and prisoners were taken and delivered by both parties to the committee of general safety. The Jacobins declared that this committee, composed entirely of Thermidorians, released the young men who were handed over to it, and detained none but the patriots.

These scenes lasted for several days together, and at length became so alarming that the committees of government took measures to preserve the public peace, and doubled the guard at all the posts. On the 19th Brumaire (November 9, 1794), the crowds were still more numerous and more considerable than on the preceding days. A party, setting out from the Palais-Royal, and going along the Rue Saint-Honoré, had got to the hall of the Jacobins and surrounded it. The crowd kept continually increasing, all the avenues were choked up, and the Jacobins, who were just then sitting, might fairly consider themselves besieged. Some parties that were favorable to them had shouted, The contention for ever! The Jacobins for ever! which had been replied to by opposite cries. A battle ensued, and as the young men were the stronger, they soon succeeded in dispersing all the hostile parties there assembled. They then surrounded the hall of the club, and broke the windows with stones. Flints of enormous size had already fallen amidst the assembled Jacobins. The latter, enraged, cried out that they wanted to murder them; and taking advantage of the presence of some members of the convention, they declared that the national representation was going to be murdered. The women, who filled their galleries, and who were called the Furies of the Guillotine, wanted to leave, in order to escape the danger; but the young men, who were waiting for them, seized those who endeavoured to make their escape, subjected them to the most indecent treatment, and even cruelly beat some of them. Several had gone back into the hall in a wretched plight, with dishevelled hair, saying that they wanted to murder them. Stones were still showered upon the assembly. The Jacobins then resolved to sally forth and fall upon the assailants. The energetic Duhem, armed with a stick, put himself at the head of one of these sallies, and the result was a tremendous fray in the Rue Saint-Honoré. If on one side or the other their weapons had been destructive, a massacre would certainly have ensued. The Jacobins returned with some prisoners whom they had taken; the young men remaining outside, were threatening that if their comrades were not liberated, they would force themselves into the hall, and take the most signal vengeance upon their adversaries.

This scene had lasted several hours before the government committees had assembled and could give orders. Several messengers sent from the Jacobins had brought word to the committee of general safety that persons were going to murder the deputies who were sitting in that club. The four committees, namely, of public welfare, general safety, legislation, and war, met and resolved to send the night patrol immediately to extricate their colleagues who were compromised in this scene, still more scandalous than perilous.

The night patrol set out, with a member of each committee, for the scene of the conflict. It was then eight o'clock. The members of the committees who were at the head of the patrol did not make them charge the assailants, as the Jacobins desired; neither would they enter the hall, as their colleagues there begged of them to do; they remained outside, exhorting the young men to disperse, and promising to give up their comrades. By degrees they succeeded in dispersing the parties who had congregated there; they next cleared the Jacobins' hall, and sent every body home.

Tranquillity being restored, they returned to their colleagues, and the four committees passed the night in deliberating upon what was next to be done. Some were for suspending the Jacobins, others opposed that measure. Thuriot, in particular, though one of those who had attacked Robespierre on the 9th Thermidor, began to be alarmed at the reaction, and seemed to have a hankering for the Jacobins. The committees separated without settling what was to be done.

In the morning (Brumaire 20) one of the most violent scenes took place in the assembly. Duhem was the first, as it may well be supposed, to maintain that on the preceding evening the patriots had been murdered, and that the committee of general safety had not done its duty. The galleries taking part in the discussion, made a frightful noise, and seemed on the one hand to affirm, and on the other to contest the facts. The disturbers were turned out, and immediately afterwards a multitude of members demanded permission to speak; Bourdon (of the Oise), Rewbell, and Clausel, in support of the committee; Duhem, Duroy, and Bentabolle, in opposition. Each spoke in his turn, gave his own colouring to the facts, and was interrupted by the contradictions of those who had viewed them in a different light. Some had only perceived congregations of people maltreating the patriots; others had only met with similar parties maltreating the young men, and abusing the convention and the committees. Duhem, who could scarcely contain himself in discussions of this nature, cried out that the blows had been directed by the aristocrats who were dining at the house of Cabarus, and who were going a hunting at Raincy. His leave to speak was withheld; and all that remained in evidence after this conflict of contrary assertions was, that the committees, notwithstanding their readiness to meet and to call out the armed force, had not been able to send it to the spot till very late; that when the patrols were at last sent towards the Rue Saint-Honoré, they were not disposed to extricate the Jacobins by force, but had contented themselves by causing the concourse to gradually disperse; in short, had shown a very natural indulgence for those parties who shouted The convention for ever! and in which nobody said that the government was delivered over to the counter-revolutionists. In fact, one could hardly ask more at their hands. To prevent the maltreatment of their enemies, was their duty; but to insist that they should charge with the bayonet on their own friends, that is to say, those young men who daily came in crowds to support them against the revolutionists, was requiring too much. The committees declared to the convention that they had passed the night in discussing the question whether they ought or ought not to suspend the Jacobins. They were asked if they had yet settled any plan; and on their reply that they were not yet agreed, the whole was referred to them, that they might come to some decision, and afterwards submit the same to the assembly.

This day of the 20th was somewhat more tranquil, because there was no meeting at the Jacobins; but on the 21st, the day for their meeting, the crowds reassembled. On both sides they seemed prepared, and it was very evident that they would come to blows in the evening. The four committees immediately met, suspended by an ordinance the sittings of the Jacobins, and ordered the keys of the hall to be brought forthwith to the secretary's office of the committee of general safety.

The order was obeyed, the hall locked up, and the keys carried to the secretary's office. This measure prevented the tumult that was apprehended; the crowds dispersed, and the night was perfectly quiet. Next day, Laignelot came in the name of the four committees, to acquaint the convention with the resolution they had adopted. "We never had any intention to attack the popular societies," said he, "but we have a right to close the doors of those places where factions are predominant, and where civil war is preached up." The convention repeatedly cheered him. A call of the assembly was demanded, and the ordinance was sanctioned almost unanimously, amidst acclamations and shouts of Long live the republic! The convention for ever!

Such was the end of that society whose name had continued to be so celebrated and so odious, and who, like all the assemblies, like all the men who figured one after the other on the stage, nay, like the revolution itself, had the merit and the failings attendant on extreme energy. Placed independent of the convention, open to all new comers, it was the lists whither the young revolutionists who had not yet figured, and who were impatient to show themselves, repaired to try their strength, and to urge on the usually slower progress of those revolutionists who had already attained power. So long as there was need of fresh subjects, fresh talents, fresh lives ready to be sacrificed, the society of the Jacobins had its utility, and furnished such men as the revolution wanted in that terrible and sanguinary struggle. But when the revolution, having arrived at its final term, began to retrograde, it was to the Jacobin club that those ardent spirits to whom it had given birth, and who had survived its violent action, were driven back. This society then became troublesome by its restlessness, and even dangerous by the alarm it diffused. It was then sacrificed by the men who sought to bring back the revolution from the extreme length to which it had been urged, to a just medium of reason, equity, and liberty; and these men, as indeed are most of those who spend their resources in action, blinded by their expectations, conceived that they could retain in that desirable state of indocility. They certainly acted reasonably in desiring to return to moderation, and the Jacobins were right in telling them that they were running into counter-revolution. Revolutions being similar to a pendulum violently agitated, and running into opposite extremes, always afford ground for predicating their excess; but it is fortunate that political societies, after violently oscillating in contrary directions, subside at length into an equable and justly limited movement. But before they arrive at that happy determination, what a length of time has to elapse! what calamities! what bloodshed necessarily occur! Our precursors, the English, had to undergo Cromwell and the two Stuarts.

The dispersed Jacobins were not the men to play the part of recluses, and to renounce political agitation. Some sheltered themselves at the electoral club, which, driven from the Evêché by the committees, held its meetings in one of the halls of the Museum. Others went to the popular society of the section of the Quinze-Vingts in the faubourg Saint-Antoine. There the most prominent and the most decided men of the Faubourg met. Thither the Jacobins repaired in a body on the 24th Brumaire, saying, "Brave citizens of the faubourg Antoine! you who are the only supporters of the people, you see the unfortunate Jacobins under persecution. We apply to be admitted into your society. We have said to one another, Let us go to the faubourg Antoine, no one can attack us there; united we shall strike surer blows, to preserve the people and the convention from slavery." They were all indiscriminately admitted, and allowed themselves the utterance of the most violent and the most dangerous language, and several times read this article of the declaration of rights: When the government violates the rights of the people, insurrection is the most sacred of the rights, and one of the most indispensable duties of the people.

The committees, who had tried their strength, and felt themselves in perfect vigour, did not consider it necessary to pursue the Jacobins into their asylum, but took no notice of their blustering language, holding themselves in readiness to act at the first signal, should their acts appear commensurate with their words.

The greater part of the sections of Paris took courage, and expelled from their body the Terrorists, as they were called, who then retired to the quarter of the Temple, and in the direction of the Faubourgs Saint-Antoine and Saint-Marceau. Delivered from this opposition, they prepared numerous addresses for the purpose of congratulating the convention on the energy which it had recently displayed against the accomplices of Robespierre. Similar addresses came in from almost every town; and the convention, thus borne along in the direction which it had lately taken, engaged in it still further. The seventy-three, over and over again called for, were more than ever demanded with great outcries every day by the members of the centre and of the right side, who were anxious to reinforce themselves with seventy-three voices, and, above all, to insure the freedom of the vote by recalling their colleagues. The seventy-three were at length released and re-instated; the convention, without explaining its sentiments concerning the events of the 31st of May, declared that it was very possible to have thought otherwise than the majority in respect of that subject, without being guilty on that account. They entered in a body, with old Dussaulx at their head. He acted as their prolocutor, and declared that in resuming their seats by their colleagues, they laid aside all resentment, and were solely possessed with the desire of promoting the commonweal. This step taken, it was too late to stop. Louvet, Lanjuinais, Henri Larivière, Douleat, and Isnard, together with all the Girondists who had escaped the proscription, as also many of them concealed in cellars, wrote and demanded their re-instatement. On this subject a scene of violence took place. The Thermidorians, alarmed at the rapidity of the re-action, stopped short and restrained the right side, who, conceiving that it needed their assistance, durst not displease them, and ceased to persevere. It was decreed that the outlawed deputies should not be further prosecuted, but that they should not return into the body of the assembly.

The same spirit which caused the absolution of some, necessarily induced the condemnation of others. An old deputy, named Raffron, exclaimed that it was high time to prosecute every guilty person, and to show France that the convention took no part with murderers; he moved that Lebon and David should be immediately brought to trial, they being both of them in custody. What had occurred in the south, and especially at Bedouin (Vaucluse), having become known, a report and an act of accusation were called for against Maignet. A multitude of voices insisted on the trial of Fouquier-Tinville, and that depositions should be taken against the former minister at war, Bouchotte, the man who had made the war offices so accessible to the Jacobins. The same motion was made against the ex-mayor, Pache, — an accomplice, it was alleged, of the Hebertists, and saved by Robespierre. Amidst this torrent of attacks upon the revolutionary leaders, the three principal leaders, who had been long defended, could not but at last yield to their fate. Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, being again accused, and in a formal manner by Legendre, could not evade the common lot. The committees could not dispense receiving the denunciation, and stating their opinion. Lecointre, who, when he made his former accusation, was declared a calumniator, now gave notice that he had printed the documents with which he was not provided on the former occasion; they were referred to the committees. The latter, hurried along by the force of opinion, durst not resist, and declared that there was ground for investigation in the case of Collot, Billaud, and Barrère, but not against Vadier, Vouland, Amar, and David.

The process against Carrier, which moved slowly in the eyes of a public that ill-disguised the spirit of re-action by which it was influenced, closed at last on the 26th Frimaire (16th December). Carrier and two members of the revolutionary committee of Nantes, Pinel and Grande-Maison, were condemned to death as agents and accessories of the system of terror; the others were acquitted; their participations in the drownings (noyades) being excused on the ground of obedience to their superiors. Carrier, who persisted in asserting that the entire revolution, as well as those who had effected, permitted, and directed it, were quite as guilty as himself, was drawn to the scaffold, he exhibited resignation at the fatal moment, and met his death with composure and courage. In proof of the blind excitement of civil wars, many thousands of characters were cited of Cato, which demonstrated that previous to his mission to Nantes, he was by no means of a blood-thirsty disposition. The revolutionists at the very time that they condemned his conduct, were alarmed at his fate; they could not conceal from themselves that this execution was the commencement of those bloody reprisals that the counter-revolution had in store for them. Besides the prosecutions directed against the representatives, as members of the old committees, as sent on mission, other laws lately passed proved that vengeance was about to descend lower, and that the infamy of the part they played would not save them. A decree required all those who had filled any office whatever, or had dealt with the public money, to pass an account of their administration. Now, as all the members of the revolutionary committees and of the municipalities, had instituted chests with the produce of the assessed taxes, the church plate, and the revolutionary taxes, for the purpose of organizing the first battalions of volunteers, paying the revolutionary armies, defraying the expenses of conveyance, management of the police—in short, for meeting a thousand expenses of the same nature, it was evident that every individual functionary during the terror, was about to be rendered amenable to prosecution.

To these well-founded apprehensions were added very alarming reports. Peace with Holland, Prussia, the Empire, Spain, and even La Vendée was talked of, and it was confidently asserted that the terms of this peace would be ruinous to the revolutionary party.

THE French armies, masters of the whole left bank of the Rhine, and ready to debouch on the right bank, were threatening Holland and Germany. Were they to advance or to go into cantonments? Such was the question that presented itself.

Notwithstanding their triumphs, and their abode in Belgium, so wealthy a place, they were in a state of the greatest destitution. The country which they occupied, overrun for three years past by innumerable legions, was completely exhausted. To the evils of war were added those of the French administration, which had introduced in its train the assignats, the maximum, and the requisitions. Provisional municipalities, eight subordinate administrations, and a central administration established at Brussels, governed the country till its ultimate disposal was decided. Twenty-five millions had been wrung from the clergy, the abbey, the nobles, and the corporate bodies. The assignats had been put into forced circulation; the prices at Lille had served to settle the maximum throughout all Belgium. Articles of consumption and commodities serviceable for the armies had been laid under requisition. These measures had not put an end to the death. The merchants and farmers concealed all they possessed, and the officer, like the common soldier, was in want of every thing.

Being levied en masse in the preceding year, and hastily conveyed to Hondtschoote, Watignies, and Landau, the entire army had received nothing from the administration save powder and shot. For a long time the army had not encamped under tents, but bivouached under trees, notwithstanding the commencement of an already severe winter. Many of the soldiers, in want of shoes, fastened wisps of straw about their feet, or wrapped themselves in mats instead of great coats. The officers, paid in assignats, found their appointments reduced sometimes to eight or ten practicable francs a month; those who received any assistance from their families could hardly avail themselves of it, as every thing was purveyed beforehand by the French administration. They were placed precisely upon the same footing as the common soldier, marching on foot, carrying the knapsack at their back, eating the ammunition bread, and living by the chances of war.

The administration appeared to be exhausted by the efforts which it had made to raise and arm twelve hundred thousand men. The new organization of the supreme power, inefficient and divided, was not calculated to restore it to the requisite nerve and activity. Thus every thing acquired that the army should go into winter quarters, and there receive the reward of its victories and its military virtues in rest and plentiful accommodation.

Meanwhile, we were before the fortress of Nimègue, which, seated on the Wahl (the name given to the Rhine near its mouth), commanded both sides, and might serve as a tête du pont for the enemy to debouch from the next campaign on the left bank. It was therefore important to gain possession of that place before wintering, but to attack it was a very difficult affair. The English army, ranged on the right bank, was encamped there to the number of thirty-eight thousand men, a bridge of boats enabled the army to communicate with the fortress and to re-victual it. Besides its fortifications, Nimeguen had before it an entrenched camp well manned. To render, therefore, the investment complete, it would have been necessary to have promptly brought upon the right bank an army that would have had to run the risks of the passage and of a battle, and which in case of defeat would have no means of retreat left for it. There was no alternative but to act on the left bank, and they would be obliged to attack the intrenched camp, without any great hope of success.

Notwithstanding all this, the French generals were determined to try the effect of one of those brisk and bold attacks which had in so short a time opened to them the gates of Maastricht and Venloo. The allies, aware of the importance of Nimeguen, had met at Andernach to decide upon the means of defending the place. It had been settled that an Austrian regiment under general Weinek should be taken into English pay, and should form the left of the duke of York for the defence of Holland, while the duke, with his English and Hmoverius, was to remain on the right bank in front of the bridge of Nimeguen, and thus recruit the forces of the place; general Weinek was to attempt, on the side of Wesel, a considerable distance above Nimeguen, a singular movement, which experienced officers have deemed one of the most absurd that the allied powers ever devised during all these campaigns. This regiment, taking advantage of an island formed by the Rhine, near Buderich, was to cross to the right bank, and to attack a point between the army of the Sambre and Meuse and that of the North. Thus twenty thousand men were to be hurried across a great river, between two victorious armies, each eighty or one hundred thousand strong, to see what effect would be produced upon them. reinforcements were to be made as circumstances might require. It may well be conceived that this movement, executed with the united armies of the allies, might have been grand and decisive, but effected with twenty thousand men, it would be but a puerile attempt, and probably a disastrous one to the regiment that had to undertake it.

Nevertheless, imagining that they could save Nimeguen by these means, the allies on one hand made Weinek's regiment advance towards Buderich, and on the other caused silhes to be made by the garrison of Nimeguen. The French repelled the allies, and, as at Maastricht and Venloo, opened the trenches much closer to the fortress than was ever yet experienced in war. A fortunate incident accelerated their operations. The two extremities of the semicircle which they described about Nimeguen terminated at the Wahl, they attempted to fire from these extremities at the bridge. Some of their projectiles reached several pontoons, and endangered the communications of the garrison with the English army. The English who were in the fortress, surprised at this unforeseen event, replaced the pontoons, and hastened to rejoin the main body of their army on the other bank, leaving the garrison composed of three thousand Dutch to itself. No sooner were the republicans aware of the evacuation than they increased their fire. The governor, in alarm, acquainted the Prince of Orange with his situation, and obtained permission to refuse so soon as he should deem the occasion sufficiently urgent. He had hardly received this authority before he crossed over himself. The garrison got confused. One party laid down their arms, another party, attempting to save themselves by a flying bridge, were stopped by the French, who cut the cables, and they were stranded upon an island, where the latter party were made prisoners.

On the 18th Brumaire (November 8) the French entered Nimeguen, and found themselves masters of that important fortress, solely on account of their temerity, and the terror inspired by their arms. Meanwhile the Austrians, commanded by Weinek, had attempted to debouch from Wesel, but the impetuous Vandamme, rushing upon them at the very moment they set foot on the other side of the Rhine, had driven them on the right bank. And it was fortunate for them that they had not proceeded, for they would have run the risk of being destroyed had they advanced further.

The time for going into entrenchments had at last arrived, since we were now masters of all the important points on the Rhine. Certain it is that to conquer Holland, to secure in this manner the navigation of three great rivers, the Scheldt, the Meuse, and the Rhine, to deprive England of her most powerful naval ally, to threaten Germany on her flanks, to interrupt the communications of our enemies on the continent with those at sea, or at least to oblige them to make the long circuit by Hamburg, in short, to open for ourselves the richest country in the world, and the most desirable for us in the state of our commerce, then was, was indeed a termination worthy of exciting the ambition of our government and our armies, but how dare to attempt the conquest of Holland, almost impossible at any time, but particularly impracticable in the rainy season? Situated at the mouths of several rivers, Holland consists of some strips of land thrown up between the currents of those rivers and the sea. Its soil, every where lower than the bed of the waters, is unceasingly threatened by the ocean, the Rhine, the Meuse, the Scheldt, and is intersected moreover by small detached arms of rivers, and by a multitude of artificial canals. These lowlands, thus exposed, are covered with gardens, manufacturing towns, and arsenals. At every step that an army wishes to make there, it finds either broad streams, whose banks are so many dikes bristling with cannon, or arms of rivers or canals, every one of them defended by the art of fortification, or fortresses which are the strongest in Europe. Those grand manœuvres, which frequently set at naught mere theoretical defence by rendering sieges useless, are therefore impracticable in a country intersected and defended by innumerable lines. Should, however, an army contrive to overcome so many obstacles and to advance into Holland, its inhabitants, by an act of heroism of which they furnished an example in the time of Louis XIV, have but to cut their dikes, in order to swallow up, together with their country, the army that has been so rash to push its way thither. They can still have recourse to their shipping, with which they can, like the Athenians of old, fly with their most valuable property, and wait for better times, or go to India, and there inhabit the vast empire which belongs to them. All these difficulties are greatly increased during the season of inundations, and a maritime alliance, such as that of England, renders these obstacles insurmountable.

It is true that the spirit of independence which possessed the Dutch at this period, their hatred of the stadtholdership, their aversion to England and Prussia, the knowledge they had acquired of their true interests, their resentment on account of the revolution so unfortunately stifled in 1787, gave the French armies the certainty of being ardently desired. It was to be assumed that the Dutch would not permit that the dikes should be cut and the country ruined for a cause which they detested. But the army of the prince of Orange and that of the duke of York still kept them under, and these being in junction, were sufficient to prevent the passage of the numberless lines which it would be necessary to carry against them. If then a surprise was rash in the time of Dumouriez, it was almost insane at the end of 1794.

Nevertheless, the committee of public welfare, instigated by the Dutch refugees, thought seriously of pushing a point beyond the Wahl. Pichegru, almost as badly off as his soldiers, who were covered with itch and vermin, had gone to Brussels to get cured of a cutaneous disease. Moreau and Regnier had succeeded him; both of them were in favour of rest and winter quarters. General Daendels, a Dutch refugee and a gallant officer, earnestly recommended a preliminary attempt on the isle of Bommel, but we were not to persevere if the attack should fail. The Meuse and the Wahl, running parallel with the sea, unite for a short space just below Nimègue, again separate, and once more unite at Wondrichem, a little above Goreum. The tract comprehended between their two arms constitutes what is called the isle of Bommel. Contrary to the opinion of Moreau and Regnier, an attack was attempted upon that island at three different points; it was not successful, and was immediately abandoned with the utmost alacrity, especially on the part of Daendels, who cheerfully acknowledged the impossibility so soon as he discovered it.

Then, that is about the middle of Frimaire (the beginning of December), winter quarters were assigned to the army of which it had so much need; a party of cantonments were stationed around Breda for the purpose of formally blockading it. This fortress, as well as the fortress of Grave, still held out; but the interruption of the communications during the winter would certainly compel them to surrender.

It was in this position that the army expected to await the termination of the season; and certainly the army had done enough to be proud of her glory and her services. But an almost miraculous incident had new prospects in store for her; the frost, already very severe, soon increased to such a degree as to encourage a hope, that in all probability the great rivers would be frozen over. Pichegru left Brussels without perfecting his cure, that he might be ready to seize the first opportunity for new conquests, should the season afford him the opportunity. In point of fact, the winter became more and more severe, and was the most rigorous that had been recently known. The Meuse and the Wahl were already covered with floating ice, and the ice along their banks was set. On the 3rd Nivôse (December 23), the Meuse was entirely frozen, and hard enough to bear cannon. General Walmoden, to whom the duke of York had left the command on leaving for England, and whom he had thus condemned to meet with nought else than disasters, found himself in the most difficult position. The Meuse being frozen over, his front would be exposed; and the Wahl being covered with the floating ice, actually threatening to carry away all the bridges, his retreat was endangered. He soon learned that the bridge of Arnheim had been recently swept away; he then lost no time in filing off his baggage and his heavy cavalry to the rear, and he himself retreated upon Deventer, towards the banks of the Yssel. Pichegru, taking advantage of the opportunity that fortune presented him, to surmount obstacles under ordinary circumstances invincible, prepared to cross the Meuse on the ice. He made arrangements for his passage at three points and for seizing the isle of Bommel, while the division that was blockading Breda should attack the lines which surrounded that place. Those brave Frenchmen, exposed almost without clothes to the severest winter known for a century previous, marching in shoes of which nothing but the upper-leather remained, immediately quitted their quarters, and cheerfully renounced that rest which they had begun to enjoy. On the 8th Nivôse (December 28), in a frost of 17°, they showed themselves at three points, at Crèvecoeur, Empel, and fort Saint-Andre; they crossed the ice with their artillery, surprised the Dutch, almost torpid with cold, and completely defeated them. While they were making themselves masters of the isle of Bommel, that particular division which was besieging Breda attacked its lines and carried them. The Dutch, assailed on all points, retired in confusion, some towards the head-quarters of the prince of Orange, who kept still at Goreum, the others to Thiel. In the confusion of their retreat they never thought of defending the pass of the Wahl, which was not quite frozen over. Pichegru, master of the isle of Bommel, into which he had made his way by passing over the frozen Meuse, crossed the Wahl at different points, but durst not venture beyond the river, the ice not being strong enough to bear the cannon. In this situation, the state of Holland would be desperate if the frost were to continue, and every thing seemed to point to its continuance. The prince of Orange with his Dutchmen out of spirits at Goreum, and Walmoden with his English in full retreat upon Deventer, could not make head against a formidable conqueror, who was far superior to them in strength, and who had so recently broken the centre of their line. Their political was not less alarming than their military situation. The Dutch, full of hope and joy on seeing the French approach, began to agitate. The Orange party was by far too weak to control the republican party. In every quarter, the enemies of the stadtholder's authority reproached it with having annihilated the liberties of the country, of having imprisoned or banished the best and the most generous patriots, and above all, with having sacrificed Holland to England, by dragging her into an alliance inconsistent with all her interests commercial and naval.

They secretly assembled in revolutionary committees, ready to rise at the first signal, to displace the authorities and appoint others. The province of Friesland, whose states were assembled, ventured to declare that she was desirous of separating herself from the stadtholder; the citizens of Amsterdam presented a petition to the authorities of the province, in which they declared that they were ready to oppose any preparation for defence, and that they would not at any rate suffer the dikes to be cut. In this desperate situation the stadtholder thought of negotiating, and sent envoys to Pichegru's head-quarters to demand a truce, and to offer, as conditions of peace, neutrality and an indemnification for the expenses of the war. The French general and the representatives refused the truce; and so far as concerned the offers of peace, they referred them immediately to the committee of public welfare. Already had Spain, threatened by Dugommier, whom we left descending from the Pyrenees, and by Moreau, who, master of Guipuscoa, was advancing upon Pampeluna, made proposals of accommodation. The representatives sent into La Vendée, to ascertain whether a pacification were possible, had replied affirmatively, and recommended a decree of amnesty. How close soever a government may be, negotiations of this nature are always sure to transpire: they get wind even when the ministers are absolute and irremovable; how then should they continue private with committees renewable by one fourth every month? It was publicly known that Holland and Spain had offered terms; it was added that Prussia, recovered from her delusions, and acknowledging the fault she had committed in allying herself with the house of Austria, demanded a treaty; it was known through every newspaper in Europe that at the diet of Ratisbon several states of the empire, weary of a war that concerned them but little, had insisted on the opening of a negotiation: every thing therefore predisposed people's minds to peace, and in the same manner as they had come back from the ideas of revolutionary terror to sentiments of mercy, they exhibited a transition from ideas of war to those of a general reconciliation with Europe. They drew inferences from the most unimportant facts, in order to found conjectures upon them. The unfortunate children of Louis XVI., deprived of all their relatives, and separated from one another in the prison of the Temple, had seen their situation somewhat ameliorated since the 9th Thermidor. The shoemaker Simon, to whose care the young prince was committed, had perished as an accomplice of Robespierre. Three keepers were appointed in his stead, each of whom took his turn for a day, and who treated the young prince with greater humanity. From these changes made at the Temple important inferences were drawn. The plan under consideration for withdrawing the assignats also gave occasion for abundance of conjectures. The royalists, who began already to show themselves, and whose number was increased by those irresolute persons who always run from a party that begins to lose its importance, spitefully asserted that they were going to make peace. No longer having it in their power to say to the republicans, "Your armies will be beaten," which had been too often repeated without its being verified, and which would now have appeared too silly;

they said, "They are going to stop them in the midst of their victories; peace is signed, what then? They will no longer have the Rhine; the condition of peace will be the restoration of Louis XVII. to the throne, the return of the emigrants, the abolition of assignats, and the restitution of the national property." It is easy to conceive how such rumours must have irritated the patriots. Already terrified at the prosecutions directed against them, they witnessed with despair the object which they had been pursuing with such toil compromised by the government. "What do you mean to do with young Capet?" said they. "What are you going to do with the assignats? Have our armies shed so much of their blood that they are now to be stopped in the midst of their victories? Shall they not enjoy the satisfaction of giving to their country the line of the Rhine and the Alps? Europe has desired the dismemberment of France; the just reprisals of victorious France upon Europe ought to be, to subdue those provinces that render her territory perfect. What are they going to do for La Vendée? Are they going to pardon rebels when they sacrifice patriots?" "It were much better," exclaimed a deputy to the Mountain, in a transport of indignation, "to be Charette than a member of the convention!"

One may conceive how much these subjects of division, added to those which domestic policy had hitherto afforded, must have agitated men's minds. The committee of public welfare, finding itself pressed between the two parties, felt itself called upon to explain. The committee declared, therefore, on two different occasions, first through the medium of Carnot, secondly by the agency of Merlin (of Douai), that the armies had received orders to prosecute their triumphs, and were not to listen to any proposals of peace till they were in the heart of the enemy's capitals.

In point of fact, the negotiations of Holland appeared to the committee to have been too long withheld to be now accepted, and the committee did not think it proper to consent to negotiate when on the point of becoming master of the country. To overthrow the power of the stadtholder, and to restore the Dutch republic, seemed to the committee an act worthy of the French republic. The republic certainly exposed herself to the chance of seeing all the colonies of Holland, and even part of her navy, fall a prey to the English, who would declare that they took possession of them in the name of the stadtholder; but political considerations of course had the greatest weight. France could not avoid overthrowing the stadtholdership; this conquest of Holland would marvellously add to her victories, would intimidate Europe still more, and in particular would jeopardise the flanks of Prussia, compel that power to treat immediately, and, above all, impart confidence to the French patriots. In consequence, Pichegru received orders not to stop. Prussia and the empire had not yet made any overture, so there was no answer to give them. As for Spain, who promised to acknowledge the republic and to satisfy its indemnities, on condition of its erecting a little state near the Pyrenees for Louis XVII., she was listened to with scorn and indignation, and orders were issued to the two French generals to advance without delay. As for La Vendée, a decree of amnesty was passed. Its effect was, that all the rebels, without distinction of rank, who should lay down their arms within the space of one month, should not be prosecuted for their treasonable practices.

General Canclaux, removed on account of his moderation, was replaced at the head of the army of the West, which comprised La Vendée. Young Hoche, who had already the command of the army of the coasts of Brest, had the additional appointment of the army of the coasts of Cherbourg. No persons were better able than these two generals to pacify the country by tempering prudence with energy.

Pichegru, who had received orders to prosecute his victorious career, waited till the surface of the Wahl should be entirely set. Our army proceeded along the river, being extended upon its banks towards Millingen, Nimeguen, and all along the isle of Bommel, of which we were now masters. Walmoden, observing that Pichegru had left but a few advanced posts on the right bank towards Bommel, drove them back, and commenced a movement on the offensive. He proposed to the prince of Orange to join him, in order to form with their united armies an imposing mass, that could by means of a battle arrest the progress of an enemy who could no longer be restrained by the line of the rivers. The prince of Orange could not be prevailed upon to quit Gorcum, lest the road to Amsterdam should be left exposed. Walmoden then resolved to put himself on his line of retreat, which he had traced beforehand from the Wahl to the Linge, from the Linge to the Leek, and from the Leek to the Yssel, through Thiel, Arnheim, and Deventer.

While the republicans were waiting with the most lively impatience for the freezing of the river, the fortress of Grave, defended with heroic courage by Debus, the commandant, surrendered when nearly laid in ashes. This was the principal of the fortresses which the Dutch possessed beyond the Meuse, and the only one that had not yielded to the ascendancy of our arms. The French entered it on the 9th Nivôse (December 29). At length, on the 19th Nivôse (January 8, 1795), the Wahl was frozen into a firm mass. Souham's division crossed it in the direction of Bommel; Dewinter's brigade, a detachment from Macdonald's regiment, crossed near Thiel. At Nimeguen and above, the passage was not so easy, because the Wahl was not quite frozen over. Nevertheless, on the 21st Nivôse (January 10), the right of the French crossed it above Nimeguen, and Macdonald, supported thereby, passed over at Nimeguen itself in boats. On perceiving this general movement, Walmoden's army retired. Nothing but a battle could have saved his army; but in the state of division and discouragement that prevailed among the allies, a battle perhaps could only have led to some unfortunate termination. Walmoden shifted from front to rear, proceeding upon the line of the Yssel, so as to reach Hanover by the provinces of the main land. In conformity with the plan of retreat which he had laid down for himself, he thus abandoned the provinces of Utrecht and Gueldres to the French. The prince of Orange remained near the sea, namely, at Gorcum. Having no longer any hope, he left his army, repaired to the states assembled at the Hague, declared to them that he had done all in his power for the defence of the country, and that nothing more remained for him to perform. He exhorted the representatives not to make any further resistance to the conqueror, lest that might be the harbinger of still greater evils.

From that moment, the victorious French had only to overrun like a torrent all Holland. On the 28th Nivôse (January 17), Salm's brigade entered Utrecht, as did general Vandamme at Arnheim. The states of Holland decided that no further defence should be offered against the French, and that commissioners should be sent to open for them such places as they deemed necessary for their security. On every side, the secret committees which had been formed manifested their existence, drove out the established authorities, and spontaneously appointed new ones. The French were received with open arms and as liberators, and the Dutch brought them such provisions and clothing as they needed. At Amsterdam, where they had not yet made an entry, but where they were impatiently expected, the greatest ferment prevailed. The citizens, exasperated against the Orange party, wanted the garrison to leave the city, the regency to resign its authority, and the restoration of their arms to the citizens. Pichegru, who was approaching, sent an aid-de-camp to exhort the municipal authorities to preserve peace and prevent disorder. On the 1st Pluviôse (January 20) Pichegru, accompanied by the representatives Lacote, Bellegarde, and Joubert, made his entry into Amsterdam. The inhabitants hastened forth to meet him, carrying in triumph the persecuted patriots, and shouting, The French republic for ever! Pichegru for ever! Liberty for ever! They admired those brave men, who, half naked, had defied such a winter and gained such victories. The French soldiers furnished on this occasion the highest example of order and discipline. Destitute of provisions and clothing, exposed to frost and snow, in the heart of one of the wealthiest capitals of Europe, they waited for several hours around their piled arms, till the magistrates had provided for their wants and given them their billets. As the republicans entered on one side, the Orange party and French emigrants fled on the other. The sea was covered with vessels, laden with fugitives and with property of every description.

On the same day, the 1st Pluviôse, Bonnaud's division, which had the day before taken possession of Gertruydenberg, crossed the frozen Biesbos, and entered the town of Dordrecht, where there were found six hundred pieces of cannon, ten thousand muskets, and magazines of provisions and ammunition for an army of thirty thousand men. This division then passed through Rotterdam, on its way to the Hague, where the states were sitting. Thus the right towards the Yssel, the centre towards Amsterdam, and the left towards the Hague, successively took possession of all the provinces. The marvellous itself came to assist this operation of the war, in itself so extremely wondrous. Part of the Dutch fleet was at anchor near the Texel. Pichegru, who did not intend to give it time to get clear of the ice and to set sail for England, sent some divisions of cavalry, and several batteries of light artillery, towards north Holland. The Zuider-Zee was frozen; our squadrons galloped across those plains of ice, and our hussars and horse-artillery summoned the ships, immovably fixed, as they would have done a fortress, to surrender. The Dutch ships surrendered to these assailants of a nature so new to them.

On the left there was nothing else to do than to gain possession of the province of Zealand, which is composed of the islands situated at the mouths of the Scheldt and the Meuse; and on the right the provinces of Overijssel, Drenthe, Friesland, and Groningen, which connect Holland with Hanover. The province of Zealand, strong in her inaccessible position, proposed terms of capitulation in rather a high style, and in these it stipulated not to receive garrisons into her principal fortresses, to be exempt from the levy of contributions, not to receive assignats in payment, to retain her shipping and her property public and private, in a word, for her exemption from all the inconveniences of war. She also required that the French emigrants should be allowed to retire safe and sound. The representatives acquiesced in some of the articles of the capitulation, but entered into no engagement respecting others, saying they must refer them to the committee of public welfare, and without further explanation they entered upon the province, well enough satisfied that they had avoided the dangers of an attack by main force, and to have preserved the squadron, which in all probability might have been delivered up to England. During these things taking place on the left, the right crossing the Yssel drove the English before it, and forced them to retreat beyond the Ems. The provinces of Friesland, Drenthe, and Groningen found themselves thus overmastered, as the seven united provinces were by the victorious arms of the republic.

This conquest, much rather attributable to the season, to the admirable perseverance of our soldiers, and to their happy disposition for withstanding all hardships, than to the abilities of our generals, excited an astonishment in Europe mingled with terror, and in France unbounded enthusiasm. Carnot, having directed the operations of the armies during the campaign of the Netherlands, was the first and the true originator of this success. Pichegru, and still more Jourdan, had effectively seconded his plans during that sanguinary series of engagements. But from the time that the army had passed from Belgium into Holland, every thing was due to the soldiers and the weather. Nevertheless Pichegru, as commander-in-chief of that army, reaped all the glory of that wonderful conquest; and his name, borne on the wings of renown, circulated throughout all Europe as that of the greatest general of France. It was not sufficient to have conquered Holland; the French had still to conduct themselves there with prudence and policy. In the first place, it was of importance that they should not trample upon the country, lest they should alienate the inhabitants. After taking care of that, they had next to impart a political bias to Holland, and on this point they soon found themselves between two contrary opinions. Some were desirous that this conquest should be rendered available to the cause of liberty by revolutionizing Holland; others desired that too strong a spirit of proselytism should not be developed, lest it should again alarm Europe, now on the point of reconciling herself with France.

The first care of the representatives was to publish a proclamation, in which they declared that all private property should be inviolate, excepting, however, that of the stadtholder; that the latter being the only enemy of the French republic, his property belonged to the conquerors as an indemnification for the expenses of the war; that the French entered as friends of the Batavian nation, not to impose upon it any religion or any form of government whatever, but to deliver it from its oppressors, and to confer on it the means of expressing its desires. This proclamation, followed up by corresponding acts, produced a most favourable impression. The authorities were every where renewed under the French influence. An exclusion took place in respect of several members, who had been introduced into the states by the stadtholder's influence alone, and they elected as president, the patriot Peter Paulus, minister of the navy before the overthrow of the republican party in 1787, a distinguished man, and strongly attached to his country. This assembly abolished the stadtholdership for ever, and proclaimed the sovereignty of the people. She waited on the representatives to acquaint them with what she had done, and to pay them homage, as it were, by thus communicating her resolution. She then undertook the formation of a constitution, and committed the affairs of the country to a provisional administration. Out of the eighty or ninety ships of war composing the military marine of Holland, fifty were left in the ports and preserved for the Batavian republic; the others had been seized by the English. The Dutch army, disbanded from the time of the departure of the prince of Orange, was to be placed upon a new footing, and under the command of general Daendels. As for the famous bank of Amsterdam, the mystery of its chest was at length laid open. Had this bank continued to be a bank of deposit, or had it become a discount or loan bank, either to the East India Company, or to the government, or to the provinces? Such was the question which had long been asked, and which exceedingly diminished the credit of that celebrated bank. It was ascertained that it had lent to the amount of eight or ten millions of florins on bonds of the East India company, the chamber of loans, the province of Friesland, and the city of Amsterdam. This was a violation of the terms of its constitution. It was alleged, however, that there was no deficit, because these obligations represented certain securities. But it was requisite that the company, the chamber of loans, and the government, should be able to pay, in order that the obligations due by the bank should not cause a deficit.

While the Dutch were considering as to the regulation of the state of their country, it was necessary to provide for the wants of the French army, entirely destitute. The representatives made a requisition to the provincial government for cloth, shoes, clothing of all kinds, provisions, and ammunition, which it undertook to supply. This requisition, without being excessive, was sufficient to equip and subsist the army. The Dutch government invited each town to take their part in the supply of this requisition, telling them, and with good reason, that they ought to lose no time in satisfying a generous conqueror, who asked for, instead of taking what he wanted, and who demanded no more than what his necessities absolutely required. The towns exhibited the utmost willingness to comply, and the articles laid under requisition were punctually supplied. An arrangement was then made for the circulation of assignats. The soldiers receiving then pay only in paper, it was requisite that this paper should have the currency of money, so as they should be able to pay it in return for what they wanted. The Dutch government came to a full understanding on this head. The shopkeepers and the petty dealers were obliged to take the assignats of the French soldiers at the rate of nine sous per franc; they were not to sell to the amount of more than ten francs to any one soldier; they were then, at the end of every week, to appear before the municipalities, who would cancel the assignats at the rate at which they had been taken. Owing to these different arrangements, the army, which had been so long enduring privations, found itself at length in abundance, and began to taste the fruits of its victories.

Our triumphs, so surprising in Holland, were not less brilliant in Spain. There, thanks to the climate, the operations had been continued without difficulty. Dugommier, gutting the high Pyrenees, had advanced in face of the enemy's line, and had attacked on three points the long chain of positions taken by general La Union. The brave Dugommier had been killed by a cannon ball in the attack of the centre. The left had not been successful, but the right, owing to the intrepidity and energy of Augereau, had been completely victorious. The command had been given to Perrignon, who had recommended the attack on the 30th Brumaire (November 20th), and gained a signal victory. The enemy had fled in disorder, and left us the entrenched camp of Figueras. The Spaniards being seized with panic terror, the commandant of Figueras had opened the gates to us on the 9th Frimaire, and we had thus entered one of the strongest fortresses in Europe. Such was our position in Catalonia. Towards the western Pyrenees, we had taken Fontarabia, Saint-Sebastian, and Tolosa, and we occupied the whole province of Guipuscoa. Moncey, who had succeeded general Muller, had crossed the mountains and had advanced up to the gates of Pampeluna. However, considering his position much too hazardous, he had retraced his steps, and supported by stronger positions, he awaited the return of the fine weather for pushing his way into Castille.

The winter, therefore, had not been able to impede the progress of that memorable campaign, and it had now closed in the middle of the season of frost and snow, in Pluviose, that is, in January and February. If the glorious campaign of 1793 had saved us from invasion by the un-blockading of Dunkirk, Maubeuge, and Landau, the campaign of 1794 had recently opened a career of conquest by giving us Belgium, Holland, the country comprised between the Meuse and the Rhine, the Palatinate, the line of the Upper Alps, the line of the Pyrenees, and several fortresses in Catalonia and Biscay. Yet a little, and we shall presently see still greater wonders; but these two campaigns will remain in history as the most national, the most legitimate, and the most honourable for France.

The allied powers could not withstand so frequent and such rude shocks. The English cabinet, who by the blunders of the duke of York had lost no more than the alliance of the states, and who had recently gained forty or fifty ships of war, upon pretext of restoring them to the stadtholder, and who under the same pretext was about to seize upon the Dutch colonies; the English cabinet was by no means in haste to terminate the war, on the contrary, she was fearful lest it should die a natural death by the dissolution of the alliance; but Prussia, who now perceived the French on the banks of the Rhine and the Elbe, and saw the torrent ready to burst upon her, no longer hesitated. She immediately sent a commissioner to Pieleguin's headquarters to stipulate for a truce, and to promise to open immediately negotiations for peace. The place chosen for these negotiations was Bâle, where the French government had an agent, who had attracted great respect from the Swiss by his intelligence and his moderation. The reason alleged for selecting this place was, that they might there treat with more secrecy and quiet than in Paris itself, where too many passions were still in agitation, and where a multitude of foreign intrigues interlaced one another; but that was not the true motive. While making overtures of peace to that very republic whom they had fully expected to annihilate by a single military movement, Prussia wanted to gloss over the acknowledgment of her defeat, and much rather preferred going in quest of peace to a neutral country than in the heart of Paris. The committee of public welfare, less haughty than its predecessor, and being sensible of the necessity there was for detaching Prussia from the allied powers, consented to invest its agent at Bâle with sufficient powers for treating. Prussia despatched Baron Goltz, and the powers were exchanged at Bâle on the 3d Pluviose, year III. (January 22, 1795.)

The empire was quite as much anxious to withdraw from the coalition as Prussia. The greater part of its members, incapable of furnishing the quintuple contingent and the subsidies voted under the influence of Austria, had suffered themselves to be urged to no purpose, during the whole campaign, to keep their engagements. With the exception of those who had their states compromised beyond the Rhine, and who clearly saw that the republic would not restore them unless upon compulsion, all were desirous of peace. Bavaria, Denmark, Sweden for the duchy of Holstein, the elector of Mentz, and several states, had declared that it was high time to put an end by an acceptable peace to a ruinous war, that the Germanic empire had never had any other object in view than the maintenance of the stipulations of 1648, and had taken up arms only in behalf of such of her states as adjoined Alsace and Lorraine; that she looked to her own preservation, not her aggrandizement; that her intention never had been or ever could be to meddle with the internal government of France; that this pacific declaration must be made sooner or later, to put an end to the evils which afflicted humanity; and that Sweden, the guarantee of the stipulations of 1648, and who had happily remained neutral amidst this general war, could take upon herself the office of mediatrix. The majority of the votes had acceded to this proposal. The elector of Trèves, stripped of his dominions, and the imperial envoy for Bohemia and Austria, were the only persons who declared that it was certainly right to seek for peace, but that such an object was scarcely practicable when the country was without government. At length, on the 25th December, the diet had provisionally published a conclusum inclining to peace, leaving it to be afterwards settled by whom the proposition should be made. The substance of the conclusum was, that, while making preparation for a new campaign, the states ought not the less to make overtures for peace; that doubtless France, touched by the sufferings of humanity, and convinced that there was no intention of interfering in her internal affairs, would consent to conditions honourable to both parties.

Thus, whoever had committed faults thought of repairing them, if it were yet time. Austria, although exhausted by her exertions, had lost too much in losing the Netherlands to think of laying down her arms. Spain had been inclined to withdraw from the contest; but again involved in English intrigues, and engaged by a feeling of false shame to the cause of the French emigration, she durst not yet demand peace.

The same discouragement that possessed the external enemies of the republic also gained ground among her internal enemies. The Vendéans, divided and exhausted, would not have held themselves aloof from conciliation; to have caused them to decide for a peace, they had only to make a discreet proposal, and to make them believe it were sincere. The forces of Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Charette were extremely reduced. It was only by compulsion that they could now make their peasants march. These latter, sick of the carnage, and above all ruined by devastations, would willingly have abandoned this horrible war. Those that remained entirely devoted to the leaders, were some few men of an absolutely military turn, smugglers, deserters, and poachers, who had contracted a desire for fighting and plunder, and who would be disgusted with agricultural labours. But these latter were by no means numerous. These formed the picked regiment which kept constantly together, but was totally incapable of withstanding the republicans. It was not without the greatest difficulty that on days of active service, the peasants could be taken from their fields. Thus the three Vendean leaders had scarcely any forces. Unfortunately for them, they were not even united. We have seen that Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Charette had entered into articles at Jalais, which were nothing else than a postponement of their mutual rivalries. It was not long before Stofflet, at the instigation of the ambitious Abbé Bernier, would have organized his army separately, and have procured it a settled revenue and an administration, in short, every thing that constitutes a properly constituted authority; and with this object in view, he purposed also to make paper money. Charette, jealous of Stofflet, was vehemently opposed to his designs. Seconded by Sapinaud, with whom he had great influence, he called upon Stofflet to relinquish his design, and to appear before the general council instituted by the articles of Jalais. Stofflet had refused to answer. Upon his refusal, Charette declared the articles of Jalais annulled. This was in some measure to strip him of his command, for it was at Jalais that they had reciprocally acknowledged their titles. The rupture was therefore complete, and did not permit them to recover their exhausted state by being on good terms with one another. Although the royalist agents of Paris were commissioned to open a correspondence with Charette, and to send him letters of regency, nothing of the sort had hitherto reached this leader.

Scépeaux's division, between the Loire and the Vilaine, afforded the same spectacle. In Brittany, it is true, energy was less relaxed; a protracted war had not exhausted the inhabitants. Chouannerie was in itself a lucrative mode of robbery, which did not weary those who abandoned themselves to this pursuit; and besides, a single leader, a man of unequalled perseverance, was there to rekindle the nearly expiring fervour. But this leader, whom we have seen as only delaying his journey till he had completed the organization of Brittany, had lately repaired to London, for the purpose of entering into communication with the English cabinet and the French princes. Puisaye had left, to supply his place at the central committee as major-general, one Sieur Desotteux, styling himself Baron de Cormatin. The emigrants, so numerous in the courts of Europe, were very scarce in La Vendée, in Brittany, and wherever this painful civil war had place. They affected supreme contempt for this kind of service, which they termed chouannerie (chouanner). For this reason there was a want of officers, and M. de Puisaye had taken this adventurer, who had recently decorated himself with the title of Baron de Cormatin, because his wife had inherited a petty barony of that name in Burgundy. He had been by turns a red hot revolutionist, then an officer of Bouille's, afterwards a knight of the dagger (*chevalier du poignard), and lastly he had emigrated, in quest of some employment or other. He was like one possessed with a devil, talking and gesticulating with great vivacity, and liable to the most sudden changes. Such was the man whom Puisaye, without knowing him well enough, had left in Brittany.

Puisaye had been at the pains of instituting a method of corresponding through the islands of Jersey; but his absence was protracted, and oftentimes his letters did not come to hand; Cormatin was in no wise capable of supplying his place and reviving public spirit; the leaders became impatient or disheartened, for they saw the old animosities, lulled by the clemency of the convention, subsiding around them, and the elements of civil war dissolving. The presence of such a general as Hoche was not likely to encourage them; for Brittany, although less exhausted than La Vendée, was quite as well disposed to accept a peace proposed in an apt or delicate manner.

Canclaux and Hoche were both very capable of successfully managing this. We have already observed how Canclaux behaved in the first war in La Vendée; he had left behind him in that country a high character for moderation and ability. The army placed under his command was considerably weakened by the continual reinforcements sent to the Pyrenees and to the Rhine, and moreover, entirely disorganized by its long stay in the same places. From the disorder incident to civil wars, insubordination had gained ground, and this led to pillage, debauchery, drunkenness, and disease. This was the second relapse of that army since the commencement of this fatal war. Out of forty-six thousand men of whom it was composed, fifteen or eighteen thousand were in the hospitals; the remaining thirty thousand were badly armed, and half of them were protecting the fortresses; thus all that were effective amounted at most to fifteen thousand. Canclaux asked him for twenty thousand men; whereof fourteen thousand were taken from the Brest army, and six from that of Cherbourg. With this reinforcement he doubled all the posts, recovered the camp of Sorinières near Nantes, recently taken by Charette, and bore down in full force in the direction of the Layon, which formed Stofflet's defensive line in Upper Anjou. After he had taken this commanding position, he circulated plentifully the decrees and the proclamation of the convention, and sent emissaries all over the country.

Hoche, habituated to war upon a large scale, and endued with superior qualities for conducting it, found himself, to his extreme mortification, condemned to a civil war, conducted without liberal feelings, military combinations, and without the means of acquiring repute. He had at first solicited his dismissal; but he soon became resigned to serve his country in so disagreeable a post and so beneath his abilities. He was now going to be rewarded for this forbearance, by finding on the very stage he had desired to quit, occasion for displaying the qualities of a statesman as well as those of a general. His army was utterly weakened by the reinforcements sent to Canclaux. He had scarcely forty thousand ill-organized men to protect an intersected, mountainous, and woody country, together with more than three hundred and fifty leagues of coast from Cherbourg to Brest. He was promised twelve thousand men, which were to be drawn from the north. He more particularly required well-disciplined men, and he immediately set about correcting in his own troops the habits contracted in the civil war. "We ought," said he, "to put at the head of our columns none but disciplined men, who can show as much good conduct as bravery, and be mediators as well as soldiers." He had trained them in a great number of small camps, and he recommended to them to go about in troops of forty or fifty, to endeavour to acquire a knowledge of the locality, and to accustom themselves to this war of surprises, to compete with the Chouans in stratagems, to converse with the peasants, to make acquaintance with them, to gain their confidence, their friendship, may even their assistance. "Never lose sight of this," he thus wrote to his officers, "that policy ought to have a great share in this war. Let us employ by turns humanity, virtue, integrity, energy, stratagem, and never lose sight of that dignity which befits republicans." In a short time, he had given to that army a different aspect and another position; the discipline so indispensable for pacificatory measures was restored. It was he who, mingling indulgence with severity towards his soldiers, used these judicious expressions in writing to one of his lieutenants, who complained too bitterly of some drunken excesses; "Why, my friend, if soldiers were philosophers, they would not fight. Let us, however, punish drunkards, if drunkenness induces a neglect of their duty." He had conceived the most judicious ideas respecting the country, and in regard to the mode of pacifying it. "These peasants," he wrote, "must have priests; let them therefore have them if they desire it. Many have suffered, and are sighing to return to an agricultural life; let us afford them some assistance to repair their farms. As for those who have contracted the habit of war, it would be impossible to throw them back upon their country; they would only disturb it by their indolence and their restlessness. We form them into legions, and enrol them in the armies of the republic. They will make excellent soldiers for the advanced guard; and their hatred of the allies who have not relieved them, will be a guarantee for their fidelity to us. Besides, what signifies the cause?—it is war that they want. Recollect," he added, "the bands of Duguesclin going to dethrone Peter the Cruel, and the regiment raised by Villars in the Cévennes." Such was the young general who was called in to restore peace to those unfortunate countries.

The decrees of the convention, profusely circulated in La Vendée and in Brittany, the release of the suspected persons, both at Nantes and at Rennes, the pardon granted to Madame de Bonchamps, who had been saved from the decree of death issued against her, the reversing of all unexecuted sentences, the universal toleration that had been granted, the prohibition against injuring churches, the liberation of the priests, the punishment of Carrier and his accomplices, began to produce the desired effect in both countries, and created a general tendency to make the most of the general amnesty, held out to the leaders as well as soldiers. Animosities were appeased, and opposition also declined in the same ratio. The representatives on mission at Nantes had interviews with the sister of Charette, and made him acquainted, through her agency, with the decree of the convention. He was at that moment reduced to extremity. Though endowed with unparalleled perseverance, he could not subsist without hope, and not a single ray of hope appeared. The court of Verona, where he excited such admiration, as we have already seen, nevertheless did nothing for him. The regent had, indeed, recently written him a letter, in which he appointed him lieutenant-general, and styled him the second founder of the monarchy. But this letter, which might at least have ministered to his vanity, had been intrusted to the agents in Paris, and had not yet reached him. He had for the first time solicited relief from England, and sent his young aid-de-camp La Roberie to London; but he had received no tidings from him. Thus he had not a word of reward or encouragement, either from the princes to whom he was devoting himself, or from the powers whose policy he was seconding. He consented therefore to an interview with Canclaux and the representatives of the people.

At Rennes also the desired return to confidence was brought about by the sister of one of the leaders. One Botidoux, a principal Chouan of the Morbihan, had been informed that his sister, who was at Rennes, had been imprisoned on his account. He was prevailed upon to repair thither, in order to obtain her release. The representative Boursault gave him up his sister, paid him all sorts of attentions, satisfied him respecting the intentions of the government, and contrived to convince him of the sincerity of the decree of amnesty. Botidoux undertook to write to one Bois-Hardi, an intrepid young Chouan, who commanded the division of the Côtes-du-Nord, and was reputed to be the most formidable of the insurgents. "What hopes," he wrote to him, "can you entertain? The republican armies are masters of the Rhine. Prussia is soliciting peace. You cannot rely on the promises of England; you cannot rely upon the leaders who write to you only from beyond sea, or who have forsaken you upon pretext of seeking assistance for you; henceforth you can but wage a war of assassination." Bois-Hardi, perplexed by this letter, and unable to leave the Côtes-du-Nord, where as yet active hostilities required his presence, got the central committee to repair to him, in order to furnish an answer to Botidoux. The committee, at the head of which was Cormatin, as Puisaye's major-general, went to Bois-Hardi. There was in the republican army a young general, bold, brave, possessing great natural talent, and especially that cunning peculiar to the calling he had formerly followed, that of a jockey (maquignon): this man was general Humbert. "He was one of those," said Puisaye, "who had altogether proved that a year's practical experience in war completely outdoes all the apprenticeships of the parade." He wrote a letter, the style and orthography whereof were denounced to the committee of public welfare, but which nevertheless deeply affected Bois-Hardi and Cormatin. An interview took place. Bois-Hardi showed the self-possession of a young and brave soldier, devoid of personal feeling, a soldier from temperament rather than from fanaticism; however, he made no promises, and left Cormatin to act. The latter, with his habitual inconsistency, highly flattered at being called to treat with the generals of the mighty French republic, acceded to all Humbert's overtures, and begged to be put in communication with the generals, Hoche and Canclaux, and the representatives. Interviews were assented to; the day and the place were appointed. The central committee found fault with Cormatin for having gone too far. The latter, adding duplicity to inconsistency, assured the committee that he would not betray their cause; that in accepting an interview, he wished to form his opinion of the common enemy on a closer inspection, and to judge of his forces and intentions. He gave two reasons, and, according to him, they were important: in the first place, he had never seen Charette, and he had never yet acted with him; by desiring to see him, under the statement that La Vendée as well as Brittany was to be included in the negotiation, he might converse with him upon Puisaye's plans, and obtain his concurrence therein. Secondly, Puisaye, the boyhood acquaintance of Canclaux, had written him a letter likely to affect him, and containing the most splendid offers to gain him over to the monarchy. Upon the pretext of an interview, Cormatin would deliver the letter to him, and thus effectuate Puisaye's plan. Affecting thus the part of a skilful diplomatist with his colleagues, Cormatin obtained their assent to his commencing a feigned negotiation with the republicans, in order to lay his plans with Charette and to gain over Canclaux. In this spirit he wrote to Puisaye, and set out with his head full of the most contrary ideas; at one time proud of deceiving the republicans, of plotting before their faces, and depriving them of a general; at another time, vain at being made the mediator of the insurgents with the representatives of the republic, and ready, in this confused medley of ideas, to become a dupe while intending to make dupes. He saw Hoche; he at first demanded a provisional truce, and then required permission to visit all the Chouan chiefs, one after another, for the purpose of suggesting pacific views, to see Canclaux, and especially Charette, in order to lay his plans before the latter, saying that the Bretons could not separate themselves from the Vendéans. Hoche and the representatives acceded with his request; but they assigned Humbert to accompany him, and to attend at all the interviews. Cormatin, now at the summit of his wishes, wrote to the central committee and to Puisaye, stating that his artifices had succeeded, that the republicans were his dupes, that he was going to confirm the Chouans, to talk with Charette, to engage him merely to temporize till the grand expedition, and lastly, to gain over Canclaux. He accordingly set about making a hasty survey of Brittany, introducing himself to all the leaders, and astonishing them by the promises of peace, and by this singular truce. Not one of them comprehended his subtleties, and they relaxed their exertions. The cessation of hostilities induced a desire for rest and peace, and, without being aware of it, Cormatin promoted the pacification. He himself began to be inclined that way; and while he meant to dupe the republicans, it was the republicans who, without meaning to do so, deceived him. Meanwhile, an appointment had been made with Charette for the time and place of the interview. It was near Nantes. Cormatin was to repair thither, and at that place the negotiations were to commence. Cormatin, more and more embarrassed every day by the engagements which he was contracting with the republicans, began to write less frequently to the central committee; and the committee, seeing the turn which things were about taking, wrote to Puisaye in Nivôse. "Make haste and come back. The courage of our men is shaken; the republicans are seducing the leaders. You must come, but not unless it were with twelve thousand men, money, priests, and emigrants. Be here before the end of January (Pluviôse)." Thus, while the emigrants and the foreign powers were building so many expectations upon Charette and Brittany, a negotiation was about to make a pacification between the two countries. In Pluviôse (January and February) the republic was, therefore, treating at Bâle with one of the principal powers, and at Nantes with the royalists, who had up to this time opposed and misconceived her intentions.

CHAPTER XXVII.

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF FASHIONABLE LIFE; RE-OPENING OF THE THEATRE AND LEARNED SOCIETIES; ESTABLISHMENT OF PRIMARY AND NORMAL SCHOOLS OF LAW AND MEDICINE; DECREES CONCERNING COMMERCE, TRADE, THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE, AND RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCES—SCARCITY OF THE NECESSARIES OF LIFE DURING THE WINTER OF THE YEAR III.—THE RUSTS OF MARAT DESTROYED—ABOLITION OF THE "MAXIMUM" AND THE REQUISITIONS—THE DIFFERENT METHODS PROPOSED FOR CALLING IN THE ASSIGNATS—INCREASE OF THE SCARCITY AT PARIS—RE-INSTATEMENT OF THE GIRONDIST DEPUTIES—TUMULTUOUS SCENES OCCASIONED BY THE DEARTH; AGITATION OF THE REVOLUTIONISTS; INSURRECTION OF THE 12TH GERMINAL, THE EVENTS OF THAT DAY DESCRIBED—BANISHMENT OF BARRÈRE, BILLAUD-VARENNE, AND COLLOT D'HERBOIS—ARREST OF VARIOUS MOUNTAINEER DEPUTIES—DISTURBANCES IN THE CAPITAL TOWNS—THE PATRIOTS DISARMED.

THE Jacobins were dispersed, the principal agents or chiefs of the revolutionary government were under prosecution, Carrier executed, and several other deputies were called to account for their missions; lastly, Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, Barrère, and Vadier, had notice that they were to be placed under accusation, and were appointed to be handed over to the tribunal of their colleagues. But while France was thus seeking to revenge herself on the men who had extorted from her such agonized throes, and condemned her to a system so terrible, she returned with intensity of feeling to pleasurable enjoyments, and to the refinements of the arts and of civilization, of which those men had for a moment deprived her. We have already observed with what fervency preparations were made for the enjoyment of this winter, with what new and singular taste the women had sought to array themselves; how much the concerts in the Rue Feydeau were frequented. In the mean time, all the theatres were again opened. The actors of the Comédie Française were released from prison; Larive, Saint-Prix, Molé, Dazincourt, Saint-Phal, and Mesdemoiselles Coutat and Devienne, had again appeared on the stage. The theatres became quite the rage. There it was that every passage that could bear any allusion to the reign of terror was applauded; there it was that the air of the Reveil du Peuple was sung; and there it was that the Marseillaise was proscribed. In the boxes appeared the beauties of the day, either wives or friends of the Thermidorians; in the front of the pit, the jeunesse dorée of Fréron seemed to deride by their pleasures, their dress, and their taste, those gross sanguinary Terrorists who it was said had wanted to drive away all ideas of civilization. The public balls were attended with the same frequency. There was one at which no one was present who had not lost relatives during the revolution. It was called the victims' ball. The public places devoted to the arts were also opened. The convention, who with all its passions retained magnificent ideas, had ordered the formation of a museum, whither those pictures France already possessed, as well as those which we acquired by conquest, were to be collected. They had already conveyed thither those pictures of the Flemish school taken in Belgium. The Lyceum, where Laharpe had very recently been uttering his eulogies upon philosophy and liberty in a red cap; the Lyceum, closed during the reign of terror, had just before been restored to the public, owing to the bounty of the convention, who had taken upon itself part of the expense of the establishment, and had distributed some hundreds of tickets among the young men of each section. There Laharpe was heard declaiming against anarchy, the system of terror, the corruption of the language, philosophism, in fact against all that he had formerly extolled; before this same liberty he had eulogized had upon a very short acquaintance scared his weak mind. The convention had granted pensions to almost all men of letters and science, without reference to opinions. She had recently decreed the establishment of the primary schools, where the people were to learn the elements of the language, both as spoken and written, the rules of arithmetic, the principles of surveying, and some practical ideas concerning the principal phenomena of nature; central schools were also appropriated for the higher classes, where youth were to be taught the mathematics, natural philosophy, chemistry, natural history, the preservation of health, arts and mechanics, the arts of design, the belles lettres, the ancient languages, the living languages most appropriate to peculiar localities, general grammar, logic and analysis, history, political economy, and the elements of legislation, all in the order best adapted to the development of the understanding; the normal schools, where, under the most eminent professors and men of science, young students were to be trained, who were afterwards to diffuse throughout all France the instruction derived from the centre of intelligence; lastly, the particular schools of medicine, law, and the veterinary art. Besides this vast system of education, destined to diffuse and to propagate that civilization which the revolution was so unjustly accused of having banished, the convention voted encouragements of every description. The establishment of various manufactures had just been ordered. There was given to the Swiss who had left their country on account of disturbances there, the national domains at Besançon, in order that they might transfer to that place the manufacture of clocks and watches. The convention had, moreover, required from her committees designs for canals, plans for the formation of a bank, and a system of advances to certain provinces ruined by the war. The convention had also mitigated several laws likely to prejudice agriculture and commerce. A great number of farmers and labourers had quitted Alsace when it was evacuated by Wurmser, the same with regard to Lyons during the siege, and also the same with respect to the entire south after the severities exercised against federalism. The convention made a distinction between these claimants and the emigrants, and enacted a law by which labourers and artisans, who had left France since the 1st of May, 1793, and who were disposed to return before the 1st Germinal, should not be considered as emigrants. The law relative to suspected persons, the repeal of which had been called for, was retained; but it was no longer formidable to any other than the patriots, who had in their turn become the suspected of the day. The revolutionary tribunal had been entirely remodelled, and restored to the form of the ordinary criminal tribunals; it had judges, juries, and counsel for the accused. Judgment could no longer be given upon written documents, or without the examination of witnesses. The law which allowed the tribunal to dispense with oral pleadings, and which had been passed against Danton, was repealed. The district administrations were to be no longer permanent, except in cities of more than fifty thousand souls. Lastly, the important interests of religious observance were regulated by a new law. The preamble of this law recited, that by virtue of the declaration of rights, all religions were tolerated; but it declared that the state would no longer pay for the support of any particular religion, and would no longer permit its being publicly celebrated. Each sect was at liberty to erect or to rent buildings, and to practise the observances of its religion in those edifices. Lastly, in order to create a substitute for the ancient ceremonies of the Catholic religion and those of raison, the convention formed a plan of decadary fêtes. The convention had combined dancing, music, and moral exhortations, so as to render the diversions of the people advantageous, and to impart to their minds impressions at once useful and agreeable. Thus relieved from the urgent necessity for defending herself, the revolution divested herself of her violent procedures, and returned to the true object of her mission, that of promoting the arts, industry, intelligence, and civilization.

But, while cruel laws were seen to disappear, while the upper classes were tranquillizing themselves, and indulging in pleasure, the lower classes were suffering from a terrible dearth, and from a season so severe as to be almost unparalleled in our climate. This winter of the year III., which enabled us to cross dry-shod over the rivers and arms of the sea in Holland, made us pay dearly for that conquest, by exposing the people in the towns and in the country to grievous hardships. It was beyond dispute the severest winter of the century; it surpassed even that which preceded the opening of the states-general in 1789. The necessities of life were deficient from various causes. The principal was the insufficiency of the harvest. Although it had been proclaimed as likely to be very fine, yet the drought, and after that the blights, had deceived every body's expectation. The corn-threshing had been neglected, as in the preceding year, either from want of hands, or the ill-will of the farmers. The assignats were every day falling lower, and had recently fallen to one-tenth of their value; the maximum had become more than ever oppressive, and the repugnance to obey it, and the efforts to evade it, were so much the greater. The farmers every where made false declarations, and were assisted in their falsities by the municipalities, which, as we have seen, had lately been renewed. Being composed almost all of them of moderate men, they willingly con-

nived at disobedience to the revolutionary laws; in short, all the springs of authority were relaxed and the government having ceased to operate by fear, the requisitions for the supply of the armies and the great communes were no longer obeyed. Thus the extraordinary system of supplies, that was intended to supply the deficiencies of commerce, was disorganized long before commerce had regained its natural movement. The dearth was, of course, more severely felt in the great communes, always more difficult to supply. Paris was threatened with a famine more distressing than any of those which had caused it alarm during the whole course of the revolution. With causes of a general nature were combined some causes of a particular kind. By the suppression of the conspirator commune of the 9th Thermidor, the charge of supplying Paris had been transferred from the commune to the commission of trade and supplies; from this change an interruption in the services had resulted. The orders had either been given very late, or else with a dangerous precipitation. The means of conveyance failed; all the horses, as we have seen, had died, and besides the difficulty of collecting sufficient quantities of corn, there was to be added to that the difficulty of conveying them to Paris. The dilatoriness, pillage by the way, and all the usual accidents of a scarcity, thwarted the exertions of the commission. With the scarcity of provisions was combined the scarcity of wood for fuel and charcoal. The canal of Briare had been dried up during the summer. Supplies of pit-coal had not yet arrived, and the forges had consumed all the charcoal. The felling of timber had been slowly taking place, and those who rafted it on the rivers, harassed by the local authorities, had been completely discouraged. Charcoal and wood were therefore both scarce, and in that terrible winter the scarcity of fuel was almost as severely felt as that of corn.

Thus the dreadful sufferings of the lower classes contrasted with the new enjoyments in which the higher classes indulged. The revolutionists, irritated against the government, followed the example of all defeated parties, and availed themselves of the public calamities as so many arguments against the present rulers of the state. They even contributed to aggravate those calamities by thwarting the orders of the administration. "Do not send your corn to Paris," said they to the farmers, "the government is counter-revolutionary; it is bringing back the emigrants; it will not put the constitution in force; it leaves the corn to rot in the warehouses of the commission of trade; it means to famish the people in order to compel them to throw themselves into the arms of royalty." Thus they prevailed on the owners of the corn to keep it on hand. The revolutionists left their communes and repaired to the great towns, where they were unknown, and out of the reach of those whom they had persecuted. There they caused universal vexation. At Marseilles they had just been committing some fresh violence upon the representatives, whom they forced to suspend the proceedings instituted against those who were styled the accomplices of terror. It had been necessary to put the city in a state of siege. It was particularly at Paris, where they assembled in great numbers and became more turbulent. They were constantly harping upon the same point, the sufferings of the people, and compared them with the luxury of those who had now gained an ascendancy in the convention. Madame Tallien was the woman of the day whom they chiefly accused, for at all periods there had been some one person whom they accused; this was the perfidious enchantress at whom they levelled reproaches, just as Madame Roland formerly, and before her, Marie Antoinette had been blamed for all the evils the people suffered. Her name mentioned in the convention did not appear to affect Tallien. At last, he one day obtained leave to speak in order to clear her from so much abuse; he represented her as a model of self-devotion and courage, as one of the victims whom Robespierre had destined for the scaffold, and he declared that she had become his wife. Barras, Legendre, and Fréron, joined him, they exclaimed that it was now time to explain; they then bandied abuse with the Mountain, and the convention found itself obliged, as usual, to put an end to the discussion by proceeding to the order of the day. On another occasion, Duhem told Clausel, the deputy, a member of the committee of general safety, that he would murder him. The disturbance became tremendous, and the order of the day at last came to put an end to this novel scene.

The indefatigable Duhem discovered a publication intitled, The Spectator of the Revolution, containing a dialogue on the two governments, monarchical and republican. This dialogue demonstrated an evident preference to the monarchical government, and even exhorted plainly enough the French people to re-adopt it. Duhem denounced this work with indignation, as one of the symptoms of the royalist conspiracy. The convention, acknowledging the justice of this complaint, sent the author before the revolutionary tribunal; but Duhem, having allowed himself to say that royalism and aristocracy were triumphant, the convention committed him for three days to the Abbaye, as having insulted the assembly. These scenes had set all Paris in commotion. In the sections they wanted to present addresses on what had just taken place, and squabbles ensued as to the language in which they should be prepared, every one desiring that these addresses should be written with a view to his own notions. Never had the revolution exhibited so tempestuous a scene. Formerly, the all-powerful Jacobins had met with sufficient opposition to call forth a substantive contest. They had driven all before them, and were left masters of the field, noisy and furious, but yet absolute. At this day a powerful party had just risen up; and though it was less violent, it made up by number what it wanted in violence, and could fight upon equal terms. Addresses were made in every variety of language. Some Jacobins, who met in the coffee-houses near the populous quarters of Saint-Denis, the Temple, and Saint-Antoine, held the same language they had been accustomed to do. They threatened to go and attack the new conspirators at the Palais-Royal, in the theatres, nay, in the convention itself. The young men, on their side, made a terrific noise in the pit of the theatres. They settled among themselves to commit an outrage pointed against the Jacobins. The bust of Marat was in all places of public resort, and particularly in the theatres. At the Theatre Feydeau some young men climbed up to the balcony, and mounting upon one another's shoulders, threw down the bust of the saint, dashed it to pieces, and immediately replaced it by the bust of Rousseau. The police made vain efforts to prevent this disturbance. General cheering accompanied this act of the young men. Wreaths were thrown upon the stage to crown the bust of Rousseau; verses, written for the occasion, were handed about; and there were shouts of "Down with the Terrorists! down with Marat! down with the sanguinary monster who demanded three hundred thousand heads! The author of Emile, of the Contrat Social, of the New Héloïse, for ever!" This scene was repeated on the following day at the other theatres, and at all the places of public resort. People rushed to the covered markets, smeared the bust of Marat with blood, and then threw it into the mud. A number of children in the quarter of Montmartre, made up a procession, and after carrying a bust of Marat to the brink of a sewer, throw it in. Public opinion was expressed with extreme violence; a hatred and disgust of Marat was in every body's heart, not even excepting the greater part of the Montainneers; for none of them could follow in his eccentricities the ideas of this audacious maniac. But the name of Marat being consecrated, the dagger of Corday having gained him a kind of worship, people were as much afraid of attacking his altars as they would those of liberty itself. We have seen that during the last sans-culotties, that is to say, four months previous, he had been introduced into the Pantheon in the place of Mirabeau. The committees were anxious to take this hint, and proposed to the convention to decree that no individual should be deposited in the Pantheon until twenty years had intervened, and that neither the bust or the portrait of any citizen should be set up in places of public resort. It added that every decree to the contrary was repealed. The consequence was that Marat, who had been brought into the Pantheon, was turned out again at the end of four months. Such is the instability of revolutions! Immortality is decreed or withheld, and unpopularity threatens party leaders even after death! From that moment commenced the long infamy which has pursued Marat, and which he has shared with Robespierre. Both, formerly worshipped as divinities by fanaticism, but now tried by affliction, were devoted to long-continued execration.

The Jacobins, incensed at this outrage offered to one of the most renowned revolutionists, assembled at the faubourg Saint-Antoine, and swore to avenge the memory of Marat. They took his bust, carried it about in triumph in all the quarters where they predominated, and being armed to the teeth, threatened to murder any one who should attempt to disturb this sinister celebration. The young men had a great mind to fall upon this procession; they encouraged one another to attack it, and a battle would infallibly have ensued, if the committees had not ordered the club of the Quinze-Vingts to be closed, prohibited processions of this kind, and dispersed the mob. At the sitting of the 20th Nivôse, (9th January) the busts of Marat and Lepelletier were removed from the hall of the convention, as well as the two fine paintings in which David had represented them dying. The galleries, which were divided, made great outcries against each other; some applauded, while others groaned in a frightful manner. Among the latter were many of those women who were called the furies of the guillotine; they were turned out. The assembly cheered, and the Mountain, sullen and silent, on seeing those celebrated pictures taken down, fancied that they witnessed the annihilation of the revolution and the republic.

The convention had just now taken away from both parties all excuse for coming to close quarters; but the struggle was only postponed for a few days. Mutual enmities were so exasperated, and the sufferings of the people so great, that every body was looking for one of those violent scenes which had stained the revolution with blood. Amidst the uncertainty as to what was going to take place, all the questions to which the commercial and financial situation of the country gave rise were discussed; unhappy questions which were agitated and resumed every moment, so as to be considered and resolved in opposite ways, and according to the changes which opinions had undergone.

Two months before the maximum had been modified, by varying the price of corn in regard to localities; the requisitions had been qualified by making them special, limited, and regular; and the questions relative to the sequestration money and the assignats were adjourned. At this day all respect for the revolutionary creations had disappeared. It was no longer a mere modification that was demanded, it was the abolition itself of the system of compulsion established during the terror. The opponents of this system adduced excellent reasons. Every thing, said they, not being the object of a maximum, the maximum was absurd and unjust. The farmer paying 30 francs for a counter, for which he formerly paid 50 sous, 700 francs to a servant for wages, whom he formerly paid 100, and 10 francs to a day labourer, whom he formerly paid 50 sous, could not afford his produce at the same price as formerly. As raw materials imported from abroad had recently been exempted from the maximum, in order to restore some activity to trade, it was absurd to subject them to it when manufactured; for eight or ten times less would then be paid for them than in their natural state. These instances were not the only ones: a thousand more of the same kind might be cited. The maximum thus exposing the shopkeeper, the manufacturer, and the farmer, to inevitable losses, they would never submit to it; the former would leave their shops or their factories; the latter would hide his corn or consume it in the farm-yards, for he would find it turn to better account to sell his fattened poultry and pigs; at any rate, if it were desired that the markets should be supplied, it was requisite that the prices should be free; for nobody would care to work at a loss. Moreover, added the opponents of the revolutionary system, the maximum had never been carried into execution; those who wanted to buy made up their minds to pay according to the real price, and not according to the legal price. The whole question, therefore, was comprised in these words: pay dear or have nothing. In vain could they attempt to supply the want of voluntary activity of manufactures and commerce by requisitions, that is to say, by the action of the government. A trading government was a ridiculous monstrosity. As to this commission of supplies, which had made such a fuss about its operations, was it known whether it had imported foreign corn into France? From what quarter was France to be fed during five days? It was necessary, therefore, to return to individual activity, that is, to free trade, and to rely solely on that. When the maximum should be abolished, and the merchant could recover his premium for price of freight and insurance, the interest of his capital, and his fair profit, he would import produce from all parts of the globe. The great communes, in particular, which were not, like Paris, victualled at the cost of the state, could not have recourse to any thing but commerce, and would be furnished unless their free trade was restored.

In principle, this mode of reasoning was just; it was not the less true that the transition from a forced trade to a free trade was liable to prove dangerous at the moment of so great a crisis as the present. Until unrestricted prices should have called forth individual industry, and supplied the markets, every thing would be extraordinarily dear. It would occasion a very transient pressure on all commodities not being necessities of life; it was but the interruption for a moment, until that period when competition would reduce the prices; but for articles of consumption, which did not admit of interruption, how was the transition to be effected? Until the means of selling corn at an unrestricted price should have caused vessels to be despatched to the Crimea, to Poland, to Africa, and to America, and by the competition have obliged the farmers to part with their grain, how were the people in the cities to subsist without a maximum and without requisitions? Would not bad bread, produced by the laborious efforts of the administration, with incredible pains and anxiety, be better than absolute famine? Most certainly it would; the forced system must be got rid of as soon as possible, but with great caution and without misjudged precipitation.

As for the imputations of M. Boissy d'Anglas to the commission of supplies, they were not less unjust than ridiculous. Its importations, he said, could not have fed France more than five days. At first the accuracy of the calculation was denied; but that was of little consequence. A country never wants but a little, otherwise it would be impossible to supply it; but was it not an immense service to have provided that little? Let one conceive the unutterable distress of a country without bread for five days? Again, had this privation been equally distributed, it would not have been mortal, but while the country would have been glutted with corn, one would have seen the great towns, and the capital in particular, destitute of it not for five days only, but for ten, twenty, fifty, and then universal disorder would have ensued. Moreover, the commission of commerce and supplies, under the direction of Lindet, did not confine itself to merely import produce from abroad, but it had actually conveyed the corn, forage, and merchandise which were in France, from the country to the frontiers, or to the great communes; and commerce, seared away by the war and political horrors, would never have done that of her own accord. It had been found necessary to supply this defect by the intentions of the government, and those energetic and extraordinary intentions merited the gratitude and the admiration of France, notwithstanding the outcry of those petty men, who during the dangers of the country, could do nothing else than hide themselves.

The question was carried by assault as it were. They abolished the maximum, and the requisitions of draught conveyance were abolished, much in the same way as the seventy-three had been recalled, and much in the same manner as they had impeached Billaud, Collot, and Barrère. Nevertheless some few remains of the system of requisitions were suffered to exist. Those requisitions which had for their object the victualling of the great communes, were to be in full force for one month longer. Government retained the right of pre-emption, that is, the right to take articles of consumption by authority on payment of the market price. The famous commission suffered a diminution in its style; it was no longer called the commission of trade and supplies, but merely the commission of supplies. Its five directors were reduced to three; its ten thousand agents to a few hundred. The system of contracts was judiciously substituted for that of administrative management; and by the way, an outcry was raised against Pacho for his appointment of the committee of markets. The expense of carriage was allowed to contractors. The manufacture of arms in Paris, which had rendered costly but great services, was discontinued, as it could be without inconvenience dispensed with. The manufacture of arms was again made the subject of contract. The workmen, who clearly saw that they should have less pay, uttered some complaints; indeed instigated by the Jacobins, they even threatened a commotion; but they were repressed and sent back to their communes.

The question of the sequestration, previously adjourned, because it was apprehended, lest in re-establishing the circulation of securities it should aid the cause of emigration, and cause the revival of jobbing in foreign paper to be renewed, this question was again resumed, and was this time determined in favour of free trade. The sequestration was taken off; restitution was made of the sequestered securities to the foreign merchants, at the risk of not obtaining a similar restitution in favour of the French. Lastly, the free currency of money was restored, after a warm debate. A prohibition had previously existed in order to prevent emigrants from carrying money out of France; this was again permitted, from the consideration that, as we had not the means of return, Lyons being no longer able to furnish sixty millions' worth of manufactured goods, Nîmes twenty, and Sedan ten, trade could no longer be carried on, unless it were allowed to make payment in gold or silver for the purchases made abroad. Moreover, a supposition existed that specie was hoarded, and as it would not issue again into currency by reason of the paper money, the means it afforded of paying foreigners for articles of importation would induce it to show itself, and would again make it move. Beyond all this, very puerile precautions were taken to prevent its being made available for the emigrants. Every person who sent abroad any metallic currency, was bound to import its equivalent in merchandise. Lastly, the difficult point of the assignats was taken up. There were nearly seven thousand five or six hundred millions in actual circulation; in the treasury there remained five or six hundred millions; the totalsum created amounted therefore to eight thousand millions. The pledge remaining in hand of the first and second issue consisted of woods, lands, villas, mansions, houses, and moveables, amounting to more than fifteen thousand millions, according to the actual valuation in assignats. The pledge was therefore amply sufficient. Notwithstanding this, the assignat lost nine-tenths or eleven-twelfths of its value, according to the nature of the subject-matter against which it was exchanged. Thus the state, which received the assessed taxes in assignats, the fundholder, the public functionary, the owner of houses or of lands, the capitalist, all those in short who received their salaries, income, or debts due to them in paper, sustained losses that became every day greater and greater; and the confusion that ensued in consequence was daily increasing. Cambon proposed to augment the salaries of the public functionaries and the income of the fundholders. After this suggestion had been opposed, it was found necessary to adopt it in regard to the public functionaries, who could no longer subsist. But it was but a very slight palliative for such an immense evil; in fact, to relieve one class out of a thousand. To relieve them all, a just estimate of the public securities should be restored; but how could this be effected?

People still harped upon the day dreams of the preceding year; they investigated the cause of the depreciation of the assignats, and the means of raising them. In the first place, in admitting that their great quantity was one cause of their depreciation, they set about demonstrating that this was not one of the main causes, in order to justify themselves for their excessive issue. To prove this, they alleged that at the time of the defection of Durnouriez, of the insurrection in La Vendée, and of the taking of Valenciennes, the assignats, circulating in much smaller quantity than after the raising of the blockade of Dunkirk, Mauberge, and Landau, were nevertheless much lower; this was true enough, and it proved that defeats and victories had an influence upon the currency of paper money, a truth that was certainly incontrovertible. But at the present time, Ventôse, in the year III. (March, 1795), victory was complete on all points, confidence in the sales was established, the national property had become the object of a species of jobbing, a great number of speculators bought to make a profit by resale or division; and yet the depreciation of the assignats was four or five times as great as in the preceding year. The quantity of the issues was therefore the real cause of the depreciation of the paper, and to call it in was the only mode by which its price could be raised.

The only mode of calling in the paper money was to sell the national possessions; but how was their disposal to be effected?—a question constantly arising, which was brought forward every year. The cause which had obstructed the purchase of the national property in the preceding years was the dislike, prejudice, and, above all, the want of confidence in respect of the title of the property. Now at this time another objection started up. Let us figure to ourselves how immovable property is acquired in the ordinary course of things. The merchant, manufacturer, farmer and capitalist, with goods or income long accumulated, purchase land of the man who has impoverished himself, or who wishes to exchange one kind of property for another. Thus an estate is exchanged either for another, or for a moveable capital accumulated by labour. The purchaser of the estate comes to enjoy repose in its possession; the seller goes elsewhere to employ the moveable capital which he receives in payment, and to succeed to the laborious part of him who obtained it. Such is the insensible devolution of immovable property. But let us figure to ourselves an entire third of the domains, consisting of expensive and mostly undivided estates, parks, villas, and mansions, put up for sale all at once, at the very moment too when the landholders, merchants, and wealthiest capitalists are dispersed, and we shall be able to comprehend whether payment could be made for them. It was not a few tradesmen or farmers who had escaped the proscriptions that could make such purchases, and certainly not pay for them. We shall no doubt be told that the mass of assignats in circulation was sufficient to pay for the domains; but this mass was illusory, if every holder of assignats were obliged to expend eight or ten times the quantity to procure the same things as he was before.

The difficulty consisted, therefore, in purchasers not being so well inclined to buy as unable to pay; consequently, all the means proposed were founded on a false basis, for they all presupposed the existence of that ability. Those means were either forced or voluntary. The former consisted in divesting the assignat of its monetary character, and in the forced loan. This divestment turned paper-money into a mere incumbrance upon property. It was tyrannical; for when it reached the assignat in the hands of the labouring man, or the individual who had but just wherewithal to live, it converted the morsel of bread into earth, and starved the holder of that assignat. The mere rumour, in fact, that a certain portion of the paper was to be divested of the character of money had caused a rapid fall, so much so that they were compelled to decree that this divestment of the monetary character of the assignat should not take place. The forced loan also was not a whit less tyrannical; for it also consisted in forcibly converting the money assignat into a mere charge upon the lands. The only difference was that the forced loan bore upon the upper and wealthy classes, and that its transmutation into property operated for their benefit alone; but they had suffered so severely, that it was scarcely possible to compel them to buy landed property, without throwing them into cruel embarrassment. Besides, ever since the reaction, they began to set their faces against any return to revolutionary measures.

There was of course nothing left but the voluntary system. Every expedient was proposed. Carnbon devised a scheme for a lottery: it was to consist of four millions of prize tickets at one thousand francs each, which made a fund of four thousand millions to be provided by the public. The state was to add three hundred and ninety-one millions, which were to make the great prizes, so that there should be four prizes of five hundred thousand francs, thirty six of two hundred and fifty thousand, and three hundred and sixty of one hundred thousand. The less fortunate were to get back their original tickets of one thousand francs; but the one and the other, instead of being paid in assignats, were to receive a bond upon the national property bearing three per cent. interest. Thus it was supposed that the attraction of a considerable prize would create an interest in this kind of investment in bonds on the national property, and that four thousand millions of assignats would thus lose the character of money, in order to assume that of charges upon lands, minus a premium of three hundred and ninety-one millions. This was assuming that this investment could always be made. Thuriot proposed another plan, that of a lotto. But this method, very appropriate as an investment of savings for some few survivors, was far too slow and too inadequate in regard to the enormous mass of the assignats. Jomard proposed a kind of territorial bank, where assignats might be paid in, and bonds bearing three per cent interest obtained in their stead, bonds that might be exchanged at pleasure for assignats. This was still the same plan of changing the paper money into simple charges upon lands. Here the only difference consisted in allowing those securities the power of reassuming the character of current money. It was evident that the substantive difficulty was not got over. All the means devised for calling in and raising the price of the paper were therefore illusory; the end of it would have been the going on for a long time in the same track, issuing assignats, which would fall more and more every day: when they were become payable, there would have been a forced payment. Unfortunately, people can never foresee the necessary sacrifices, and diminish their extent by making them at once. Nations have always been deficient in this sort of foresight and courage at a financial crisis.

To these proposed means of calling in the assignats were associated others, fortunately more practicable but very insufficient. The moveable property of the emigrants, easily saleable, amounted to two hundred millions. Private contracts for the shares of emigrants in the trading companies might produce one hundred millions; the share in their heritable property five hundred millions. But in the first case capital would be withdrawn from commerce, in the second, a portion of the amount must be received by charges upon lands. It was intended to offer a premium to those who should complete their payments for the property already purchased, and it was hoped that eight hundred millions might thus be called in. Lastly, it was intended to put the great unlet houses, situated in Paris, into a lottery, this made a thousand millions more. Assuming that this scheme worked thoroughly well, all that we have been enumerating might have caused the calling in of two thousand six hundred millions; nevertheless it would have been very fortunate could one thousand five hundred millions out of the total have been called in; besides this sum was to be reissued in another way. A very judicious and humane measure had been recently decreed, the payment of the creditors of the emigrants. It had been intended to make a separate payment in respect of each emigrant. As many of them were insolvent, the republic would not have paid their debts until their credits had been got in. But this individual liquidation would have been attended with endless delay. It would have been necessary to open an account for each emigrant, to bring into such account his real as well as personal property, and to balance the whole with his debts; and his unfortunate creditors, almost all of them servants, mechanics, or shopkeepers, would have had to wait for payment twenty or thirty years. Cambon settled that the creditors of the emigrants should become creditors of the state, and should be immediately paid, excepting those whose debtors were notoriously insolvent. The republic might thus lose a few millions, but it would relieve very great distress and confer an immense boon. Cambon the revolutionist, was the originator of this very humane idea.

But while they were discussing these unfortunate questions, the attention of government was unceasingly distracted by more pressing concerns, — the supply of Paris, now almost entirely destitute. We were now at the end of Ventôse (the middle of March), the abolition of the maximum had not yet had the effect of reviving commerce, and corn was not imported. A number of deputies were distributed in the neighbourhood of Paris, and made requisitions which were not obeyed. Although these requisitions were still in force for the supply of the great communes, and they were to pay the market price, the farmers alleged that they were abolished, and refused to comply with them; but this was not the greatest obstacle. The rivers and canals were entirely frozen. Not a boat could come up. The roads, covered with ice, were impassable; to render wheel-carriage practicable the roads must have been gravelled for twenty leagues round. The carts were plundered by the famished people on the road, whom the Jacobins goaded to madness, saying that the government was counter-revolutionary, that it suffered corn to rot in Paris, and that it intended to restore royalty. While the arrivals diminished, the consumption increased, as always happens in such cases. The fear of running short induced every one to lay in provisions for several days. Bread was delivered as formerly on the presentation of tickets; but every one magnified his necessities. To favour their milk-women, their laundresses, or the country people, who brought them vegetables and poultry, the inhabitants of Paris gave them bread, which was preferred to money, on account of the dearth which afflicted the environs as much as Paris itself. The bakers even sold dough to the country people, and from fifteen hundred sacks the consumption had thus risen to nineteen hundred. The abolition of the maximum had caused a rise in the price of all kinds of eatables; to reduce the price, the government had deposited meat and goods with the pork-butchers, the grocers, and the shopkeepers, to be sold at a low price. But these depositaries abused their trust, and sold at a higher rate than had been agreed upon.

The committees were every day in the greatest alarm, and waited with extreme anxiety for the nineteen hundred sacks of flour which had become indispensable. Boissy-d'Anglas, charged with the superintendence of the supply of articles of consumption, came continually to make new reports, in order to tranquillize the public mind, and to endeavour to impart that confidence which the government itself did not possess. In this situation the same abuse was lavished as heretofore. "See," said the Mountain, "the effect of the abolition of the maximum!" "See," replied the right side, "the inevitable effect of your revolutionary measures!" Each of them held out the accomplishment of the wishes of his own party as the only remedy, and called for measures frequently the most alien to the painful and all-absorbing subject. "Punish all the guilty!" said the right side, "repair all injustice, revise all tyrannical laws, repeal all the laws against the suspected." — "No," answered the Mountaineers; "renew your committees of government; restore to them their revolutionary energy; cease to persecute the best patriots, and to raise up the aristocracy," such were the means proposed for the relief of the public distress.

It is always such moments as these that parties fix upon for coming to blows, and for carrying their schemes with a high hand. The report so long expected concerning Billaud-Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, Barrère, and Vadier, was presented to the assembly. The commission of twenty-one decided upon accusation, and required the provisional arrest; the arrest was immediately voted by an immense majority. It was decreed that the four incriminated members should be heard by the assembly, and that a solemn debate should be had upon the motion for placing them under accusation. This decision had scarcely been promulgated, when it was proposed to reinstate in the presence of the assembly the proscribed deputies, who two months before had been discharged from all prosecution, but whose return among their colleagues had been prohibited. Sieyès, who had kept silence for five years, who from the first months of the constituent assembly, had concealed himself in the centre, that his reputation and his genius might be forgotten, and whom the dictatorship had overlooked as an unsociable character, incapable of conspiring, and no longer dangerous when he ceased to use his pen, Sieyès emerged from his long abstractedness, and said that, since the sovereignty of the laws seemed to be restored, he should resume the right of speaking. So long as the outrage committed upon the national representation was not atoned for, the sovereignty of the laws, according to him, was not re-established. "Your whole history," said he to the convention, "is divided into two periods; from the 21st of September, the day of your meeting, to the 31st of May, the oppression of the convention by the misguided people; from the 31st of May up to the present time, the oppression of the people by the convention, herself tyrannized. From this day you will show to the world that you are become free by recalling your colleagues. Such a measure cannot even be discussed; it is one of absolute right." The Mountaineers uplifted their voices against this mode of reſoning "All that you have done then is null!" exclaimed Cambon. "Theſe extended libours, that multitude of laws, all the decrees that conſtitute the preſent government, are then null!" and the ſituation of France, effected by your courſe and your efforts, all this is null!" Sieyès ſaid that he was not rightly underſtood. The aſſembly, nevertheless, ordered the reſtatement of thoſe deputies who had eſcaped the ſcaffold. Thoſe famous proſcripts, Isnard, Henri Larivière, Louvet, Lucéville, Lapan, Doucet de Pontecoulant, entered amidſt cheering. "Why," exclaimed Chénier, "was there not a cavern deep enough to ſave from the executioners the eloquence of Vergnaud and the genius of Condorcet?"

The Mountainers were indignant, many Thermidorians even, alarmed at ſeeing the leaders of a faction who had oppoſed ſo dangerous a reſiſtance to the revolutionnary ſyſtem re-enter the aſſembly, went over once more to the Mountain. Thuriot, that Thermidorian ſo mimical to Robſpierre, who had by a miracle eſcaped the fate of Philippeau, Leſage, Scrault, a man of ſound diſcretion, but a declared enemy to all counter-revolution, laſtly, Lecointe, the reſolute adverſary of Billaud, Collet, and Buſſière,—Lecointe, who had five months before been declared a calumniator for denouncing the ſeven remitting members of the old committee, again went over to the left ſide. "You know not what you are doing," ſaid Thuriot to his colleagues, "theſe men will never forgive you." Lecointe propoſed that ſome diſtinction ſhould be made, "Recall the proſcribed deputies," ſaid he, "but inquire which of them took arms againſt the country by exciting the departments to inſurrection, and theſe latter do not again call among you." All of them had in fact taken arms. Louvet heſitated not to confeſs this, and propoſed to declare that the deputies which had riſen in June 1793 had deſerved well of the country. Here Tallien got up, and alarmed at the boldneſs of the Girondins, oppoſed the two motions of Lecointe and Louvet. Both were reſuſed. While the aſſembly were recalling the proſcribed Girondins, Pache, Bouchotte, and Gruat were referred to the examination of the committee of general ſafety.

Reſolutions ſuch as theſe were not calculated to tranquillize the public mind. The increaſing ſcarcity at length made the aſſembly adopt a meaſure which had been poſtpoſed for ſeveral days, and which could not fail to increaſe the irritation to the higheſt pitch,—namely, to put the inhabitants of Paris to a certain allowance of food. Boiſſy d'Anglas appeared before the aſſembly of the 25th Ventôſe (March 16th) and propoſed, in order to prevent waſte and to ensure to each a ſufficient ſhare of provisions, to limit every individual to a certain quantity of bread. The number of perſons compoſing each family was to be ſtated on the ticket, and no more than one pound of bread per day was to be allowed for each perſon. This regulation being adhered to, the committee of ſupplies could pledge themſelves that the city would not want food. The Mountainers, Romme, propoſed to riſe the allowance of working men to a pound and a half. The upper claſſes, he ſaid, poſſeſſed the means of procuring butchers' meat, rice, or vegetables, but the common people being unable to buy any thing but bread, ought to have more of it.

Romme's propoſition was adopted, and the Thermidorians regretted that they had not themſelves propoſed it, ſo as they ſhould have ensured the ſupport of the lower claſſes, and thus have ſhielded them from the Mountain.

No ſooner was this decree paſſed, than it excited an extreme ferment in the populous quarters of Paris. The revolutioniſts did all they could to aggravate its effect, and never called Boiſſy d'Anglas any other than Boiſſy Romme. The next day but one, the 27th Ventôſe (March 18), when the decree was for the firſt time carried into execution, a great tumult roſe in the ſuburbs Saint Antoine and Saint Mureu. There had been diſtributed among ſix hundred and thirty ſix thouſand inhabitants, eighteen hundred and ninety ſeven ſacks of flour. Three hundred and twenty four thouſand citizens had received the additional half pound allowed to labourers ſupporting themſelves by manual labour. Nevertheless, it appeared ſo new to the people of the ſuburbs to be reduced to a ſettled allowance, that they made great complaints. Some women, who were conſtantly attending the clubs, and who were always ready to excite a riot, made a diſturbance in the ſection of the Obſervatoire. The uſual agitators of the ſection joined theſe women. They wanted to preſent a petition to the convention, but for this purpoſe it was requiſite that there ſhould be a meeting of the whole ſection, and it was not lawful to meet on any other day than on the Decadi. They nevertheless beleaguered the civil committee, and demanded at their hands with threatening language the keys of the hall where the ſittings were held, and on reſuſal of the committee, the mob demanded that the committee ſhould ſend out of its members to accompany the aſſembly to the convention. The committee complied, and appointed them one of its members to regulate the movement, and to prevent diſturbance. A ſimilar ſcene was taking place at the ſame moment in the ſection of Finſterre. A concourſe had collected there, and was about joining itſelf to the ſection of the Obſervatoire. Both of them fell in together, and proceeded together towards the convention. One of the ring leaders undertook to be prolocutor, and was conducted with ſome few of the petitioners to the bar. The reſt of the mob remained outside making a frightful noiſe. "We are in want of bread!" ſaid the orator of the deputations. "We can almoſt lament all the ſacrifices that we have made for the revolution." At theſe words the aſſembly, highly indignant, abruptly ſtopped him, and ſeveral members roſe to reſeſs ſuch unbecoming language. "Bread! bread!" ſhouted the petitioners, thumping on the bar. Upon this inſolent conduct, the aſſembly deſired them to be turned out of the hall. Tranquillity however was reſtored, the ſpeaker finiſhed his harangue and ſaid, that, till the wants of the people were ſupplied, they would do nothing but ſhout The republic for ever! The preſident, Thibauden, replied with firmneſs to this ſeditious ſpeech, and without inviting the petitioners to the honour of the ſitting, ſent them about their buſineſs. The committee of general ſafety, which had already collected ſome battalions of the ſections, cleared the doors of the aſſembly, and diſperſed the mob.

This ſcene produced a ſtrong impreſſion on the public mind. The daily threats of the Jacobins diffused through the sections of the faubourgs, then inflammatory placards, wherein they gave notice that in six or seven days would take place within eight days, if the patriots were not discharged from every prosecution whatever, and if the constitution of 1793 were not enforced, then assemblies almost publicly holden in the coffee houses of the faubourgs, lastly, this recent attempt at riot, disclosed to the convention the scheme of a new 31st of May. The right side, the reinstated Girondists, and the Phrygiarians all of them equally exposed to threats, considered as to taking measures to prevent any new attack upon the national representation. Sieyès, who had recently reappeared upon the stage, and become a member of the committee of public welfare, proposed to the united committees a sort of mutual law, intended to prevent any new violence being committed against the convention. This bill declared as seditious every concourse of people wherein the proposal or intent of attacking public or private property, of restoring royalty, of overthrowing the republic and the constitution of 1793, or of meeting at the temple, to the convention, &c. should be entertained. Every member of such an assembly was to be liable to transportation. If after three warnings from the magistrates the concourse did not disperse, force was to be employed, and while waiting for the junction of the public force, all the adjoining sections were to send their own battalions. An insult offered to a representative of the people was to be punished by transportation, outrage, attended with violence, by death. One bell only was to ring in Paris, and to be placed in the Tower of Liberty. If any mob or concourse of people should be marching towards the convention, this bell was to sound the alarm (tocsin) immediately. At this signal all the sections were bound to assemble, and to march to the relief of the national representation. If the convention should be dissolved or its freedom constrained, directions were given to all those members who could escape, to leave Paris immediately, and to repair to Châlons-sur-Meuse, and all the deputies absent on leave or on mission were to be ordered to join them. The generals were also to send them troops from the frontiers, and the new convention formed at Châlons, the only depositary of the legitimate authority, was to march to Paris, to set at liberty the endangered portion of the national representation, and punish the authors of the treasonable attempt.

The committee received this bill with great cordiality. Sieyès was commissioned to make the report upon it, and to present it as speedily as possible to the assembly. The revolutionists, on their part, emboldened by the late movement, finding in the dearth a most favourable opportunity, perceiving that the danger was increasing in regard to their party, and that the fatal moment for Billaut, Collot, Barère, and Vadier, was approaching, bestirred themselves with greater violence, and thought seriously of getting up a sedition. The electoral club and the popular society of the Quinze-Vingts had been dissolved. The revolutionists, deprived of this place of refuge, had distributed themselves among the sectional assemblies, which were held every Decade: they occupied the faubourgs Saint Antoine and Saint Marceau, and the quarters of the temple and of the Cité. They were to be seen in the cafés situated in the centre of these different quarters, they projected a commotion, but without having either any settled plan or acknowledged leaders. Among them were to be found several men compromised either in the revolutionary committees or in different official capacities, who possessed considerable influence over the multitude, but none of these had a decided superiority. They measured their strength one against the other, were by no means on very good terms with each other, and had, moreover, no communication whatever with the deputies of the Mountain.

The old popular leaders, always allied with Danton or with Robespierre, or else with the heads of the government, had served as intermediate agents to give the watchword to the populace. But both one and the other had perished. The new leaders were perfect strangers to the new leaders of the Mountain: they had nothing in common with them but their danger and their attachment to the same cause. Besides, the Mountain's deputies being left in the minority in the assembly and refused of conspiring in order to recover power, the fate of every defeated party, they were under the necessity of justifying themselves every day, and obliged to protest that they were not conspiring. The usual result of such a position is to suggest a wish that others should conspire, and a repugnance to conspire oneself. So the Mountaineers said every day, The people will rise, the people must rise, but they would not have dared to enter into any combination with the people with a view of inducing that insurrection. There were cited several imprudent expressions used by Duham and Marbon Montaud in a café: the one as well as the other exhibited very little reserve or discretion in having uttered them. The declamations made by Leonard Bourdon to the sectional society of the Rue du Vert Bois were also repeated: they were likely enough to have taken place on his part, but neither of them corresponded with the patriots. As for Billaut, Collot, and Barère, who were more interested than any other persons in a commotion, they were afraid that by taking part therein, they should augment the evils of their own position, already very dangerous.

The patriots, therefore, proceeded alone, without much unity of purpose, as is almost always the case when there are no longer any prominent leaders. They ran from one to the other, gave the watchword from street to street and from quarter to quarter, and gave intelligence that this or that section was going to present a petition, or to attempt a movement. At the commencement of a revolution, when a party makes its first appearance, when it gets its leaders, when success and novelty hurry the mass along in its train, when it disconcerts its adversaries by the boldness of its attacks, the absence of unity and method are compensated by the common excitement, on the contrary, when it is once forced to defend itself, when it is deprived of its impulsive movement, and known to its adversaries, it has more need than ever of good conduct and order. But that good conduct and order, almost always impossible to preserve, becomes absolutely so when the influential leaders have disappeared. Such was the position of the patriot party in Ventôse, year III. (end of March): it was no longer the torrent of the 14th of July, of the 5th and 6th of October, of the 10th of August, or of the 31st of May. It was the association of a few men, inured by long discord to hostility, seriously compromised, full of energy and obstinacy, it is true, but more able to fight desperately than to conquer.

According to the old custom of preceding every movement by an imperious and yet measured petition, the sections of Montreuil and the Quinze-Vingts, included in the faubourg Saint-Antoine, drew up one perfectly analogous with all those that had been made previous to the great insurrections. It was agreed that it should be presented on the 1st Germinal (March 21). This was the very day that the committees had resolved to propose the law of grand police devised by Sieyès. Besides the deputation who was to present the petition, an assemblage of patriots took care to proceed towards the Tuileries; thither they all ran in crowds, and in the old fashion they formed numerous parties, whose cry was: The convention for ever! The Jacobins for ever! down with the aristocrats! The young men, with hair turned back and black neckcloths, had gone over from the Palais Royal to the Tuileries, and formed opposing parties, shouting: The convention for ever! down with the Terrorists! The petitioners were conducted to the bar. The language of their petition was extremely moderate; they called to mind the distress of the people, but without acrimony; they denied the justice of the charges levelled against the patriots, but without recriminating against their adversaries. They simply made the remark, that in these charges there was a misconception both of the past services of the patriots, and the position in which they now were placed; they admitted, moreover, that excesses had been committed, but added, that the parties, whoever they were, were composed of men and not of gods. "The sections of the Quinze-Vingts and of Montreuil," said they, "are not come, therefore, to demand of you as general measures, either banishment or the spilling of blood against this or that party, measures which confound mere error with crime; they only see in Frenchmen so many brethren, differently organized, it is true, but all members of the same family. They come to solicit you to use an instrument which is in your hands, and which is the only efficacious one for terminating our political tempests; that is the constitution of 1793. Organize from this day forth that popular constitution which the French people have accepted and sworn to defend. That constitution will reconcile all interests, tranquillize the public mind, and conduct you to the termination of your labours."

This insidious proposition comprised all that the revolutionists desired at the moment. In point of fact, they thought that the constitution, in expelling the convention, would bring back to the legislature, to the executive power, and to the municipal administrations, their leaders as well as themselves. This was a grave error; but they clung to that hope, and thought that, without expressing dangerous suggestions, such as the release of the patriots, the suspension of all proceedings against them, and the formation of a new commune at Paris, they should find its accomplishment by merely putting the constitution in force. If the convention rejected their request, if she did not explain herself precisely, and did not fix an early period, she would avow that she had no desire for the constitution of 1793. The president, Thibaudeau, made them a very firm reply, which concluded with these words, as severe as they were plain spoken: "The convention has never considered that the sturdy and faithful defenders of liberty of the faubourg Antoine, are the originators of the insidious petitions which have been made." No sooner had the president finished, than the deputy Charles hastened to mount the tribune, to demand that the declaration of rights should be exposed to view in the hall of the convention, as one of the articles of the constitution required. Tallien succeeded him in the tribune. "I ask those men," said he, "who now show themselves such ardent defenders of the constitution, those who seem to have adopted the rallying cry of a sect which sprang up at the conclusion of the constituent assembly, The constitution and nothing but the constitution,—I ask them if it was not they who shut it up in a box?" Cheers from one quarter, and groans and shouts from another, interrupted Tallien; he resumed his speech amid the disturbance: "Nothing," he continued, "shall prevent me from speaking my opinion when I am among the representatives of the people. We are all for a constitution with a firm government, and with that government which it prescribes; and it is not right that certain members should make the people believe that there are in this assembly persons not well affected to the constitution. We must now take measures to prevent them from slandering the pure and respectable majority of the convention." "Yes, yes," was the general cry from all sides. "That constitution," proceeded Tallien, "which they followed up, not by laws calculated to perfect it and to render its execution practicable, but by the revolutionary government—that constitution we must put in action, and we must impart life to it. But we shall not be so imprudent as to desire to carry it into effect without organic laws, so as to expose it imperfect and defenceless to all the enemies of the republic. For this reason, I move that a report be prepared without delay as to the means of putting the constitution in force, and that it be decreed that from henceforth there shall be no intermediate agency between the present government and the government that is to be settled." Tallien descended from the tribune amidst universal demonstrations of the satisfaction of the assembly, whom his reply had relieved from some embarrassment. The preparation of organic laws was a happy pretext for deferring the promulgation of the constitution, and furnishing the means of modifying it. It presented an opportunity for a new revision, like that to which the constitution of 1791 was subjected. The deputy Miaulle, a moderate Mountaineer, approved Tallien's proposal, and admitted, with him, that they ought not to be too precipitate in carrying the constitution into effect; but he maintained that there could not be any inconvenience in giving it publicity; and he moved that it should be engraved on marble tablets and set up in all places of public resort. Thibaudeau, alarmed at the idea of such publicity being given to a constitution framed in a moment of democratic frenzy, gave up the chair to Clausel, and ascended the tribune. "Legislators," said he, "we ought not to assimilate ourselves to those priests of antiquity who had two ways of expressing themselves, the one secret, the other ostensible. We must have the courage to say what we think of this constitution; and were it even to strike me dead, as it last year struck those who presumed to make observations against it, still would I speak." After a long interruption occasioned by cheering, Thibaudeau boldly asserted that there would be danger in publishing a constitution which certainly was not known to those who so highly extolled it. "A democratic constitution," said he, "is not one in which the people themselves exercise all the powers." "No! no!" exclaimed a multitude of voices. "It is," resumed Thibaudeau, "that under which, by a wise distribution of all the powers, the people enjoy liberty, equality, and peace. Now I do not perceive this in a constitution that would place an usurping commune or factious Jacobins by the side of the national representation; which would not give to the national representation the direction of the armed force in the place where it is sitting, and would thus deprive it of the means of defending itself and of maintaining its dignity; which would grant to a fraction of the people the right of partial insurrection and the faculty of overthrowing the state. To no purpose are we told that an organic law will correct all these inconveniences. A simple law may be altered by the legislature; but arrangements so important as those which will be comprehended in these organic laws must be as immutable as the constitution itself. Moreover, organic laws are not framed in a fortnight, or even in a month; and in the meantime, I propose that no publicity be given to the constitution; that great vigour be imparted to the government, and that even, if it be requisite, new powers be given to the committee of public welfare." Thibaudeau descended from the tribune amidst applause bestowed on the boldness of his declaration. It was then proposed to close the discussion immediately. The president put the question as to closing the debate, to the vote, and almost the whole assembly rose to support it. The irritated Mountaineers complained that they had not had time to hear what the president said, and that they knew not what had been proposed: they were not attended to, and the assembly passed on to other business. Legendre then moved the appointment of a commission of eleven members, whose sole duty it would be to consider the organic laws with which the constitution was to be accompanied. This suggestion was forthwith adopted. The committees at that moment announced that they had an important report to make, and Sieyès ascended the tribune to submit his law of grand police.

While these different scenes were passing in the interior of the assembly, the greatest disturbance prevailed without. The patriots of the faubourg, who had not been able to get into the hall, had dispersed themselves at the Carrousel and in the gardens of the Tuileries; they were waiting there with impatience, and uttering their accustomed clamour, till the result of their scheme with respect to the convention should be known. Some of them had come down from the galleries to report to the others what had passed; and giving them a false account, they had told them that the petitioners had been maltreated. Then it was that the disturbance among them increased; some ran off to the faubourgs to say that their delegates were ill used at the convention; others scoured the garden, driving before them all the young men they met; they had even seized three of them and thrown them into the great basin of the Tuileries. The committee of general safety, observing these disorders, had directed the drums to beat, for the purpose of calling together the neighbouring sections. Meanwhile the danger was urgent; and it required time for the sections to be called together and to assemble. The committee was surrounded by a crowd of young men, who had collected to the number of a thousand or twelve hundred, armed with walking canes, and well enough inclined to fall upon the groups of patriots, who had not yet encountered any opposition. The committee accepted their proffered assistance, and authorized them to perform the part of police in the garden. They then rushed upon the parties who were shouting The Jacobins for ever! (Vive les Jacobins) dispersed them after a long scuffle, and drove back part of them towards the hall of the convention. Some of the patriots again went up into the galleries, and there caused a sort of confusion by their sudden entry. At this moment, Sieyès was concluding his report on the law of grand police. An adjournment was demanded; from the Mountain shouts were heard of "It is a bloody law! It is martial law! They want to make the convention to leave Paris!" With these cries was mingled the noise of the fugitives from the garden. Great agitation ensued. A voice exclaimed, "The royalists are assassinating the patriots!" A disturbance was heard at the doors; the president put on his hat. A great majority of the assembly said that the danger provided against by Sieyès's law had already occurred, that it ought to be voted immediately. "To the vote! to the vote!" was the general cry. The law was put to the vote, and carried by an immense majority, amidst the loudest cheering. The members of the left extremity refused to take any part in the deliberation. At length, quiet was gradually restored, and the speakers began at last to be heard. "The convention has been imposed upon," cried Duhem. Clausel, who then came in, said he came to bid the convention be of good cheer. "We don't want to be told to be of good cheer," replied several voices. Clausel continued, and reported that the good citizens had come to make a rampart of their bodies for the national representation. He was cheered. "It is thou," cried Ruamps, "who hast instigated these mobs, in order to cause the passing of an atrocious law." Clausel would have replied, but he could not make himself heard. The law voted with such precipitation was then attacked. "The law has been passed," said the president, "we must not re-open the debate." "There is a conspiracy with those outside," said Tallien; "no matter, we must resume afresh the discussion of the bill, and prove that the convention can deliberate even amidst murderers." Tallien's proposal was adopted, and the bill of Sieyès was anew taken into consideration. The discussion was then conducted with greater tranquillity, and while they were deliberating within the hall, order was restored without. The young men, victorious over the Jacobins, requested leave to present themselves to the assembly; they were introduced by a deputation, and protested their patriotic intentions and their devotedness to the national representation. They withdrew after having been loudly cheered. The convention persisted in discussing the law of police before they quitted the place, voted it clause by clause, and at length broke up at ten at night.

This day left both parties convinced of the approach of some great event. The patriots, repulsed by the closing of the debate in the convention, and beaten with walking canes in the gardens of the Tuileries, went to the faubourgs, there to vent their rage, and to excite the mob to riot. The assembly plainly saw that she was about to be attacked, and considered how she should avail herself of the tutelary law that had just been passed.

The morrow was likely to bring as grave a discussion as that of the present day. In fact, Billaud, Colot, Barrère, and Vadier, were to be heard before the convention. A crowd of patriots and women had thronged very early to occupy the galleries. The young men, more prompt, had got there before them, and prevented the women from entering. They had turned them away rather roughly, and some scuffles had ensued around the hall. In the meantime numerous patrols, on duty in the environs, had maintained the public peace; the galleries had filled without much disturbance, and from eight in the morning till noon the time had been spent in singing patriotic airs. On one side was sung the Reveil du Peuple, on the other, the Marseillaise, while the deputies were taking their places. The president at length took the chair amidst shouts of Long live the convention! Long live the republic! The accused had entered and seated themselves at the bar, and the discussion was awaited in profound silence.

Robert Lindet immediately required to speak on a motion of order. It was surmised that this irreproachable man, whom none had dared to accuse along with the other members of the committee of public safety, was going to defend his old colleagues. It was liberal in him to do this, for he had still less to do than Carnot and Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or), with the political measures of the late committee of public welfare. He had not accepted the department of supplies and conveyance, without making it to be expressly understood that he should be disconnected with the operations of his colleagues, that he should never deliberate with them, nay, that he should even have his office in another place. He had refused to incur the joint responsibility before the danger; the danger appeared, and he generously came forward to bear his part. It was the settled opinion that Carnot and Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or) would follow this example; accordingly, several voices on the right were raised at once to oppose Robert Lindet's being heard.—"The accused are entitled to have the first word," was the cry; "they must begin before either their accusers or their defenders."—"Yesterday," said Bourdon (of the Oise), "a plot was hatched to save the accused, the good citizens have thwarted it. To-day recourse is had to other means, scruples are awakened in honest men, whom the accusation has distinguished from their colleagues; they now come forward to associate themselves with the guilty, in order to retard justice by new impediments." Robert Lindet replied that the intention was to try the entire government, that he had been a member of it, that in consequence, he ought not to consent that a distinction should be made between him and his colleagues, and that he claimed his share of the responsibility. One could hardly resist such an act of generosity and courage; Robert Lindet obtained permission to speak. He depicted at great length the immense labours of the committee of public welfare; he demonstrated its activity, its foresight, and its eminent services; and made every body sensible that the excitement of zeal produced by the struggle had alone caused the excesses with which certain members of that government were charged. This speech, which lasted six hours, was not heard without many interruptions. The ingrates, already forgetting the services of the accused, considered this enumeration of the obligations owing to them rather tedious; and some members even had the indecency to say that this speech ought to be printed at Lindet's expence, because it would cost the republic too much. The Girondists were ruffled on hearing the federalist insurrection alluded to, and the calamities it had caused. Every party found something to complain of. At length, the assembly adjourned to the following day, making up its mind not to allow any more of those long depositions in favour of the accused. Carnot and Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or) desired, however, to be heard in their turn; they were anxious, like Lindet, to generously afford assistance to their colleagues, and at the same time to justify themselves against a great cloud of accusations, which could not be urged against Billaud, Colot, and Barrère, without involving them also. The signatures of Carnot and Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or), were in point of fact found on those orders which contained the gravest accusations. Carnot, whose reputation was very great, of whom it was said in France and throughout Europe, that he organized the means of obtaining victory, and whose courageous contests with Saint-Just and Robespierre were well known, Carnot could not be heard with indifference and without a sort of respect. He obtained leave to speak. "It belongs to myself," said he, "to justify the committee of public welfare; it belongs to myself, who first dared to openly attack Robespierre and Saint-Just;" and he might have added, to myself, who dared attack them while you obeyed their slightest orders, and decreed at their pleasure all the executions they required at your hands. He first explained how his signature and that of his colleagues, who had no concern whatever in the political acts of the committee, nevertheless appeared at the foot of the most sanguinary orders. "Overwhelmed," said he, by the immense pressure of business, having three or four hundred matters to settle every day, and very often no time for meals, we had agreed to lend our signatures to one another; we signed a multitude of documents without reading them; I signed orders for placing persons under accusation, and my colleagues signed orders for military movements and plans of attack, without either one or the other having time to enter into any explanation concerning them.

The necessity for this immense labour had required that individual dictatorship, which each one had reciprocally granted to the other. Without this, the business never could have been got through. The order to arrest one of the most useful of my employés in the war department, an order for which I attacked Saint-Just and Robespierre and denounced them as usurpers, that very order I had signed without knowing it. Thus our signature proves nothing, and it cannot be adduced in evidence of our participation in the acts laid to the charge of the late government." Carnot then endeavoured to justify his accused colleagues. Though admitting, without expressly saying so, that they had formed part of the passionate and violent men of the committee, he declared that they had been the first to rise up against the triumvirate, and that the indomitable character of Billaud-Varennes had been the greatest obstacle that Robespierre had encountered in his progress. Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or), who in the manufacture of the arms and ammunition, had rendered quite as great services as Carnot, and who had given the same signatures and in precisely the same manner, repeated Carnot's declaration, and insisted, like him and Lindet, on sharing the responsibility which pressed upon the accused.

Here the convention found itself plunged again into the perplexities of a discussion which had been several times opened, and which had never terminated in anything else than a frightful confusion. Was not this example, afforded by three men enjoying universal consideration and voluntarily declaring themselves jointly responsible for the late government, a warning for the convention? was it of no consequence that every body had more or less been an accomplice of the old committees, and that the convention herself ought to come forward and seek to be put in irons, as did Lindet, Carnot, and Prieur? In point of fact, the convention had not attacked tyranny till after the three men whom she now wished to punish as her accomplices; and as for their passions, she had identified herself with them all; she was even more culpable than they, if she had not participated in their feelings, for she had sanctioned all their excesses.

Thus, during the 4th, 5th, and 6th Germinal (24th, 25th, and 26th of March), the discussion became a frightful squabble. Every moment the name of a fresh member was brought in question, that member demanded permission to justify himself, he recriminated in his turn; and on one side and the other digressions equally long and dangerous took place. It was then decreed that the accused and the members of the commission should alone have the privilege of speaking, for the purpose of discussing the facts, article by article, and every deputy was forbidden to attempt to justify himself even if his name were mentioned. It was no good passing this decree; every moment the discussion again became general, and there was not an act but was flung back from one to the other with fearful violence. The commotion which existed on the preceding days kept still increasing; there was but one pass word in the faubourgs. We must go to the convention, to demand bread, the constitution of 1793, and the release of the patriots. Unfortunately, the quantity of flour necessary for furnishing the eighteen hundred sacks not having arrived in Paris on the 6th, there could not be distributed on the morning of the 7th more than a half ration, with a promise of the other half in the evening. The women of the section of the Gravilliers, in the quarter of the Temple, refused the half ration offered them, and assembled tumultuously in the Rue du Vert Bois. Some of them, who had their cue, strove to form a mob, and taking with them all the women whom they met, bent their steps towards the convention. While they were on their road thither, the leaders ran to the house of the president of the section, forcibly seized his bell and the keys of the hall of meeting, and set about forming an illegal assembly. They appointed a president, and a secretary, and read several times that article of the declaration of rights which proclaimed insurrection to be a right and a duty. The women had meanwhile pursued their way to the convention, and were making a great noise at the doors. They desired to be introduced en masse; but no more than twenty were let in. One of them boldly spoke in their name, and complained that they had received only half a pound of bread. The president having attempted to reply, they shouted, "Bread! bread!" They interrupted by the same cry the explanation which Boissy-d'Anglas would have given respecting the distribution of the morning. At last they were made to withdraw, and the discussion relative to the accused was resumed. The committee of general safety caused these women to be brought back by patrols, and sent one of its members to dissolve the assembly illegally formed in the section of the Gravilliers. Those who composed it refused at first to comply with the exhortations of the representative sent to them; but on seeing the armed force they dispersed. In the night, the principal instigators were apprehended and conveyed to prison.

This was the third attempt to raise a commotion; on the 27th Ventôse, people had rioted on account of the allowance system; on the 1st Germinal, on account of the petition of the Quinze-Vingts; and on the 7th on account of the insufficient distribution of bread. A general movement it was feared would take place on the Decadi, a day of idleness and appropriated to the meetings of the sections. To prevent the dangers of meeting at night, it was decided that the sectional assemblies should be held between the hours of one and four. This was but a very petty measure, and one which could not possibly prevent the conflict. Every body felt that the principal cause of these uprisings was the accusation preferred against the late members of the committee of public welfare; and the incarceration of the patriots. Many deputies would willingly have abandoned prosecutions which, were they just, were certainly dangerous. Rouzet devised a plan which would dispense with the passing of sentence on the accused, and which at the same time would save their lives; this was banishment by ostracism. When a citizen should have made his name a subject of discord, he proposed to banish him for a time. His suggestion was not listened to. Merlin (of Thionville), a warm Thermidorian and an intrepid citizen, began, nevertheless, to think that it would be better to avoid the struggle. He proposed, therefore, to convoke the primary assemblies, to immediately put the constitution in force, and to refer the trial of the accused to the future legislature. Merlin (of Douai) strongly supported this advice. Guyton-Morveau suggested a more decided course. "The procedure we are now instituting," said he, "is a public scandal; where should we stop, were we to prosecute all those who have made more sanguinary motions than those with which the accused are charged? In good sooth, no one knows whether we are concluding or recommencing our revolution." Every one, as might be expected, was startled at the idea of committing at such a moment the supreme authority to a new assembly; neither was it disposed to give France a constitution so absurd as that of 1793. It was therefore declared that there were no grounds for discussing the propositions of the two Merlins. As for the procedure already commenced, too many private motives of revenge were gratified by its being continued, to admit of its being abandoned; and it was merely decided that the assembly, in order that it might be able to attend to its other business, should only devote every alternate day to the hearing of the accused.

Such a decision was not calculated to quiet the patriots. The Decadi (10th Germinal) was spent in mutual reciprocations of anger. The sectional assemblies were very tumultuous; nevertheless, the so much dreaded commotion did not take place. In the section of the Quinze-Vingts a new petition was drawn up; it was bolder than the first, and was to be presented on the following day. It was, in fact, read at the bar of the convention. "Why," it asked, "is Paris without a municipality? Why are the popular societies shut up? What has become of the harvest crops? Why are assignats falling every day? Why are the young men of the Palais Royal alone allowed to congregate? How is it that none but the patriots are in prison? The people at last desire to be free. They know that when they are oppressed, insurrection is the first of their duties." The petition was read amid the murmurs of a large portion of the assembly and the applause of the Mountain. The president Pelet (of the Lozère) received the petitioners rather sternly and dismissed them. The only satisfaction granted was to send to the sections the list of the imprisoned patriots, that they might be enabled to judge whether there were any who deserved to be specially protected.

The rest of the 11th Germinal (March 31) was spent in agitations in the faubourgs. People every where said that they must go the next day to the convention, to demand once more all that they had not yet been able to obtain from her. This intelligence circulated from mouth to mouth, in all the quarters occupied by the patriots. The leaders of each section, without having any settled object, wished to excite a general rising, and to propel the entire mass of the populace upon the convention. Next day, the 12th Germinal (April 1) men, women, and boys actually made a general uprising in the section of the Cité, and assembled round the bakers' doors, preventing those whom they found there from accepting the ration, and endeavouring to draw every body in the direction of the Tuileries. The ringleaders at the same time set on foot all sorts of rumours; they said that the convention was on the point of departing to Chalons, and leaving the people of Paris to their fate; that they had disarmed the section of the Graviillers in the night; that the young men had assembled, to the number of thirty thousand, in the Champ de Mars, and that with their aid they were going to disarm all the patriot sections. They forced the authorities of the section of the Cité to give up their drums; they took them away, and began to beat the generale through the streets. The flame spread with rapidity; the population of the Temple and the faubourg Saint-Antoine turned out, and proceeding along the quays and the boulevard, directed its course toward the Tuileries. This formidable assemblage consisted of women, boys, and drunken men, the latter armed with bludgeons, and having this inscription on their hats, Bread and the constitution of 1793.

At this moment the convention was hearing Boissy d'Anglas reading a report on the various systems adopted in regard to provisions. The convention had but her ordinary guard around her; the mob had reached her doors, and filled the Carousel and the Tuileries, and obstructed all the avenues, so that the numerous patrols scattered through Paris could not come to the aid of the national representation. The mob entered the hall of Liberty, which was before you came to the hall where the assembly held her sittings, and prepared to force its way into the latter. The officers and the guard strove to stop them: men, armed with bludgeons, dashed forward, dispersed all who attempted to resist, rushed against the doors, burst them open, and at last came like a torrent amidst the assembly, hallooing, waving their hats, and raising a cloud of dust. Bread! bread! the constitution of 1793! Such was the vociferous outcry of this blinded rabble. The deputies did not leave their seats, and displayed a commanding firmness. Of a sudden one of them rose, and cried, The republic for ever! All followed his example, and the mob also set up the same cry, but also added, Bread! the constitution of 1793! The members of the left, alone uttered a few bursts of cheering, and did not seem sorry to see the populace among them. That multitude, for which no plan had been designed, and whom its leaders desired to use for no other purpose than to intimidate the convention, introduced itself among the deputies, and sat down beside them, but without daring to offer them any kind of violence. Legendre began to speak. "If ever," said he, "malice—" He was not suffered to proceed. "Down! down!" cried the rabble; "we have no bread!" Merlin (of Thionville), still as courageous as at Mentz or in La Vendée, left his seat, went down amidst the populace, spoke to several of those men, embraced and was embraced by them, and exhorted them to pay due respect to the convention. "To thy place!" cried some of the Mountaineers. "My place," replied Merlin, "is among the people. These men have just assured me that they have no bad intention; that they have no wish to intimidate the convention by their number; that on the contrary, they are ready to defend the convention, and that they have come hither merely to make the convention acquainted with their necessities." "Yes, yes," still shouted the crowd, "we want bread!"

At these words, shouts were heard in the hall of Liberty; another popular billow had rolled on after the first; there was a second irruption of men, women, and boys, shouting all at once, "Bread! bread!" Legendre would have recommenced what he was going to say; they interrupted him again by shouting out, "Down!"

The Mountaineers were perfectly sensible that in this state the convention, oppressed, degraded, and gagged, could neither listen, speak, or deliberate, and that the very object of the insurrection was a failure, since the desired decrees could not be passed. Gaston and Duroi, both sitting on the left, rose and complained of the state to which the assembly was reduced. Gaston went up to the people. "My friends," said he, "you want bread, the release of the patriots, and the constitution; but to effect this we must deliberate, and that we cannot do if you remain here." The noise prevented Gaston from being heard. André Dumont, who had succeeded the president in the chair, in vain attempted to give the same reasons to the mob; he was not heard. The Mountaineer, Huguet, was the only one who contrived to make a few words understood. "The people who are here," said he, "are not in insurrection; they are come to make a just demand; namely, the release of the patriots. People, relinquish not your rights!" At this moment, a man came up to the bar, passing through the crowd which opened before him; it was one Vanec, who commanded the section of the Cité at the time of the 31st of May. "Representatives," said he, "you see before you the men of the 14th of July, of the 10th of August, and what is more, of the 31st of May." Here the galleries, the populace, and the Mountain cheered most vehemently. "These men," continued Vanec, "have sworn to live in freedom or to die. Your divisions rend the country: it ought not to suffer further from your animosities. Set the patriots at liberty, and give bread to the people. Do us justice upon Fréron's army, and upon those gentlemen of the bludgeon. And as for thee, sacred Mountain," proceeded the speaker, turning towards the benches of the left, "for thee, who hast fought so hard for the republic, the men of the 14th of July, of the 10th of August, and of the 31st of May, acknowledge thee as their own in this critical moment; thou wilt find them ever ready to support thee, ever ready to pour forth their blood for the country." Shouts and cheers accompanied the concluding words of Vanec. One voice in the assembly seemed to be raised against him, but it could hardly be distinguished. They called upon him who had any thing to say against Vanec to speak up. "Yes, yes," exclaimed Duhem, "let him speak out." The orators of several sections succeeded one another at the bar, and in more measured terms, made precisely the same demands as did the section of the Cité. The president, Dumont, replied with firmness that the convention would devote her attention to the wishes and wants of the people, so soon as she could resume her labours. "Let her do so immediately," replied several voices; "we are in want of bread." The tumult lasted thus for several hours. The president was exposed to remarks of all kinds. "Royalism is in the chair," said Choudieu to him. "Our enemies are raising the storm," replied Dumont; "they know not that the thunderbolt will fall upon their own heads." "Yes," rejoined Rumpis, "the thunderbolt is your youth of the Palais Royal." "Bread! bread!" shouted the women in their fury.

Meanwhile, the sound of the tocsin was heard from the Tower of L'Unité. The committees, in point of fact, were, in accordance with the law of the grand police, calling the sections together. Several of them had taken arms, and were on their road to the convention. The Mountaineers were perfectly sensible that they ought to make haste in order to transmute the wishes of the patriots into decrees; but for this purpose it was necessary to extricate the assembly as far as it could be done, and to give them room to breathe. "President," cried Duhem, "exhort the good citizens to go forth, in order that we may be able to deliberate." He then addressed the people. "The tocsin has been ringing," said he, "the generale has beaten in the sections; if you will not let us deliberate, the country is undone." Choudieu would have taken a woman by the arm to turn her out. "We are at home," replied she angrily. Choudieu called upon the president, and told him that if he did not know how to perform his duty, and cause the hall to be cleared, he had only to give up the chair to another. He again addressed the people. "A snare is laid for you," said he; "retire that we may fulfil your wishes." The people, observing signs of impatience exhibited by the whole Mountain, began to withdraw. The example once set was gradually followed. The immense crowd began to thin in the interior of the hall, and began to sensibly diminish outside. The parties of young men would not have been able this day to have done any thing against this immense multitude; but the numerous battalions of the sections, obedient to the convention, were already coming in from all quarters, and the mob retired before them. Towards evening, the hall was entirely cleared both within and without, and the convention became perfectly quiet again.

The assembly had scarcely been delivered from this inconvenience, than the continuation of the report of Boissy d'Anglas was called for, which had been interrupted by the irruption of the populace. The assembly was by no means perfectly at ease, and wanted to prove that, when unrestrained, her earliest attention was occupied with the affording provision to the people. At the conclusion of his report, Boissy proposed to select from the sections of Paris an armed force to protect in the environs the arrival of the corn by the boats. The decree was passed. Prieur (of the Marne) proposed that the distribution of bread with the labouring people should begin with the labourers. This suggestion was likewise adopted. The evening was already far advanced. A considerable force was assembled about the convention. A few factious men, who still held out, had assembled, some at the section of the Quinze-Vingts, the others in the section of the Cité. These latter had taken possession of the church of Notre-Dame, and, as it were, had entrenched themselves therein. However, no further apprehension was entertained, and the assembly was fully capable of punishing the illegalities of the day.

Isabeau presented himself in the name of the committees, and made a report on the events of the day, the manner in which the assemblages had been formed, the direction which they had received, and the measures the committees had taken for their dispersion in conformity with the law of 1st Germinal. He reported that Anguis the deputy, who had been commissioned to go round to the different quarters of Paris, had been stopped by the factions and had been wounded, and that Penière, who was sent to rescue him, had also been shot at and wounded. At this statement cries of indignation burst forth, and vengeance was demanded. Isabeau proposed, 1. to declare that on this day the privilege of the sittings of the convention had been violated; 2. to authorize the committees to make inquiries as to the authors of that outrage. On hearing this proposition, the Mountaineers, seeing what an advantage was going to be derived against them from the failure of an attempt, uttered groans. Three-fourths of the assembly rose, requiring that it should be put to the vote. It was on all sides said that this was enacting a 20th of June against the national representation, that this day the hall of the assembly had been invaded in precisely the same manner as they had on the 20th of June stormed the king's palace; and that if the convention did not inflict punishment, a 10th of August would soon be prepared for her. Sergeant, a deputy of the Mountain, would have laid this movement to the charge of the Feuillans, the Lameths, and the Duports, who, from London, strove, he said, to urge the patriots to imprudent excesses. He was told that he was digressing. Thibaudeau, who during this scene had withdrawn from the assembly, indignant at the outrage committed upon her, rushed to the tribune. "It is there," he exclaimed, pointing to the left side, "there you will find the minority that is conspiring! I declare that I absented myself for four hours, because I no longer saw the national representation here. However, I now return, and I support the project of the decree. The time of weakness is past. It is the weakness of the national representation that has always compromised it, and has given encouragement to a criminal faction. The salvation of the country is this day in your hands; you will lose it if you are weak." The decree was passed with great cheering; and those fits of rage and vengeance, which rouse themselves at the recollection of the dangers that have been incurred, now began to burst forth on all sides. André Dumont, who had filled the chair in the midst of that stormy scene, rushed to the tribune. He complained of the threats and insults of which he had been the object; he called to mind that Chasles and Choudieu, at the time they were pointing him out to the people, said that royalism was in the chair; that Fousseidoire had proposed the preceding day, standing in the midst of a party, to disarm the national guard. Fousseidoire gave him the lie; but a great number of deputies nevertheless asserted that they heard him. "Besides," resumed Dumont, "I despise all those enemies who would have pointed their daggers against me; it is the leaders who ought to be stricken. They have this day wanted to save the Billauts, the Collots, the Barrères; I shall not propose to you to send them to death, for they are not yet tried, and the time of assassinations is past, but I propose to banish them from the territory they infect and agitate by their seditions. I propose to you, the transportation this very night of the four accused, whose cause you have for some days past been agitating." This proposal was received with lively applause. The members of the Mountain demanded the call by name of the members, and several of them went to the table to sign the demand for it. "'Tis the last effort," said Bourdon, "of a minority whose treason is confounded; I propose to you, in addition, the arrest of Choudieu, Chasles, and Fousseidoire." These two motions were then decreed. Thus terminated in transportation the long proceedings against Billaut, Collot, Barrère, and Vadier; Choudieu, Chasles, and Fousseidoire were put under arrest. But the convention did not stop there; it was recollected that Huguet had made a speech during the invasion of the hall, and had exclaimed, "People, be not unmindful of your rights!" that Leonard Bourdon had presided at the popular meeting in the Rue du Vert-Bois, and that he had incited that section to revolt by his incessant declamations; that Duhem openly encouraged the rioters during the irruption of the rabble; that on the preceding days, he was seen at the Payen coffee-house, in the section of the Invalides, drinking with the principal leaders of the Terrorists, and inciting them to insurrection. A decree of arrest was consequently passed against Huguet, Leonard Bourdon, and Duhem. Many others were denounced; among these was Amar, the most abhorred member of the old committee of general safety, and reputed to be the most dangerous of the Mountaineers. The convention caused this latter to be arrested. In order to remove from Paris these self-named leaders of the conspiracy, it was moved that they should be confined in the castle of Ham. The motion was carried, and it was moreover settled that they should be transferred thither immediately. It was next proposed to declare Paris in a state of siege till the danger should be entirely over. General Pichegru was at this moment in Paris, and in the full lustre of his glory. He was appointed commander of the armed force so long as the danger should last; with him were joined Barras and Merlin (of Thionville). It was six o'clock in the morning of the 13th Germinal (2d of April), when the assembly, exhausted with fatigue, broke up, fully confiding in the measures she had adopted.

The committees took the necessary steps to carry into execution without delay the decrees that had just been passed. The very same morning, the four transports were put into carriages, although one of them, Barrère, was extremely ill, and they were sent by the Orleans road for Brest. The same promptitude was exhibited in the departure of the seven deputies who were to be confined in the castle of Ham. The carriages had to pass through the Champs Elysées; the patriots knew this, and a crowd had collected on their way to stop them. When the carriages came up, preceded by the gendarmerie, a great crowd gathered round them. Some said that it was the convention withdrawing to Chalons, and carrying off the money in the treasury; others, on the contrary, said that it was the patriot deputies, unjustly borne away from the presence of the convention, and whom no one had a right to forcibly remove from their functions. They dispersed the gendarmerie, and took the carriages to the civil committee of the section of the Champs-Élysées. At the same moment, another mob fell upon the post stationed at the barrière de L'Etoile, seized the cannon, and turned them upon the avenue. The officer commanding the gendarmerie attempted in vain to parley with the insurgents; he was assaulted, and compelled to take to flight. He made the best of his way to Gras-Cailhou, to demand assistance; but the cannoniers of the section threatened to fire upon him if he did not retreat. At this moment there came up several battalions of the sections and several hundred young men under the command of Pichegru, proud of being commanded by so celebrated a general. The insurgents fired two cannon shot, and kept up a brisk fire of musquetry. Raffet, who on that day commanded the sections, received a musket-shot close to the muzzle; Pichegru himself ran the greatest risks, and was twice aimed at. However, his presence, and the confidence he imparted to those under his command, decided the day. The insurgents were put to flight, and the carriages set off without further impediment. They still had to disperse the meeting of the section of the Quinze-Vingts, joined by that formed at the church of Nôtre Dame. There it was that the factions had erected themselves into a permanent assembly, and were designing a new insurrection. Pichegru repaired thither, cleared the hall of the section, and completely restored public order.

On the following day, he introduced himself to the convention, and informed her that the decrees had been carried into execution. Unanimous cheers received the conqueror of Holland, who, by his presence in Paris had just rendered a fresh service to the state. "The conqueror of tyrants," replied the president, "could not fail to triumph over the factions." He received the fraternal embrace and the honours of the sitting; and remained several hours open to the observation of the assembly and of the public, every eye being fixed on him alone. No one took the pains to inquire as to the cause of his conquests, or to distinguish as to those which were the effect of fortunate coincidences; they judged according to the event, and were lost in the admiration of so brilliant a career.

This audacious attempt of the Jacobins, which we cannot better characterize than by terming it a 20th of June, excited an increased irritation against them, and called for fresh repressive measures against them. A rigid inquiry was directed, for the discovery of all the clues of the conspiracy, which was erroneously attributed to the members of the Mountain. These latter had no communication with the popular agitators, and their intercourse with them was confined to a few accidental coffee-house meetings, and to some encouragement in words; nevertheless, the committee of general safety was commissioned to make a general report.

The conspiracy was supposed to be the more extensive, because there had been commotions in all the provinces washed by the Rhone and the Mediterranean, at Lyons, Avignon, Marseilles, and Toulon. Already had the patriots been denounced as quitting the communes, where they had signalized themselves by excesses, and by armed assemblies in the principal towns, either to escape the observation of their fellow-citizens, or to join their fellows there, and to identify themselves with them. It was commonly said that they were wandering about the country bordering on the Rhone, that they were passing to and fro in numerous bands in the environs of Avignon, Nîmes, and Arles, and in the plains of La Crau, and were committing depredations upon those inhabitants reputed royalists. To their charge was laid the death of a wealthy individual, a magistrate of Avignon, who had been robbed and murdered. At Marseilles they were hardly restrained by the presence of the representatives, and by the measures which had been taken to place the city in a state of siege. At Toulon they had met in great number, and formed a concourse of several thousand persons, much in the same way as the federalists had done at General Carteaux's arrival. They lorded it over the town by their establishing meetings with the officials of the dockyard and navy, who had almost all of them been appointed by the younger Robespierre after the recapture of the place. They had numerous partisans among the workmen in the arsenal, whose number was upwards of twelve thousand; and all these men, when collected together, had the means of committing the greatest excesses. At this moment the squadron, completely repaired, was ready to sail. The representative Létournour was on board the admiral's ship; the marines had gone on board the fleet, and the expedition was said to be destined for Corsica. The revolutionists, taking advantage of the moment when there was left only an inefficient garrison, on which no great reliance could be placed, and among whom they could count many adherents, contrived a riot, and under the special protection of the three representatives, Mariette, Ritter, and Chambon, murdered seven prisoners accused of emigration. At the latter end of Ventôse (March) they repeated the same outrages. Twenty prisoners taken in an enemy's frigate were in one of the forts; they insisted that they were emigrants, and that the government intended to pardon them. They roused the twelve thousand workmen belonging to the arsenal, beleaguering the representatives, who narrowly escaped being murdered, but were fortunately repressed by a battalion set on shore by the squadron.

These facts, coinciding with those in Paris, increased the alarm of the government, and augmented its severity. It had already enjoined all the members of the municipal administrations, and the revolutionary committees, as well as of the popular and military commissions, and all officials dismissed since the 9th of Thermidor, to quit the towns to which they had repaired, and to return to their respective communes. A still more severe decree was enacted against them. They had obtained possession of arms distributed in times of danger; it was decreed that all those who were known in France as having contributed to that portentous tyranny abolished on the 9th Thermidor should be disarmed. It was the peculiar province of each municipal assembly, or each sectional assembly, to indicate the accomplices of that tyranny, and to them was committed the charge of disarming them. It is easy to conceive to what dangerous proceedings this decree was about to expose them, at a time when they had been exciting so fearful a sensation against them.

These measures did not stop there. They desired to take from the Jacobins the ostensible leaders they possessed on the benches of the Mountain. Although the three principal had been condemned to transportation, although seven men more, Choudieu, Chasles, Foussedoire, Leonard Bourdon, Huguet, Duhem, and Amar, had been sent to the castle of Ham, still it was thought that others quite as formidable were left. Cambon, the dictator of the finances, and the inexorable adversary of the Thermidorians, whom he never pardoned for having ventured to cast a slur upon his integrity, appeared at least to stand in their way; nay more, he was even considered a dangerous man. It was asserted that on the morning of the 12th, he had said to the clerks of the treasury, "There are three hundred of you here, and in case of danger you will be able to make a stand,"—words which he was likely enough to have uttered, and which would prove his conformity of sentiments, but not his absolute participation with the Jacobins. Thuriot, formerly a Thermidorian, but since the reinstatement of the seventy-three, and the twenty-two members, converted into a Mountaineer, a deputy possessing great influence, was also considered as a leader of the faction. In the same category was placed Crassous, who had become one of the most energetic supporters of the Jacobins; Lesage-Senault, who had contributed to cause their club to be shut up, but who had since taken alarm at the reaction; Lecointre (of Versailles), the declared adversary of Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, and who since the return of the Girondins had gone back to the Mountain; Maignet, the incendiary of the south; Ilentz, the terrible proconsul of La Vendée; Levassour (of La Sarthe), one of those who had contributed to the death of Philippeau and Granet (of Marseilles) accused of being the instigator of the revolutionists of the south. It was Tallien who pointed them out, and who, after selecting them at the very tribune of the assembly, called for their being arrested like their seven colleagues, and sent with them to Ham. Tallien's desire was complied with, and they were condemned to undergo this imprisonment.

Thus this movement of the patriots caused them to be prosecuted and disarmed throughout all France, and sent back to their respective communes, and also caused the loss of a score of Mountaineers, of whom some were transported and others imprisoned: every movement of a party that is not strong enough to carry all before it, serves but to hasten its destruction.

The Thermidorians, after they had dealt their blows against the persons, next attacked the things. The commission of seven, commissioned to report upon the organic laws of the constitution, declared without any reservation that the constitution was so loosely worded that it must be reconstructed. A commission of eleven was then appointed to present a new plan. Unfortunately, the victories of their adversaries, so far from reducing the revolutionists to order, only tended to excite them still further, and to stir up on their part unheard-of and perilous exertions.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE NEGOTIATIONS AT BÂLE CONTINUED.—TREATY OF PEACE WITH HOLLAND—CONDITIONS OF THIS TREATY—ANOTHER TREATY OF PEACE WITH PRUSSIA—POLICY ADOPTED BY AUSTRIA AND THE OTHER STATES OF THE EMPIRE—PEACE WITH TUSCANY—NEGOTIATIONS WITH LA VENDEE AND BRITANNY—SUBMISSION OF CHARCIEU AND THE OTHER LEADERS.—STOFFLET CONTINUES THE WAR.—POLICY OF HOCHÉ IN RESPECT OF THE PACIFICATION OF THE WEST.—INTRIGUES OF THE ROYALIST AGENTS—THE SIMULATED PEACE OF THE INSURGENT LEADERS IN BRITANNY.—STATE OF AUSTRIA AND ENGLAND; PLANS OF PITT, DISCUSSIONS IN THE ENGLISH PARLIAMENT.—PREPARATIONS MADE BY THE ALLIED POWERS FOR A NEW CAMPAIGN.

DURING these melancholy events, the negotiations at Bâle had been temporarily interrupted by the death of Baron Goltz. The most disagreeable reports were immediately diffused. One day it was said, the powers will never treat with a republic constantly threatened by factions; they will leave her by herself to perish in the convulsions of anarchy, without fighting and without acknowledging it. Another day, some folks asserted the very contrary: peace, said they, is concluded with Spain; the French armies will go no further: treaties are pending with England and with Russia, but at the expense of Sweden and Denmark, who are about to be sacrificed to the ambition of Pitt and Catharine, and who will receive their reward for being in friendship with France. We see that malice, differing in its reports, always imagined the very contrary to that which best suited the republic; it was this ill-feeling that alleged ruptures where peace was desired, and peace where victories were desired. At another time, the report got ground that any peace was utterly impracticable, and that on this subject a protest had been placed in the hands of the committee of public welfare by a majority of the members of the convention. It was a new movement of Duhem that had given rise to this rumour. He assumed that it was a deceit to treat with a single power, and that peace ought not to be accorded to any, until they should all together come to require it. He had left a note on this subject with the committee of public welfare, and it was this that had originated the idea of this alleged protest.

The patriots, on their part, circulated reports not less annoying. They alleged that Prussia was unduly protracting the negotiations, for the purpose of getting Holland included in one common treaty with herself, in order to keep her under her influence, and to preserve the stadtholdership.

They complained that the fate of that republic remained so long unsettled, that the French there enjoyed none of the advantages of conquest; that the assignats were there taken at not more than half their value, and from the soldiers only; that the Dutch merchants had written to the Belgian and French merchants, that they were ready to deal with them, but only on condition of being paid in advance and in a metallic currency; that the Dutch had allowed the stadtholder to go off, and to take with him whatever he pleased, and had sent to London, by the East India Company's ships, a great portion of their wealth. Many difficulties had, in fact, arisen in Holland, either on account of the conditions of the peace, or owing to the vehement enthusiasm of the patriotic party. The committee of public welfare had sent thither two of its members, of sufficient influence to have terminated all the differences which had arisen. To forward the success of the negotiation, the committee had requested the convention to allow them to abstain from indicating either their names or the object of their mission. The assembly had consented thereto, and they had set out immediately.

It was natural that such important events and such high interests should excite hopes and fears, and such contradictory reports. But, in spite of all these rumours, the conferences were continued with success; Count Hardenberg had succeeded Baron de Goltz at Bâle, and the conditions were nearly settled on one side and the other.

Scarcely had these negotiations been opened, when the exigency of the circumstances began to be sensibly felt, and required modifications in the powers of the committee of public welfare. A perfectly open government, which could not conceal anything, could not decide anything of itself, and could do nothing without a public deliberation, would be incapable of negotiating a treaty with any power, even the most independent. In order to effectuate treaties, it becomes necessary to sign suspensions of hostilities, and neutralize other countries; secrecy is most especially necessary, for a power sometimes negotiates long before it is deemed expedient to avow it. Thus is not all: there are frequently articles which must remain unknown. If a power promises, for example, to unite his forces with those of another, if he stipulates either for the junction of an army or of a squadron, or for any co-operation whatever of measures, this secret becomes of the utmost importance. How could the committee of public welfare, renewed in the proportion of one-fourth every month, obliged to render an account of every thing, and not possessing the energy or the boldness of the old committee, who was capable of taking every thing upon itself,—how could it have negotiated, especially with powers ashamed of their blunders, not admitting that they were defeated without the greatest reluctance, and insisting upon either leaving secret conditions, or not publishing their treaty until it should be signed? The necessity which required the committee to send two of its members to Holland, without making known either their names or their mission, was a remarkable proof how essential an ingredient secrecy is in diplomatic operations. The committee consequently presented a decree which conferred on it the powers indispensably necessary to effect a treaty, and this gave rise to fresh rumours.

A curious spectacle for the theory of governments is that of a democracy, surmounting its indiscreet curiosity, its distrust of power, and, overpowered by necessity, granting to a few individuals the faculty of even stipulating for secret conditions. This is what the national convention did. She conferred on the committee of public welfare the power even of stipulating for armistices, neutralising territories, negotiating treaties, settling their conditions, drawing them up, and even signing them, without reserving to herself any more than what, in fact, most indisputably belonged to her,—that is to say, the ratification. She did more. She authorized the committee to sign secret articles, on the sole condition that these articles should contain nothing derogatory to the open articles, and should be made public so soon as the motive of secrecy ceased to exist. Fortified with these powers, the committee prosecuted and concluded the negotiations opened with different states.

The peace with Holland was at length signed under the influence of Rewbell, and especially of Sieyès, who were the two members of the committee recently sent into Holland. The Dutch patriots gave a brilliant reception to the celebrated originator of the first declaration of rights, and paid him a deference which put an end to many difficulties. The conditions of peace, signed at the Hague on the 27th Floreal, year III. (May 16, 1795), were the following: The French republic acknowledged the republic of the United Provinces as a free and independent power, and guaranteed its independence and the abolition of the stadtholdership. There was to be an alliance, offensive and defensive, between the two republics, for the entire duration of the present war. This offensive and defensive alliance was to be perpetual between the two republics in every case of war against England. The republic of the United Provinces placed at that time at the disposal of France twelve ships of the line and eighteen frigates, to be employed principally in the German Ocean, the North Sea, and the Baltic Sea. This republic, moreover, gave in aid of France half her land army, which, in good sooth, was reduced to almost nothing, and required to be entirely reorganized. As to the demarcations of territory, they were fixed as follows: France was to keep all Dutch Wlanders, in such a manner as to fill up the measure of her territory towards the sea, and to extend it to the mouths of the rivers. In the quarter of the Meuse and Rhine, she was to have possession of Venloo and Maesricht, and all the countries comprehended to the south of Venloo, on both sides of the Meuse. Thus the republic relinquished the idea of extending herself on this point to the Rhine, which was reasonable enough. In this quarter, in fact, the Rhine, the Meuse, and the Scheldt flow together in such a manner that there is no longer any clear boundary. Which of these arms of rivers ought to be considered as the Rhine? No one knows, and on this point all is matter of settled understanding. Besides, in this quarter, France is not exposed to any other hostility than that of Holland, an hostility by no means formidable, and not requiring the protection of a marked boundary.

Lastly, as the territory assigned by nature to Holland, consists of tracts formed by alluvial soil borne down to the mouths of the rivers, France, in order to extend herself so far as to any one of the principal beds of the stream, must have seized three-fourths at least of those grounds, and nearly annihilated that republic which she had been so recently liberating. The Rhine does not become a boundary for France in respect of Germany till near Wesel, and the possession of the two banks of the Meuse to the south of Venloo left that question untouched. The French republic, moreover, reserved to itself the power, in case of war in the quarter of the Rhine or Zealand, of putting garrisons into the fortresses of Grave, Bois-le-Duc, and Bergen-op-Zoom. The port of Flushing was to remain as common to both. Thus all precautions were taken. The navigation of the Rhine, the Meuse, the Scheldt, the Hondt, and all their branches, was for ever declared free. Besides these advantages, an indemnity of one hundred millions of florins was paid by Holland. To indemnify the latter for these sacrifices, France promised, at the general pacification, indemnities of territory taken from the conquered countries, and in a situation most suitable for the clear demarcation of the mutual boundaries.

This treaty rested on the most reasonable basis; the conqueror showed himself therein equally generous and intelligent. It has been foolishly observed, that in attaching Holland to her alliance, France exposed her to the loss of half her vessels detained in the ports of England, and especially her colonies, left defenceless to the ambition of Pitt; Holland, left neutral, would neither have recovered her shipping or preserved her colonies, and Pitt would still have found a pretext for seizing them on behalf of the stadtholder. The mere preservation of the stadtholdership, without saving in a certain manner the ships, or the Dutch colonies, would have at least taken away every possible pretext from English ambition; but was the upholding of the stadtholdership, with the political principles of France, with the promises made to the Batavian patriots, in conformity with the spirit which animated them, or with the hopes conceived by them when they opened their gates to us, either practicable, consistent, or even honourable?

The conditions with Prussia were more easy to settle. Bischoffverder had recently been imprisoned. The king of Prussia, delivered from mystical refinements, had conceived a perfectly new ambition. He no longer talked of preserving the principles of general order; he rather desired to make himself the mediator of universal pacification. The treaty with him was signed at Bale on the 16th Germinal. (April 5, 1795.) In the first place, it was agreed that there should be peace, amity, and good understanding between his majesty the king of Prussia and the French republic; that the troops of the latter should evacuate that part of the Prussian states they were occupying on the right bank of the Rhine; that they should continue to occupy the Prussian provinces on the left bank, and that the definitive state of those provinces should not be settled till the general pacification. According to this last condition it was very evident that the republic, without as yet explaining herself positively, thought of appropriating to herself the boundary of the Rhine; but that until new victories over the states of the Empire and Austria, she postponed the solution of the difficulties to which this important determination must have given rise. Then only would she be able either to dispossess the one, or to give indemnities to the others. The French republic engaged to avail herself of the mediation of the king of Prussia for the purpose of effecting her reconciliation with the princes and states of the Germanic empire; she even engaged, for the space of three months, not to treat as enemies such of the princes of the right bank, in whose favour his Prussian majesty might interest himself. This was a sure way to bring the whole empire to solicit peace through the mediation of Prussia.

Accordingly, this treaty was no sooner signed, than the cabinet of Berlin caused its determination, and the motives which had influenced it, to be solemnly announced to the empire. The cabinet of Berlin declared to the diet that it tendered its good offices to the empire if it were desirous of peace; and if the majority of the states refused peace, to such of them as should be obliged to treat separately for their individual safety. Austria, on her part, addressed some very severe remarks to the diet; she said that she desired peace as much as any one, but that she believed it to be impossible; that she would choose the proper time for treating thereupon, and that the states of the empire would find it much more to their advantage to rely upon the long and well known faith of Austria, than upon perjured powers who had violated every one of their engagements. The diet, so as to assume the appearance of preparing for war, at the same time that it solicited peace, decreed the quintuple contingent for this campaign, and stipulated that the states who could not furnish soldiers, might dispense therewith by the payment of two hundred and forty florins a man. At the same time, it decided that Austria, having just connected herself with England, with a view to the continuance of the war, could not be the mediatrix of peace, and resolved to confide that mediation to Prussia. There was nothing more to settle than the form and the manner in which the deputation was to be formed.

Notwithstanding this strong desire to treat, the empire could hardly do so collectively, for it must have required, on behalf of its members stripped of their territories, restitutions which France could not make without renouncing the line of the Rhine. But it was evident, that in this inability to treat collectively, each prince would throw himself into the arms of Prussia, and would make by this mediator his separate peace.

Thus the republic began to disarm its enemies and to force them on to peace. None were firmly resolved upon war but those who had sustained great losses, and who had no hopes of recovering by negotiation what they had lost by arms. Such necessarily were the tendencies of the princes of the left bank of the Rhine who were despoiled of their territories, of Austria deprived of the Netherlands, and of Piedmont turned out from Savoy and Nice. Those, on the contrary, who had had the good sense to keep to the neutrality, congratulated themselves every day on their prudence, and the advantages derivable therefrom. Sweden and Denmark were about to send ambassadors to the convention. Switzerland, now become the depository of the trade of the continent, persisted in its wise intentions, and addressed, through the medium of M. Ochs, these sensible observations to Barthélemy, the envoy; "Switzerland cannot do without France, or France without Switzerland. In fact, it may not unreasonably be supposed, that but for the Helvetic confederation, the wrecks of the ancient kingdoms of Lorraine, Burgundy, and Arles, would have been united with the French dominions; and one can scarcely help believing that, but for the powerful diversion and decided interference of France, Helvetic liberty would have been strangled in her cradle." The neutrality of Switzerland had in fact recently rendered an eminent service to France, and had materially assisted in saving her. To these observations M. Ochs added others not less elevated. "Some day or other," said he, "the world will admire this sentiment of natural justice, which making us abhor all foreign influence in the choice of our own forms of government, forbids us for that very reason to set ourselves up for judges of the mode of public administration chosen by our neighbours. Our forefathers did not censure the great feudatories of the German empire for having swallowed up the imperial power, nor yet the royal authority of France for having curbed the great feudatories. They have successively witnessed the French nation represented by the states-general; the Richelieus and the Mazarins seize upon absolute power; Louis XIV. centre in himself the entire power of the nation; and the parliaments aspire to share the public authority in the name of the people; but never were they heard inconsiderately assuming the right to recall the French government to this or that period of its history. The happiness of France was their wish, her unity their hope, and the entirety of her territory their support."

These principles, so elevated and so just, were a pointed censure on the policy of Europe, and the results which Switzerland reaped from them were a very striking demonstration of their wisdom. Austria, jealous of her commerce, strove to cramp it by a cordon; but Switzerland appealed to Wurttemberg and the neighbouring states, and obtained justice.

The Italian powers wished for peace, at least those whose imprudence was likely to expose them some day or other to future inconveniences. Piedmont, though exhausted, had lost quite enough to desire to have recourse once more to arms. But Tuscany, inveigled in spite of herself to cease her neutrality by the English ambassador, who, threatening her with a squadron, had allowed her but twelve hours to decide, was impatient to return to her former part on the political stage, especially since the French were at the gates of Genoa. The grand duke had consequently opened a negotiation, which terminated in a treaty, the easiest to conclude of any. Good understanding and friendship between the two states were restored, and the grand duke made restitution to the republic of the corn taken from the French in his ports, at the moment of the declaration of war. This restitution he had made at his own suggestion, even before the negotiation. This treaty, beneficial to France for the trade of the south, and especially for the trade in corn, was concluded on the 21st Pluvîose (February 9).

Venice, who had recalled her envoy from France, intimated that she was about to appoint another, and to dispatch him to Paris. The pope on his part expressed regret for the outrage committed on the French. The court of Naples, led astray by the passions of an insensate Queen and the intrigues of England, was far from thinking of negotiating, and made ridiculous promises of assistance to the coalition.

Spain still had need of peace, and seemed to be only waiting to be forced into it by new reverses.

A negotiation, not less important perhaps with regard to the moral effect it was likely to produce, was that now opened at Nantes with the insurgent provinces. We have observed that the leaders of La Vendée, divided among themselves, almost deserted by their peasants, accompanied only by a few determined warriors, pressed on all sides by the republican generals, reduced to a compulsory election between an amnesty or extermination, had been induced to treat for peace; we have observed that Charette had agreed to an interview near Nantes; how the pretended Baron de Cormatin, Puisaye's major-general, had introduced himself as the mediator of Brittany; how he travelled about with Humbert, undecided between the desire of deceiving the republicans, of concerting his own plans with Charette, of seducing Canclaux, and the ambition of being the pacificator of those celebrated provinces. The common place of meeting was at Nantes. The conferences were to begin at the castle of La Jaunaye, one league from that city, on the 24th Pluvîose (February 12).

Cormatin, on his arrival at Nantes, would have wished to have got Puisaye's letter into the hands of Canclaux; but this man, who wanted to deceive the republicans, did not know how to suppress from them the knowledge of this most dangerous letter. It was discovered and published, and he was obliged to declare that the letter was spurious, that he was not the bearer of it, and that he had come in all sincerity to negotiate a peace. By this course he found himself more embarrassed than ever. This character of a skilful diplomatist duping the republicans, concerting with Charette, and seducing Canclaux, he was now completely unable to sustain, and all he could now do was to play the part of a pacificator. He saw Charette, and found him compelled by his position to treat for the moment with the enemy. From that instant, Cormatin no longer hesitated to labour for peace. It was settled between themselves that this peace should be simulated, and that while they were waiting for England to fulfil her promises, they should appear to submit themselves to the republic. They intended to obtain for the moment the best conditions possible. As soon as the conferences were opened, Cormatin and Charette delivered a note in which they demanded religious toleration, pensions for the support of all the ecclesiastics of La Vendée, exemption from military service and assessed taxes for ten years in order to repair the calamities of the war, indemnities for all devastations, the discharge of the engagements contracted by the generals for the supply of their armies, the re-establishment of the old territorial divisions of the country, and its former mode of administration, the formation of local militia under the command of the existing commanding generals, the withdrawal of all the republican armies, the exclusion of all the inhabitants of La Vendée who had left the country as patriots, and of whose property the royalists had taken possession, and lastly, an amnesty which should include emigrants as well as the Vendéans. Such demands were absurd, and could not be admitted. The representatives allowed religious toleration, indemnities for those whose cottages had been destroyed, exemption from service on behalf of the young men from the present requisition, in order to repopulate the country; the formation of local militia under the direction of the administrations to the number of two thousand men and no more; and the payment of the bonds signed by the generals to the amount of two millions. But they refused the re-establishment of the former territorial divisions and the old administrations, the exemption from taxes for ten years, the withdrawal of the republican armies, and the amnesty for the emigrants; and they required the restoration of their property to the Vendean patriots. They stipulated moreover, that all these concessions should be reduced not into a treaty, but into ordinances (arrêtés) made by the representatives on mission, and that on their part, the Vendean generals should sign a declaration, wherein they should recognise the republic, and should promise to pay obedience to her laws. A final conference was fixed for the 29 Pluviôse (February 17), for the truce would terminate on the 30th.

It was requested that before peace was concluded, Stofflet should be invited to these conferences. Several royalist officers desired this, because they thought that they ought not to treat without him; the representatives also desired it, because they had wanted to include all La Vendée in the same composition. Stofflet was at this time directed by the ambitious Bernier, who was far from being favourably inclined towards a peace that must deprive him of all his influence. Besides, Stofflet disliked playing a second-rate part, and he witnessed, with considerable loss of temper, this whole negotiation begun, continued, and ended without him. Nevertheless, he consented to repair to the conferences, and he came to La Jaunaye with a great number of his officers.

The disturbance was great. The advocates of peace and those who were for war, were in a high chafe with one another. The former attached themselves to Charette; they said that those who wished to continue the war were the very men who never went into action; that the country was ruined and reduced to the last extremity; that the foreign powers had done nothing for them, nor was it likely they ever would. They also whispered to one another, that all they could do would be to wait and gain time by a feigned peace, and that if England ever performed her promises, they would be quite ready to rise. The advocates of war said, on the contrary, that a peace was only held out for the purpose of disarming them, and then they would break all their promises, and sacrifice them with impunity; that to lay down their arms for a moment, was to enervate their courage, and render any insurrection impracticable for the future; that the circumstance of the republic negotiating was a proof that she herself was also reduced to extremity; that all they had to do was to wait awhile and exhibit somewhat more firmness, till they saw the time arrive when they would be enabled to attempt great things with the assistance of the foreign powers; that it was unworthy of French gentlemen to sign a treaty with the mental reservation of not fulfilling it; and that, moreover, they had no right to recognise the republic, for that would be to disavow the rights of those princes for whom they had so long been fighting. Several very animated conferences took place, at which considerable irritation was manifested on both sides. For a moment, indeed, violent threats were exchanged by the partisans of Charette against those of Stofflet, and they were all but coming to blows. Cormatin was not the least ardent of the advocates of peace. His fluency of speech, his restlessness of body and mind, his situation as representative of the army of Brittany, had attracted general attention. Unfortunately for him, he had about him a person named Solilhac, whom the central committee of Brittany had directed to accompany him. Solilhac, astonished to see Cormatin play so different a part from what he had been instructed, and which he had promised to fulfil, observed to him that he was departing from his instructions, and that he had not been sent thither to treat for peace. Cormatin was extremely embarrassed; Stofflet and the advocates of war triumphed when they learned that Brittany was thinking rather of contriving a delay and of concealing schemes with La Vendée than of submitting herself; they declared that they never would lay down their arms, since Brittany had determined to support them.

On the morning of the 29th Pluviôse (February 17), the council of the army of Anjou met in a separate room in the castle of La Jaunaye, to adopt a definitive determination. The leaders of Stofflet's division drew their swords, and swore to cut the throat of the first who should talk of peace; and amongst themselves they decided for war. Charette, Sapinaud, and their officers, in another room, agreed upon peace. At noon they were both to meet the representatives of the people in a tent pitched in the plain. Stofflet, not daring to declare to their faces the determination which he had adopted, sent to them to say that he should not accede to their proposals. At noon the meeting was to take place. The representatives left the detachment which accompanied them at an appointed distance, and repaired to the tent. Charette left his Vendéans at the same distance, and came unaccompanied by any other than his principal officers to the place of meeting. In the meantime, Stofflet was seen mounting his horse, with some furious partisans who accompanied him, and going off at full gallop, waving his hat and shouting Vive le Roi! In the tent where Charette and Sapinaud were conferring with the representatives, there was nothing more to discuss, for the ultimatum of the representatives had been accepted beforehand. The declarations agreed upon were mutually signed. Charette, Sapinaud, Cormatin, and the other officers, signed their submission to the laws of the republic; the representatives delivered the ordinances containing the conditions agreed on, to the Vendean chiefs. The greatest urbanity pre-valued on both sides, and every thing seemed to look forward to a sincere reconciliation.

The representatives, with a view to shed greater lustre upon the submission of Charette, prepared a magnificent reception for him at Nantes. The most lively joy prevailed in that most patriot city. Every one flattered themselves that the destructive civil war was at length approaching its conclusion. They rejoiced in seeing a man so distinguished as Charette return into the bosom of the republic, perhaps to devote his sword to her services. On the day appointed for his solemn entry, the national guard and the army of the west were under arms. All the inhabitants, full of joy and curiosity, thronged to see and to do honour to the celebrated leader. He was received with shouts of Long live the republic! Charette for ever! He wore his uniform of Vendean general and the tri-coloured cockade. Charette was harsh, distrustful, selfish, and untamed; all this was perceptible in his features and in his person. A middle stature, a small bright eye, a nose turned up like a Tartar, and a large mouth, gave him an expression the most singular and the most accordant with his character. All who ran to see him strove to guess his sentiments. The royalists fancied that they could read embarrassment and remorse in his face. The republicans thought him overjoyed and almost intoxicated with his triumph. Indeed, he might well be so, in spite of the embarrassment of his position, for his enemies procured him the fairest and earliest recompense he had ever yet received in return for his exploits.

No sooner was this peace signed, than preparations were made for reducing Stofflet, and for making the Chouans accept the conditions granted to Charette. The latter appeared to be sincere in his declarations; he circulated proclamations in the country to bring every body back to their duty. The natives were overjoyed at this peace. The men entirely devoted to war were formed into territorial guards, and the command of them was left to Charette, to form the police of the district. This was the idea of Hoche, which had been altered in its form to satisfy the Vendean chiefs, who, entertaining at the time misgivings and mis-trusts, wished to keep the men most inured to war under their own orders. Charette even promised his aid against Stofflet, if the latter, pressed in Upper Vendée, should fall back upon the Marais.

General Canclaux was immediately despatched in pursuit of Stofflet. Leaving nothing but a corps of observation around Charette's country, he conveyed the greater part of his troops to Layon. Stofflet, desiring to create a sensation by a bold stroke, made an attempt on Chalonne, which was vigorously repulsed, and fell back upon Saint-Florent. He proclaimed Charette a traitor to the cause of royalty, and pronounced sentence of death upon him. The representatives, who knew that such a war was to be terminated not merely by the employment of arms, but by indemnifying the ambitious for the loss of their expectations in assisting men destitute of resources, had also distributed money. The committee of public welfare had opened a credit in their favour on its secret service funds. They gave sixty thousand francs in current coin, and three hundred and sixty-five thousand francs in assignats to many of Stofflet's officers. His major-general, Tiotoum, received one hundred thousand francs, half in money, half in assignats, and separated from him. He wrote a letter addressed to the army of Anjou, exhorting them to peace, by urging the reasons most likely to shake their resolution.

While they made use of such means in respect of the army of Anjou, the representatives who had been engaged in the pacification of La Vendée, repaired to Brittany to induce the Chouans to enter into a similar composition. Coismann had followed them; he was now in every respect attached to the system of peace, and his ambition was to make a triumphal entry into Rennes, as Charette had done at Nantes. Notwithstanding the truce, many acts of spoliation had been committed by the Chouans. These latter being for the most part little better than mere robbers, without attachment to any cause, and concerning themselves but little in the political views which had induced them chiefs to sign a suspension of arms, took no pains to observe it, and looked to nothing else than in making booty. Some of the representatives, observing the conduct of the Bretons, began to distrust their intentions, and were already of opinion that they must give up all idea of peace. In this notion Boursault was the most decided. On the other hand, the representative Bollet, a zealous peacemaker, conceived that, notwithstanding some acts of hostility, an accommodation was practicable, and that none but mild means should be used. Hoche, hurrying from cantonnments to cantonnments, eighty leagues apart, never having a moment's quiet, placed between those representatives who were in favour of war, and those who desired peace, between the Jacobins of the towns, who accused him of incompetence and treason, and the royalists, who charged him with barbarity, Hoche was absolutely disgusted, although his zeal was by no means cooled. "You wish me another campaign of the Vosges," he wrote to one of his friends; "how would you like to make a similar campaign against the Chouans, and almost without an army?" This young captain saw his talents wasted on a thankless war, while generals in every respect his inferiors, were immortalizing themselves in Holland and on the Rhine, at the head of the finest armies of the republic. He nevertheless prosecuted his task with ardour, and with a profound knowledge of men and a consciousness of his own situation. We have seen that he had already given the most judicious advice, for instance, for the indemnifying those insurgents who had remained peasants, and to enlist such as the war had made soldiers. A better acquaintance with the country had enabled him to discover the true means of appeasing the inhabitants, and of again attaching them to the republic. "We must continue," said he, "to treat with the Chouan chiefs. Their good faith is very doubtful, but we must keep our words with them. We shall thus gain by confidence those who only require to have their minds set at rest. We must gain over by promotions those who are ambitious; by money those who are necessitous; we shall thus divide them among themselves; and we should confide the police to those of whom we are sure, by trusting them with the command of the local militia, to the institution of which they have recently submitted Moreau, we should distribute twenty five thousand men in several camps to superintend the whole country, station along the coasts a number of gun boats, which must be kept in continual motion, and transfer the arsenals, the arms, and the ammunition, from the open towns to the forts and fortified places. As for the inhabitants, we must avail ourselves of the priests with them, and grant some relief to the most indigent. If we could contrive to succeed in diffusing confidence by means of the priests, Chouannerie would immediately be at an end. Circulate," he thus wrote to his general officers on the 27th Ventôse, "plentifully distribute that salutary law which the convention has just passed respecting freedom of religious worship, and do yourselves preach up religious toleration. The priests, certain that no one will disturb them in the exercise of their ministry, will become your friends, were it only that they might be quiet. Their character inclines them to peace, see them, and tell them that the continuance of the war will expose them to numerous vexations, not from the republicans, who respect religious opinions, but from the Chouans, who acknowledge neither God or law, and who want to domineer and plunder without end. Amongst them are some in necessitous circumstances, and in general they are very selfish, do not neglect to offer them some relief, but without ostentation, and with all the delicacy of which you are capable. Through them you will learn all the manoeuvres of their party, and you will obtain from them that they should keep their peasants in their fields, and prevent their fighting. You must be aware, that to attain this end, mildness, amenity, and frankness of behaviour are necessary. Get some of the officers and soldiers to attend respectfully some of their ceremonies, taking care never to disturb them. The country expects of you the greatest devotedness, her service justifies the means so long as they are in accordance with the laws and with republican honour and dignity." To this advice, Hoche added the recommendation, not to take any thing from the country for the supply of the armies for some time at least. As for the designs of the English, he desired that in order to anticipate them, they should make themselves masters of Jersey and Guernsey, and raise a Chouannerie in England, to keep them employed. He was also thinking of Ireland, but he wrote that he would explain himself personally with the committee of public welfare on this head.

These means, chosen with great good sense, and employed in more than one place with great address, had already perfectly succeeded. Brittany was completely divided, all the Chouans who had appeared at Rennes were dressed, paid, satisfied, and persuaded to lay down their arms. The others, more obstinate, reckoning upon Stofflet and Puisaye, were for persisting in making war. Cormatin continued to run from one to the other, with a view to bring them together at La Prévalaye, and to persuade them to enter into a negotiation for a treaty. Notwithstanding the ardour which this adventurer exhibited in pacifying the country, Hoche, who had discerned his character and his vanity, distrusted him, and began to fear that he would break his word with the republicans, just as he had done with the royalists. He observed him very closely, to ascertain whether he laboured sincerely and without any secret intention in the work of reconciliation.

Intrigues of a remarkable character were combining with all these circumstances, in bringing about the pacification so earnestly desired by the republicans. We have formerly seen PUISAYE in London, striving to prevail on the English cabinet to concur in his projects; we have seen the three French princes on the continent, one waiting at Ainsheim for a plot to enact, another fighting on the Rhine, the third in his quality of regent, corresponding from Verona with every one of the cabinets, and keeping up a secret agency in Paris. PUISAYE had conducted his plans with the character of a man as active as he was skilful. Without introducing himself through the old duke of HARCOURT, the useless ambassador of the regent in London, he addressed himself directly to the British minister, Pitt, who ordinarily was inaccessible to those emigrants who swarmed in the streets of London and beleaguered him with plans and applications for relief, welcomed at once the organs of Brittany, and put him in communication with Wyndham the minister at war, who was zealously attached to monarchy, and desired to support or restore it every where. The plans of PUISAYE, maturely investigated, were entirely adopted. England promised an army, a squadron, money, arms, and immense supplies of ammunition, in order to effect a descent upon the coast of France, but PUISAYE was required to keep the matter secret from his countrymen, and especially from the old duke of HARCOURT, the envoy of the regent. PUISAYE wanted nothing more than to do every thing by himself, and was impenetrable to the duke of HARCOURT, to the other agents of the princes in London, and above all to the Paris agents, who corresponded with the very secretary of the duke of HARCOURT. PUISAYE did no more than write to the count d'Artois, applying for extraordinary powers, and making him the offer of coming and putting himself at the head of the expedition. The prince sent the powers, and promised to come and command in person. The plans of PUISAYE were soon suspected, in spite of his endeavours to conceal them. All the emigrants, repulsed by Pitt, and kept in the back ground by PUISAYE, were unanimous, according to them, PUISAYE was an intriguer, sold to the perfidious Pitt, and was meditating most questionable designs. This opinion, disseminated in London, soon established itself at Verona with the advisers of the regent. Already, in that little court there existed a great distrust of England ever since the affair of Toulon, and particular uneasiness was felt as she proposed to make use of one of the princes. On this occasion every body enquired with a certain degree of anxiety what she meant to do with M. le Comte d'Artois, why the name of Monsieur was not included in her schemes, and whether she conceived that she was able to do without him, &c. The agents at Paris, who held their commission from the regent, and identified themselves with his sentiments concerning England, not having been able to obtain any communication from PUISAYE, used the same language respecting the enterprise which was preparing in London. Another motive made them particularly disapprove of it. The regent thought of having recourse to Spain, and wanted to betake himself thither, that he might be nearer to La Vendée, and to Charette who was his hero. The Paris agents, on their part, had put themselves in communication with an emissary of Spain, who had urged them to make use of that power, and promised that it would do for Monsieur and for Charette, what England intended to do for the count d'Artois and for Puisaye. But it was necessary to wait till Monsieur could be conveyed from the Alps to the Pyrenees by the Mediterranean, and to get up an expedition of some importance. The intriguers of Paris were therefore entirely biassed in favour of Spain. They pretended that the French were less frightened at Spain than at the English, because she had interests less opposed to Spain; that besides all this, she had already gained over Tallien, through his wife, the daughter of Cabarrus, the Spanish banker; they even dared to assert that they were sure of Hoche, so readily did they utter a falsehood to give an air of importance to their schemes! But Spain, her ships and her troops, were, according to them, nothing when compared with the intrigues they pretended to weave in the interior. Placed in the heart of the capital, they saw a movement of indignation manifest itself against the revolutionary system. We must stir up this movement, said they, and if possible turn it to the account of royalism: but for this purpose the royalists ought to show themselves as little formidable as possible, for the Mountain was gaining influence from every apprehension that counter-revolution inspired. All that was wanting was one victory won by Charette, one landing of the emigrants in Brittany, in order to restore to the revolutionary party the influence it had lost, and to render unpopular the Thermidorians whose assistance the royalists wanted. Charette had just made peace; but it was requisite that he should hold himself in readiness to resume his arms; it was necessary also that Anjou and Brittany should appear to be submissive for a time; that during this time, the heads of the government and the generals should be gained over, that the armies should be suffered to pass the Rhine and make an inroad into Germany; and then that they should suddenly fall upon the lulled convention, thus taken by surprise, and proclaim royalty in La Vendée, in Brittany, and in Paris itself. An expedition from Spain, bringing over the regent, and concurring with these simultaneous movements, might then decide the victory in favour of royalty. As for England, all they had to do was to ask her for money, (for these gentlemen were much in want of that,) and to deceive her afterwards. Thus each of the thousand agents employed for the counter-revolution indulged in his own particular day-dream, devising means according to his own station, and desired to be the principal restorer of monarchy. Lies and intrigues were the sole resources of most of them, and money was the principal object they had in view.

With such ideas, the Paris agency, similar to what Puisaye was preparing in London, ought to have done its utmost to throw aside for the moment any expedition of the kind, to have temporized with the insurgent provinces, and to have caused a feigned peace to be signed. Under cover of the truce granted to the Chouans, Lemaitre, Brottier, and Laville-Houmois, had just opened communications with the insurgent provinces. The regent had directed them to transmit letters to Charette; they intrusted them to an old naval officer, Duverne de Presle, deprived of his commission, and seeking employ. They instructed him, at the same time, to promote the pacification, by advising the insurgents to temporize, to wait for relief from Spain and for a movement in the interior. This emissary repaired to Rennes, from whence he forwarded the regent's letters to Charette, and then recommended to every one a temporary submission. Others were charged with a similar errand by the Paris agents; and very soon, the notions of peace, already generally circulated in Bretagne, were still further diffused. It was every where said that they must lay down their arms, that England was deceiving the royalists, that they had every thing to expect from the convention, that she herself was about to re-establish monarchy, and that in the treaty signed with Charette there were secret articles, expressly stipulating that the young orphan in the Temple, Louis XVII. was soon to be acknowledged as king. Cormatin, whose position had become extremely perplexing, and who had failed in obedience to the orders of Puisaye and of the central committee, found in the system of the Paris agents an excuse and an encouragement for the conduct which he pursued. It even appears that they led him to expect the command of Brittany in the place of Puisaye. By dint of extreme attention he at length succeeded in bringing together the principal Chouans at La Prevalaye, and the conferences were opened.

In this interval, Messrs de Tinténac and de la Roberie had just been sent from London by Puisaye, the former to bring the Chouans gunpowder, money, and intelligence of a speedy expedition; the latter to communicate to his uncle Charette an invitation to hold himself in readiness to assist the descent in Brittany, and in short for both of them to cause the negotiations to be broken off. They attempted to land with a few emigrants near the Côtes-du-Nord; the Chouans, apprised of their coming, having hurried to meet them, were beaten in an action with the republicans; Messrs. de la Roberie and de Tinténac were saved by a miracle; but the truce was compromised, and Hoche, who began to distrust the Chouans, and suspected the sincerity of Cormatin, was desirous of having him apprehended. Cormatin protested his sincerity to the representatives, and prevailed with them not to break the truce. The conference at La Prevalaye continued. An agent of Stofflet's came to take part with them. Stofflet, beaten, pursued, reduced to extremity, stripped of all his resources by the discovery of the little arsenal which he had in a wood, had at length begged to be permitted to treat, and had just despatched a representative to La Prevalaye. This was general Beauvais. The conferences were extremely animated, as they had been at La Jaunaye. General Beauvais still advocated the system of war, in spite of the distressed situation of the leader who sent him; and alleged that Cormatin, having signed the peace of La Jaunaye and acknowledged the republic, had lost the command with which Puisaye had invested him, and therefore could no longer take a part in the conference. M. de Tinténac, who in spite of every danger had reached the place where the confer-ances were held, wanted in Puisaye's name to break them off, and to return immediately to London; but Cormatin and the advocates of peace prevented him. Cormatin at length disposed the majority to agree to a composition, by representing that they should gain time by an apparent submission, and would lull the vigilance of the republicans. The conditions were the same as those granted to Charette: religious toleration, indemnities for those whose property had been laid waste, exemptions from the requisition, and the institution of a local militia. There was an additional condition in the present treaty, namely, a million and a half for the principal chiefs, whereof Cormatin was to have a portion. According to general Beauvais, Cormatin, as if he must needs act on every occasion against good faith, at the moment of signing, laid the sword upon his hand, and swore to take up arms again on the first occasion, and recommended every one to maintain, until further orders, the established organization and the respect due to all the leaders.

The royalist chiefs then transferred themselves to La Mabilaye, a league from Rennes, to sign the treaty at a formal meeting with the representatives. Many of them had rather not have gone, but Cormatin prevailed upon them to be present. The meeting took place with the same formalities as at La Jaunaye. The Chouans had requested that Hoche might not be present, on account of his extreme distrust; this was agreed to. On the 1st Floreal (April 20), the representatives issued the same ordinances as at La Jaunaye, and the Chouans signed a declaration by which they recognized the republic and submitted to its laws.

On the following day, Cormatin made his entry into Rennes, as Charette had done at Nantes. The bustle in which he had kept himself, and the importance which he arrogated, caused him to be considered as the chief of the Breton royalists. He obtained the credit of every thing, both the exploits of that band of unknown Chouans who had mysteriously traversed Brittany, as well as that peace which had been so long desired. He received a kind of triumph. Applauded by the inhabitants, caressed by the women, supplied with a good round sum in assignats, he reaped all the profit and all the honour of the war, just as if he had been for a long time the main support of the war. His only purpose in landing in Brittany was to play this singular part. Nevertheless, he dared no longer write to Puisaye; he could not venture to leave Rennes or trust himself in the country, for fear of being shot by the malcontents. The principal leaders returned to their divisions, wrote to Puisaye that they had been deceived, that he had only to come, and they would rise at the first signal and fly to meet him. A few days afterwards, Stofflet, finding himself deserted, signed a peace at Saint-Florent upon the same terms.

While the two Vendées and Brittany were submitting themselves, Charette, for the first time, received the regent's letter; it was dated the first of February. This prince called him the second founder of the monarchy, spoke of his gratitude, of his admiration, of his desire to join him, and appointed him lieutenant-general. These manifestations of esteem arrived too late. Charette, deeply affected, replied immediately that the letter with which he had just been honoured filled his soul with a transport of joy; that his attachment and his fidelity would still be the same; that necessity alone had obliged him to yield, but that his submission was only apparent; that when the parts should be more firmly united, he would again take up arms, and be ready to die under the eyes of his prince and in the most glorious of causes.

Such was the first pacification of the insurgent provinces. As Hoche had foretold, it was but apparent; but yet, as he had also foreseen, it might be made fatal to the Vendean chiefs, by habituating the country to repose and to the laws of the republic, and by tranquilizing or diverting into another channel that combativeness which distinguishes some men. Notwithstanding the assurance of Charette to the regent, and of the Chouans to Puisaye, all fervid feeling was likely to be extinguished in their hearts after a few months' tranquillity. These underplots were but so many acts of insincerity, excusable no doubt in the unreflecting passion of civil wars, but which take away from those who entertain them all right to complain of the severities of their adversaries. The representatives and the republican generals were most scrupulous in fulfilling the terms agreed upon. It is assuredly superfluous to demonstrate the absurdity of the rumour then circulated and even repeated since, that the treaties which had been signed contained secret articles, to the effect of a promise to place Louis XVII. on the throne; as if the representatives could have been so mad as to enter into such engagements! as if it had been possible that they could consent to sacrifice to a few partisans, a republic which they persisted in maintaining against all Europe! Besides, none of the chiefs in their letters to the princes or to the different royalist agents, had ever ventured to advance such an absurdity. Charette, subsequently tried for having violated the conditions made with him, dared not avail himself of this powerful excuse for the non-execution, of secret stipulation. Puisaye, in his memoirs, has deemed the assertion as frivolous as it was false; and it would not have been noticed in this place, if it had not been retailed in a great number of memoirs.

The result of this peace was not solely the disarming of the country; coinciding as it did with the peace of Prussia, Holland, and Tuscany, and with the intentions manifested by several other states, it possessed the ulterior advantage of producing a very great moral effect. The republic was now observed to be recognized at one and the same time by its enemies at home and abroad, by the allied powers, and by the royalist party itself.

Of the declared enemies of France, there were only left Austria and England. Russia was too remote to be dangerous; the empire was on the point of being dismembered, and was incapable of supporting the war; Piedmont was exhausted; Spain, identifying herself in an inferior degree with the chimerical hopes of the intriguing royalists, sighed for peace; and the anger of the court of Naples was as impotent as ridiculous. Pitt, in spite of the unparalleled triumphs of the republic, notwithstanding a campaign unexampled in the annals of war, was not shaken; and his strong good sense had come to the conclusion that so many victories, in themselves ruinous to the continent, were in no respect detrimental to England. The stadtholder, the princes of Germany, Austria, Piedmont, and Spain, had lost in this war a portion of their territory; but England had acquired an incontestable superiority at sea; she was mistress of the Mediterranean and of the ocean; she had seized half the Dutch fleet, she forced the navy of Spain to spend her strength against France; she strove to possess herself of our colonies; she had already taken all those of the Dutch, and secured for ever her Indian empire. For this purpose she still required some time of war and of political aberrations on the part of the continental powers. It was therefore to her interest to excite hostilities by affording assistance to Austria, by awakening the zeal of Spain, and by preparing fresh commotions in the southern provinces of France. So much the worse for the belligerent powers if they were beaten in a new campaign; but England had nothing to fear; she would pursue her course on the seas, in India, and in America. If on the other hand, the powers were victorious, she would be a gainer by restoring to Austria the Netherlands, which she particularly dreaded to see in the hands of France. Such were the sanguinary but profound calculations of the English minister.

Notwithstanding the losses which England had experienced, either by prizes, or by the defeats of the duke of York, or by the enormous expenses which she had incurred, and the sums which she had given to Prussia and Piedmont, she still possessed resources far more great than the English or even Pitt himself dreamt of. England, it is true, complained bitterly of the numerous captures, of the scarcity, and of the high price of all articles of consumption. The English merchant vessels, having alone continued to traverse the sea, had naturally run much greater risk of being taken by privateers than those of other nations. The insurances, in which a great deal of business was done, rendered them almost foolhardy, and very often they would not wait for a convoy. This it was that gave so many advantages to our privateers. As for the scarcity, it was general throughout Europe. On the Rhine, about Frankfort, a bushel of rye cost fifteen florins. The enormous consumption of the armies, the multitude of hands taken from agriculture, the troubles in unhappy Poland, who had this year sent out scarcely any corn, had occasioned this extraordinary dearth. Besides, to ship corn from the Baltic to England was rendered almost impossible since the French were masters of Holland. It was to the New World that Europe had been obliged to resort for provisions; she lived at this moment on the surplus produce of those new lands which the North Americans had just brought into cultivation. But freight was high, and bread had risen in England to an enormous price. The price of meat was much the same. Spanish wool was not imported after the French had occupied the ports of Biscay, and the manufacture of cloth was likely to be interrupted. Thus England, while in labour with her future greatness, suffered severely. The operatives struck for wages in all the manufacturing towns; the people called aloud for peace, and petitions were presented to parliament, subscribed by thousands of signatures, imploring them to put an end to this disastrous war. Ireland, agitated on account of concessions which had been recently withdrawn, was about to add fresh embarrassments to those in which the government was already involved.

Through all these adverse combinations, Pitt discovered adequate motives and means for continuing the war. In the first place, the war flattered the passions of his court; it flattered even those of the English nation, which cherished a deep-seated animosity against France, that could always be revived amidst the severest privations; in the next place, notwithstanding her commercial losses, losses which proved, however, that the English alone had continued to frequent the seas, he saw English commerce augmented during the last two years by the exclusive possession of all the outlets of India and America. He had ascertained that the exports had amazingly increased since the commencement of the war, and he already had a glimpse of the future prosperity of his nation. He found in loans an expedient, at the fruitfulness of which he himself was astonished. The funds had not fallen; the loss of Holland had but little affected them, because the event being foreseen, an enormous quantity of capital had been transferred from Amsterdam to London. The Dutch merchants, although patriots, had nevertheless no confidence in events, and had sought to place their wealth in safety by transporting it to England. Pitt had talked of a new loan to a considerable amount, and in spite of the war he observed that the tenders for it increased. Experience has since proved that war, in prohibiting commercial speculations, and not admitting of any speculations save those in the public funds, so far from presenting difficulties to loans facilitates them. This must happen still more naturally in a country which, being without frontiers, never considers war as involving a question of existence, but merely as a question of trade and disposal of produce. Pitt resolved, therefore, by means of the abundant capital of his nation, to supply Austria with funds, to strengthen his navy, to reorganize his land forces, for the purpose of conveying them to India or America, and to give considerable assistance to the French insurgents. He concluded a subsidiary treaty with Austria, similar in effect to the one he had made in the preceding year with Prussia. That power possessed an army, and promised to keep on foot at least two hundred thousand effective men, but was in want of money; Prussia could no longer open loans either in Switzerland, in Frankfort, or in Holland. England did not undertake to furnish the funds, but to guarantee the loan which she proposed to open in London. To guarantee the debts of a power like Austria is much the same as becoming gage for their payment; but the operation in this form was much more easy to justify before parliament. The loan was for four millions six hundred thousand sterling, (one hundred and fifteen millions of francs) at five per cent. interest. Pitt opened at the same time a loan of eighteen millions sterling on account of England at four per cent. The eagerness of capitalists was extreme; and as the Austrian loan was guaranteed by the English government, and bore a higher interest, they required that for two-thirds taken in the English loan they should have one-third given them in the Austrian loan. Pitt having thus made sure of Austria, strove to rouse the zeal of Spain, but he found it extinguished. He took into his pay the emigrant regiments of Condé, and he told Puisaye that as the pacification of La Vendée diminished the confidence inspired by the insurgent provinces, he would give him a squadron, the necessaries for an army, and emigrants to fill his regiments, but no English soldiers; and that if, as he had written him from Brittany, the dispositions of the royalists were not changed, and if the expedition proved successful, he would endeavour to render it decisive by sending an army thither. He then resolved to raise the navy from eighty to one hundred thousand seamen. For this purpose he devised a species of conscription [called pressing of seamen]. Every merchant vessel was obliged to furnish one seaman for every seven of her crew; this was a due which it was but fair that commerce should discharge for the protection it derived from the navy. Agriculture and manufactures were likewise under obligations to the navy, which ensured the means of disposing of their produce; consequently, each parish was obliged to furnish one seaman. Pitt thus ensured the means of imparting to the English navy an extraordinary development of action. The English men-of-war were very inferior in construction to the French ships; but their immense superiority in point of numbers, the excellence of the crews, and the naval skill of the officers, rendered competition utterly impracticable.

With all these means combined, Pitt presented himself before parliament. The opposition had this year increased by about twenty members. The advocates of peace and of the French revolution were more animated than ever, and they had stubborn facts to oppose to the minister. The language which Pitt dictated to the crown, and which he himself held during this session, one of the most memorable of the English parliament, on account of the importance of the questions and the eloquence of Fox and Sheridan, was extremely dexterous. He admitted that France had obtained unexampled triumphs, but these triumphs, so far from discouraging her enemies, ought on the contrary, he said, to impart to them more firmness and perseverance. It was still England against whom France bore ill-will; it was her constitution, and her prosperity, that she was striving to destroy; at the present time it was any thing but prudent or honourable to acknowledge any inferiority before such a formidable animosity. To lay down her arms, particularly at that crisis, would, as he observed, be a most fatal act of weakness. France having no other enemies than Austria and the empire to combat, would overwhelm them; she would then return, freed from her continental enemies, and fall upon England, who therefore single-handed would have to sustain a tremendous shock. It was right, therefore, to take advantage of the moment, when several powers were yet contending with each other, to join in the attack upon the common enemy, to compel France to retire within her own limits, to wrest from her the Netherlands and Holland, to drive her armies, her commerce, and her mischievous principles back into her own country. Then it would only call for one more effort to completely overwhelm her. She had conquered, it was true, but only by exhausting herself, by employing barbarous means, which had diminished themselves by their very violence. The maximum, the requisitions, the assignats, and terror, had lost their effect in the hands of the leaders of France. All these chiefs had fallen by striving to obtain victory at such a price. One more campaign, then, said Pitt, and Europe and England will be avenged, and preserved from a sanguinary revolution. Even if one did not respond to these reasons, based as they were upon honour, safety, and public policy, and yet desired to effect a peace, such a peace could not be effected. The French demagogues would repel it with that ferocious pride which they had exhibited even before they were victorious. And as to treating with them, where were they to be found? Where look for a government amid those blood-thirsty factions, urging each other on to power, and disappearing as soon as they had got thither? How hope for solid conditions in negotiating with such transient depositaries of a still disputed authority? It was, therefore, dishonourable, it was imprudent, it was impracticable to negotiate. England still possessed immense resources; her exports had wonderfully increased; her commerce experienced losses which proved her boldness and her activity; her navy had become formidable; and her vast pecuniary resources were spontaneously made available, and that without stint, for the service of the government, in order to carry on this just and necessary war.

This then was the epithet Pitt had applied to this war from the outset, and which he affected to retain. We see plainly enough, that amongst these hackneyed parliamentary reasons he could not assign the real motives; he would not state plainly through what Machiavelian paths he desired to conduct England to the highest pinnacle of power. No one will avow such an ambition as this in the face of the world.

To this the opposition victoriously replied. All that was asked at the end of last session, said Fox and Sheridan, was no more than a single campaign; that the allies had already several fortresses, from which they were to sally forth in the spring to annihilate France. But look to what has actually taken place! The French have conquered Flanders, Holland, the whole left bank of the Rhine, excepting Mentz, part of Piedmont, the greater part of Catalonia, and the whole of Navarre. Where shall we find such a campaign in the annals of Europe? It is admitted that they have captured some few fortresses; show us then a war in which so many fortified places have been reduced in a single campaign? If the French, struggling against all Europe, have had such success, what advantages are they not likely to gain in a conflict with Austria and England, left almost single-handed; for the other powers are either no longer able to second us, or are about negotiating. It is said that the French are exhausted, that the assignats, their sole resource, have lost all their value; that their present government has ceased to possess its former energy. But the Americans saw their paper-money fall ninety per cent. below par, and yet they have not yielded. But this government, when it is energetic, they told us was barbarous; now that it is become humane and moderate, it is found to be inefficient. People may talk of our resources, of our great wealth; but the people are perishing of want, and cannot pay for either bread or meat; they are loudly demanding peace. That wonderful wealth, which seems to have been created by magic, is it substantial? Do people coin money out of paper? All those systems of finance conceal some frightful error, some immense abyss, which will suddenly appear. We go on giving our wealth to the powers of Europe; we have already lavished it on Piedmont and on Prussia; we are again going to throw it away upon Austria. Who is it can warrant us that this power will be more faithful to her engagements than Prussia? Who will undertake that she will not break her promises, and sell us after taking our gold? We are exciting an infamous civil war; we are arming the French against their native country, and yet, to our shame be it spoken, these French, acknowledging their error and the wisdom of their new government, have just laid down their arms. Shall we go and fan the expiring embers of La Vendée, for the purpose of producing a tremendous conflagration there? People talk to us of the barbarous principles of France. Is there in those principles any thing more anti-social than our conduct in respect of the insurgent provinces? All the means of the war are, therefore, equivocal or culpable. Peace, we are assured, is impossible. France hates England. But when did the violence of the French against us declare itself? Was it not when we manifested the guilty intention of wresting their liberty from them, of interfering in the choice of their government, of exciting civil war among them? Peace, we are told, would diffuse the contagion of their principles. But Switzerland, Sweden, Denmark, the United States, are at peace with them; is their constitution destroyed? Peace, it is dinned into us, is impracticable with a government that is tottering and constantly changing. But Prussia and Tuscany have found some one to treat with; Switzerland, Sweden, Denmark, and the United States, know with whom to communicate in their relations with France; and yet we cannot negotiate with her! We might as well have been told, on commencing the war, that we should not make peace before a certain form of government had been re-established among our enemies; before the republic had been abolished among them; before they had submitted to the institutions which it pleased us to give them.

Amidst this clash of reasons and of eloquence, Pitt pursuing his course, and without ever communicating his real motives, obtained every thing he desired; loans, pressing of seamen, and the suspension of the habeas corpus. With his treasures, his navy, the two hundred thousand Austrian soldiers, and the desperate courage of the French insurgents, he resolved to make a new campaign this year, certain at any rate to prevail at sea, if victory on the continent should adhere to the enthusiastic nation with whom he was contending.

These negotiations, these conflicts of opinion in Europe, these preparations for war, prove of what importance our country then was in the world. At this juncture, ambassadors were seen to arrive all at once from Sweden, from Denmark, Holland, Prussia, Tuscany, Venice, and from America. On their arrival in Paris they called upon the president of the convention, whom they found lodging sometimes in a second or third floor, and whose simple and polite reception had succeeded the ancient introductions at court. They were subsequently introduced to that famous hall, where, on bare benches, and in the simplest costume, sat that assembly which, from the might and the grandeur of its passions, appeared no longer ridiculous, but terrible. An arm-chair was allotted them opposite to that of the president; they spoke being seated; the president replied in the same manner, addressing them by the styles specified in their credentials. He then gave them the fraternal embrace, and proclaimed them representatives of the power from whom they brought despatches. They were able, in a box set apart for their use, to witness those stormy discussions, which excited in strangers as much curiosity as terror. Such was the ceremonial observed in regard to the ambassadors of foreign powers. Its simplicity was consistent with a republic, receiving without ceremony, but with decency and respect, the envoys of the monarchs she had vanquished. The name of Frenchman was then a name of which to be proud, it was ennobled by famous victories, and by the purest of all, those victories which a people have gained in defending their political existence and their liberty.

THE events of Germinal had produced the usual consequence of an uncertain action for the two parties which divided France; those two parties had become still more violent and the more intent on destroying one another. Throughout the south, and particularly at Avignon, Marseilles, and Toulon, the revolutionists, more menacing, and more audacious than ever, evading all the efforts that were made to disarm them or to bring them back to their communes, continued to demand the enlargement of the patriots, the death of all returned emigrants, and the constitution of 1793. They corresponded with the partisans whom they had throughout the provinces; they invited them, and induced them to meet together at two principal points, Toulon for the south, Paris for the north. When they should be strong enough at Toulon, they would, as they said, raise the departments, and advance to join their brethren in the north. This was exactly the scheme of the federalists in 1793.

Their adversaries, whether royalists or Girondists, had become bolder ever since the government, attacked in Germinal, had given the signal for persecutions. Masters of the administrations, they used to terrible purpose the decrees passed against the patriots. They imprisoned them, as accomplices of Robespierre's, or as having dealt with the public money without rendering any account of it; they disarmed them, as having participated in the tyranny abolished on the 9th Thermidor; or lastly, they hunted them down from place to place, as having quitted their communes. It was more particularly in the south that these hostilities against the unfortunate patriots were most active; for violence always provokes equal violence in return. In the department of the Rhône, a terrible reaction was about to take place. The royalists, obliged to flee from the cruel violence of 1793, returned through Switzerland, crossed the frontier, entered Lyons with false passports, talked there of the king, of religion, of past prosperity, and availed themselves of the recollection of the grape-shot massacres (mitrallades) to bring back to monarchy a city completely republican. Thus the royalists placed their reliance upon Lyons as the patriots did upon Toulon. It was said that Précý had returned and lay concealed in that city, whose calamities had been brought down upon it by his valour. A multitude of emigrants, collecting at Bâle, at Berne, and at

Lausanne, showed themselves more presumptuously than ever. They talked of their speedy return; they said that their friends were in power; that they would soon seat the son of Louis XVI. on the throne, get themselves recalled, and their property restored to them; and that with the exception of some terrorists and some military officers who must needs be punished, every body would anxiously lend their aid to this restoration. At Lausanne, where all the youth were enthusiastic admirers of the French revolution, they annoyed the emigrants, and forced them to hold their peace. In other places they were suffered to have their say; their idle boasts, to which every body was pretty well accustomed for six years past, were despised; but a distrust was excited in respect of some of them, who were paid by the Austrian police to closely observe at the time the unguarded language of travellers. It was also in this quarter, that is in the direction of Lyons, that companies were formed, who, styling themselves companies of the Sun and companies of Jesus, were to traverse the country or find their way into the towns, and murder the patriots retired to their estates or confined in the prisons. The transported priests also returned by this frontier, and had already spread themselves throughout the eastern provinces; they declared all that had been done by the conformist priests to be null; they rebaptized children, remarried couples, and inspired the people with a hatred and contempt of the government. They took care to keep near the frontier, in order to recross it at the first hint of danger. Those who had not suffered transportation, and who enjoyed in France a pension for their support and the free exercise of their religion, did not abuse the tolerance of the government a whit less than the transported priests. Dissatisfied at having to say mass in houses either hired or lent, they stirred up the people, and instigated them to seize the churches, which had become the property of the communes. A great number of unhappy scenes had been exhibited in respect of this subject, and force had been put in operation to compel submission to the decrees. In Paris, the journalists in the pay of royalism, stimulated by Lemaitre, wrote with more boldness than ever against the revolution, and almost openly preached up monarchy. at Lyons.—Chénier's

teur, had been acquitted of the charges preferred against him; and since then, the petty tribe of libellers were no longer afraid of the revolutionary tribunal.

Thus the two parties were arrayed against each other, and quite ready for a decisive engagement. The revolutionists, resolved to strike the blow of which the 12th Germinal had been no more than the threat, conspired openly. They devised under-hand plots in every quarter, since they had lost their principal chiefs, who by themselves meditated schemes on behalf of the entire party. An association was formed at the house of a man named Lagrelet, in the Rue de Bretagne: it was at that place that a scheme was agitated of setting in motion several mobs, at the head of whom Cambon, Maribon-Montant, and Thuriot, were to be placed; of despatching some of them to the prisons to set the patriots free, others to the committees to carry them there, and others again to the convention to extort decrees from it. Once masters of the convention, the conspirators purposed to compel it to re-instate the imprisoned deputies, to annul the sentence passed upon Billard-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère; to exclude the seventy-three, and immediately to proclaim the constitution of 1793. Everything was prepared, even to the crowbars for breaking open the prisons, the pass-tickets for recognising the conspirators, and a piece of stuff to hang out at the window of the house whence all the orders were to issue. A letter, concealed in a loaf and addressed to a prisoner, was intercepted. In this letter he was informed as follows: "On the day that you will receive some eggs half white and half red, you will hold yourself in readiness." The day fixed was the 1st Floréal. One of the conspirators betrayed the secret, and handed over the particulars of the scheme to the committee of general safety. That committee immediately caused all the leaders who were pointed out to be apprehended; but this unfortunately did not derange the plans of the patriots; for every one was a leader with them, and conspiracies existed in a thousand places at once. Rovère, formerly worthy of the name of a terrorist under the old committee of public welfare, and now a violent reactionist, came to make a report on this plot to the convention, and made heavy imputations against the deputies who were to be put at the head of the assemblies of people. Those deputies had no connexion whatever with the plot, and their names had been used without their knowledge, because the conspirators wanted them, and reckoned upon their inclinations. Already condemned by a decree to be confined at Ham, they had not obeyed, but withdrawn themselves from their sentence. Rovère caused it to be decided by the assembly, that if they did not surrender themselves as prisoners immediately, they should be transported for the simple fact of their disobedience. This abortive procedure sufficiently indicated an approaching event.

As soon as the journals had made known this new plot of the patriots, a great agitation was manifested at Lyons, and the rage against them was very much increased. There was on his trial at this period at Lyons a noted Terrorist denouncer, prosecuted by virtue of the decree passed against the accomplices of Robespierre. The newspapers came to hand, and communicated the report of Rovère respecting the plot of the 29th Germinal. The Lyonnese began to bestir themselves; most of them had to lament either the ruin of their fortune or the death of their relatives. They beleaguered the hall of the tribunal. The representative Boisset mounted his horse; they surrounded him, and each began to enumerate his charges against the man upon his trial. The promoters of disturbance, the companies of the Sun and of Jesus, availing themselves of this popular movement, fomented the disturbance, betook themselves to the prisons, forcibly entered them, and murdered seventy or eighty prisoners, reputed Terrorists, and cast their bodies into the Rhone. The national guard made some efforts to prevent this massacre, but exhibited perhaps less zeal than it would have displayed had they been actuated by less resentment against the victims of that day.

Thus scarcely was the Jacobin plot of the 20th Germinal made known, than the counter-revolutionists replied to it by the massacre of the 5th Floréal (24th April) at Lyons. The sincere republicans, while at the same time they blamed the intentions of the Terrorists, were nevertheless alarmed at those of the Counter-revolutionists. Hitherto they had been wholly occupied in preventing a new terror; and were by no means frightened at royalism: royalism, in fact, appeared very remote after the executions of the revolutionary tribunal and the victories of our armies; but when they beheld it, driven as it were from La Vendée, returning by Lyons, forming companies of murderers, impelling seditious priests into the heart of France, and dictating in Paris itself publications entirely filled with the violence of the emigrants, they changed their opinion, and thought that, in addition to the rigorous measures adopted against the tools of terror, others should be taken against the partisans of royalty. In the first place, to leave without pretext those who had suffered from excesses committed, and who thereupon demanded redress, they caused the tribunals to be enjoined to infuse more activity in the prosecution of persons charged with speculation, abuse of authority, and acts of oppression. They then set about considering how the royalists could best be repressed. Chénier, known for his literary talents and his openly-avowed republican opinions, was commissioned to report on this subject. He drew an energetic picture of France, of the two parties that disputed the dominion over her, and especially of the artful practices of the emigrants and the clergy, and he proposed that every returned emigrant should be immediately handed over to the tribunals, to be dealt with according to law; to consider as an emigrant every banished person who, having re-entered France, should be still there at the end of one month; to punish with six months imprisonment all who should violate the law in respect of religious worship, and who should attempt to take forcible possession of the churches; to condemn to banishment every writer who should bring the national representation into contempt, or advocate the restoration of royalty; lastly, to oblige all the authorities charged with the disarming the Terrorists to assign the motives for each seizure of their arms.

All these measures were adopted, excepting two which occasioned some observations Thibaudeau considered it inexpedient to punish with six months imprisonment the violators of the laws respecting religious worship, he justly remarked that the churches were fit for one purpose only, that of religious ceremonies, that those people who are so devoted to attend mass at private meetings, would not see themselves deprived of those edifices wherein it had been celebrated of joy without pain, that in declaring the government exempted for ever from the expense of all religious worship, it should have restored the churches to the Catholics, to avoid complaints, commotions, and perhaps a general Vendée Thibaudeau's observations were not approved of, for in restoring the Catholics to their churches, even at their own charge, the convention feared lest they should thereby restore to the old clergy those pompous ceremonies in which a portion of its influence consisted Tallien, who had become a journalist with Lédon, and who, either from this reason or from an reflection of justice, was induced to protect the independence of the press, was opposed to the infliction of banishment upon writers He intimated that this demonstrated an arbitrary tendency, and left too great latitude for severities against the press He was right, but in that state of open war with royalism, it was perhaps of importance that the convention should declare itself strongly against those libellers who strove to bring back France so soon to monarchic ideas Louvet, that fiery Girondist, whose distrusts had done so much injury to his party, but who was one of the most single hearted men in the assembly, hastened to reply to Thiers, and conjured all the friends of the republic to forget their dissensions and their mutual wrongs, and to unite against their oldest enemy, the only real one they ever had—namely, royalty The testimony of Louvet in favour of violent measures was least suspicious of all, for he had braved the most cruel proscription to oppose the system of revolutionary means The whole assembly applauded his frank and noble declaration, voted the printing of his speech, and its being sent to every place in France, and adopted the decree to the great confusion of Tallien, who had so badly chosen his time for maintaining a just and true axiom

Thus, while the convention had ordered the prosecution and the disarming of the patriots, and their return to their communes, she proceeded at the same time to renew the laws against the emigrants and the banished priests, and to inflict penalties against the opening of the churches as well as against royalist pamphlets, but penal laws are inefficient protections against parties ready to rush one against the other The deputy Thibaudeau was of opinion that the organization of the committees of government since the 9th Thermidor was too inefficient and too relaxed This organization, established at the moment when the dictatorship had been very recently overthrown, would not have been devised but under the apprehension of a new tyranny Thus an excessive tension of all the springs had succeeded to an extreme relaxation There had been restored to each committee its peculiar jurisdiction, in order to destroy the too predominant influence of the committee of public welfare; and irregularities and delays, and a complete enfeebling of the government, had been the result of this state of things In fact, if a disturbance occurred in a department, the constitutional course was, that it should be first communicated in writing to the committee of general safety, this committee called to its assistance the committee of public welfare, and in certain cases the committee of legislation, it was necessary to wait till these committees were complete before they could assemble, and then that they should have time to confer together Thus their meetings were rendered almost impracticable, and too numerous to be of essential service When it necessary merely to send twenty men by way of guard, the committee of general safety, charged with the police, was obliged to address itself to the military committee Now it began to be felt how little reason there was that people should frighten themselves with the idea of the tyranny of the old committee of public welfare, and to take such precautions against a danger thenceforth chimerical A government thus organized could but very feebly resist the factions conspiring against one another, and could only oppose a powerless authority against them The deputy, Thibaudeau, therefore proposed a simplification of the government, he moved that the jurisdiction of all the committees should be confined to the mere declaration of the laws, and that executive measures should exclusively rest with the committee of public welfare, that the latter should associate the police with its other functions, and that consequently the committee of general safety should be abolished, and that, lastly, the committee of public welfare, thus entrusted with the entire government, should be increased to twenty four members, so as to be adequate to the extent of its new duties The cowards in the assembly, always ready to arm themselves against impossible dangers, cried out against this plan, and said that it was a renewal of the old dictatorship The lists being opened for discussion, each made his own motion Those who had the mania for reverting to constitutional means, or to the division of powers, proposed to create an executive power independent of the assembly, in order to separate the execution from the creation of the law, others conceived the idea of taking the members who were to constitute this power from the assembly itself, but were for taking from them, so long as they held their office, their legislative vote After long digressions, the assembly became sensible, that having but two or three months longer to exist, that is to say, scarcely the time requisite for completely forming a constitution, it was ridiculous to waste its time in framing a provisional constitution, and especially to renounce its dictatorship at a moment when it had more need of strength than ever In consequence, every one of the propositions tending to a division of the powers was rejected, but they were too much afraid of Thibaudeau's plan to adopt it the assembly contented herself therefore with merely disengaging the committees a little further from their embarrassments It was decided that they should be confined to the mere declaration of laws, that the committee of public welfare should alone be entrusted with executive measures, but that the police should remain with the committee of general safety, that the meetings of committees should take place only by the deputations of commissioners, and lastly, in order to be the more constantly protected against that formidable committee of public welfare who caused so much dread, it was settled that it should be deprived of taking the initiative of the laws, and never more be empowered to make motions tending to proceedings against any deputy.

While these means were being taken to restore a little energy to the government, the assembly continued to occupy itself with those financial questions, the discussion of which had been interrupted by the events of the month of Germinal. The abolition of the maximum, of the requisitions, of the sequestration, of all the instruments to effect compulsory means, by restoring things to their natural movement, had rendered the fall of the assignats more rapid than ever. Sales being no longer forced, and prices having again become free, goods had risen in an extraordinary manner, and consequently the assignat had fallen in proportion. The communications with foreign countries being re-established, the assignat had again been placed in comparison with foreign securities, and its inferiority had been rapidly manifested by the continually increasing fall of the exchange. Thus the fall of the paper money was complete in every respect; and, agreeably to the ordinary law of velocities, the rapidity of this fall was increased by its very rapidity. All very abrupt changes in securities induce hazardous speculations, that is, stock-jobbing; and as such changes never take place but from the effect of some political or financial derangement, and as what the soil or industry of a country produces consequently suffers, so are manufactures and commerce impeded; this kind of speculation therefore is almost the only one that remains; and then, instead of manufacturing or importing new commodities, there arises a desire to speculate upon the variations in price of those that already exist. Instead of producing, they gamble with what is produced. Stock-jobbing, which had risen to such a pitch in the months of April, May, and June, 1793, when the defection of Dumouriez, the insurrection of La Vendée, and the federalist coalition, had occasioned so considerable a fall in the assignats, again appeared with greater violence than ever in Germinal, Floréal, and Prairial, year III. (April and May, 1795.) Thus to the horrors of scarcity there was associated the scandal of an unprincipled gambling, which again contributed to increase the high price of commodities and the depreciation of paper. The conduct of the gamblers was precisely the same as in 1793, the same that it always is. They purchased goods, which, rising in relation to the assignat with singular rapidity, increased in value in their hands, and procured them in a few moments a considerable profit. All their desires, all their exertions, tended to the fall of paper. There were articles which were sold and resold thousands of times without ever being removed. People even speculated, as usual, with what they did not possess. They bought a commodity of a seller, who actually had it not, but who engaged to deliver it at a specified time; when that time arrived, the seller could not deliver it, but he paid the difference between the price of purchase and the price of the day, if the commodity had risen; and he received that difference if the commodity had fallen. It was at the Palais Royal, already so obnoxious to the people as the haunt of the jeunesse dorée, that the jobbers met. One could not pass through it without being followed by dealers carrying in their hands stuffs, gold snuff-boxes, silver plate, rich hardware. It was at the Chartres café that all the speculators in the metallic substances assembled. Although gold and silver were no longer considered as merchandise, and that since 1793 they were forbidden upon very severe penalties to be sold against assignats, the traffic in them was nevertheless carried on in almost an open manner. The louis was sold for one hundred and sixty livres in paper, and in an hour the price was made to fluctuate from one hundred and sixty to two hundred and even two hundred and ten livres.

Thus there was a frightful dearth of bread, an absolute scarcity of fuel, from a frost that was still severe in the middle of spring, an excessive rise in the prices of all commodities, the impossibility of procuring them with a paper that was sinking from day to day; amidst all these evils an unprincipled jobbing was accelerating the depreciation of the assignats by its speculations, and affording a spectacle of the most scandalous gambling, and sometimes of sudden fortunes by the side of the general distress; such was the interminable subject of grievances presented to the patriots for exciting the people to rise. It was a matter of the utmost consequence, as well for the relief of the public distresses, as for preventing a commotion, that these grievances should be removed; but that was the unceasing difficulty.

The only expedient deemed absolutely necessary was, as we have seen, to raise the assignats by calling them in and cancelling them; but in order to call them in, it was necessary to sell the property, and no one would open his eyes to the real difficulty, that of providing purchasers with the means of paying for one-third of the territory. The assembly had rejected compulsory measures, that is to say, the divesting the assignat of its monetary character and the forced loan; and she was undecided between the two voluntary means, namely, a lottery and a bank. The proscription of Cambon decided the preference in favour of the plan of Johannot, who had proposed the latter. But till this chimerical expedient could be made to succeed,—an expedient which even if it did succeed, never could bring back the assignats to a par with money,—the greatest evil, that of a difference between the nominal value and the real value, still existed. Thus the creditor of the state, or of individuals, took the assignat at par, and could only make use of it again for one-tenth at the utmost. Proprietors who had let their lands received but one-tenth of the rent. Instances were known of farmers who paid their rent with a sack of corn, a fatted pig, or a horse. The treasury, in particular, sustained a loss which contributed to the ruin of the finances, and consequently of the paper itself. It received from the tax-payer the assignat at its nominal value, and got about fifty millions a month, which were at most only worth five. To supply this deficit, and to cover the extraordinary expenses of the war, it was obliged to issue assignats to the amount of not less than eight hundred millions a month, on account of their great depreciation. The first thing to be done, while measures were being devised for withdrawing and raising them, was to re-establish the relation between their nominal value and their real value, so that the republic, the creditor of the state, the landowner, the capitalist, in short, all persons paid in paper, might not be ruined. Johannot proposed a return to metals as the measure of value. The price of the assignats, in reference to gold and silver, was to be ascertained every day, and they were no longer to be received but at that rate. He to whom one thousand francs were due was to be paid ten thousand in assignats, if the assignats were worth only one-tenth of the metals. The assessed taxes, rents, income of all kinds, the purchase-money of the national property, were to be paid in specie or in assignats, according to the course of exchange. An objection was made to this adoption of specie as the general standard of all property, in the first place, from an old dislike against metals, which were accused of having ruined paper; and in the next, because the English, having a great quantity of it, could, it was said, make it vary at pleasure, and would thus be masters of the credit of the assignats. These were sorry reasons; but they determined the convention to reject metals as the standard of worth. Jean-Bon-Saint-André then proposed to adopt corn, which among all nations was the essential standard of value, to which all others must have relation. Therefore, a calculation was to be made of the quantity of corn which could produce the sum required at the time when the transaction took place, and then there was to be paid in assignats so much in value as would be required to purchase at the moment the same quantity of corn. Thus he who owed rent, or a farm-rent, or taxes, to the amount of one thousand francs, at a time when one thousand francs represented one hundred quintals of corn, was to pay the present value of one hundred quintals of corn in assignats. But to this an objection was raised. The calamities of the war and the losses of agriculture had considerably enhanced the price of corn in proportion to all other articles of consumption or merchandise, and it was worth four times as much. According to the existing currency of the assignats, it ought to have cost more than ten times as much as the price of 1790, namely, one hundred francs the quintal; and nevertheless it cost four hundred. He who owed one thousand francs in 1790, would owe at that moment ten thousand francs if he paid according to the standard rate of silver, and forty thousand if he had to pay according to the standard price of corn; so that he would have to give a value four times as great. There was therefore no knowing what measure was to be adopted in reference to value. The deputy Raffron moved that from the 30th of the month assignats should fall one per cent. every day. An immediate outcry was raised that this would be a bankruptcy, as if it were not the same thing as reducing the assignats to the standard of specie or of corn, that is, to saddle them at once with a loss of ninety per cent. Bourdon, who talked continually of financial matters without understanding them, caused it to be decreed that any motion tending to bankruptcy would not be heard. Nevertheless, the reduction of the assignat to the course of exchange must have been attended with a most serious inconvenience. If in all payments, either for taxes, rents, debts due, or for national property, the assignat was to be taken no longer but at the rate to which it was daily sinking, the fall would have no end, for nothing could stop it. In the present state of things, in fact, the assignat, being still capable of serving, from its nominal value, for the payment of taxes, of rents, of all sums due, had a use which still gave a certain substantiality to its value; but if it was nowhere to be received but at the price of the day, it must sink indefinitely and without limit. The assignat issued to-day for one thousand francs might to-morrow not be worth more than one hundred francs, one franc, or one centime; it would, indeed, no longer ruin any one, either individuals or the state, for nobody would take it but for what it was worth; but its value being in no case compulsory, would instantly sink to nothing. There was no reason why a nominal thousand millions should not fall to one real franc, and then the resource of paper-money, still indispensable to the government, would entirely fail.

Dubois-Grancé, finding all these plans dangerous, opposed the reduction of the assignats to the course of exchange, and, regardless of the sufferings of those who were ruined by payment in paper, merely proposed to levy the land-tax in kind. The state might thus secure the means of maintaining the armies and the great communes, and avoid the issue of three or four thousand millions in paper, which it expended in procuring supplies. This plan, which at first appeared attractive, was afterwards thrown aside after a full investigation; it became necessary to seek some other.

But in the interval the evil was daily increasing: riots broke out in all parts on account of the deficiency of food, provisions, and fuel; bread was seen to be sold at the Palais Royal at twenty-two francs a pound; and the boatmen, at one of the ferries of the Seine, asked forty thousand francs for a service for which they formerly paid one hundred. A kind of despair seized every one; people cried out that an end must be put to this state of things, and that measures of some sort must absolutely be devised. In this distressing situation, Bourdon (of the Oise), a very ignorant financier, who talked upon all these questions like one possessed, discovered, doubtless accidentally, the only suitable expedient for getting out of the dilemma. It would have been difficult, as we have seen, to reduce the assignats to the course of exchange, for no one could know whether silver or corn ought to be taken for a standard; and besides, it would have been stripping them immediately of all their value, and exposing them to an unlimited depreciation. To raise the value of the assignats by sinking them would have been quite as difficult, for that would have required the sale of the property, and to find purchasers for so great a quantity of immoveable property would have been almost impossible.

There was, however, one way of selling the property, and that was, to put it within the reach of purchasers, by requiring only such a value as they could give for it in the existing state of the public fortune. The property was then sold by auction; the result was, that offers were proportioned to the depreciation of paper, and that it was necessary to give in assignats five or six times the price of 1790. This was nothing else, it is true, than paying half the value of land at that period; but it was far too much for the present time; for land was not in reality worth half, nor a fourth, of what it was worth in 1790. There is no such thing as a value independent of relative circumstances. In America, in extensive continents, lands are of little value, because their mass is far superior to that of moveable capital. Such, one may say, was the case in France in 1795. It was requisite therefore to insist no longer on the fictitious value of 1790, but to that which could be gotten in 1795; for the real value of a thing is just so much as can be paid for it.

In consequence, Bourdon (of the Oise) suggested that the property should be disposed of without sale and by simple contract, to any one who should offer three times the value of 1790 in assignats. In case of competition the preference was to be given to the first bidder. Thus property valued at one hundred thousand francs in 1790, was to be paid for by three hundred thousand francs in assignats. Assignats having fallen to one-fifteenth of their value, three hundred thousand francs represented in reality but twenty thousand effective francs; a purchaser, therefore, paid twenty thousand francs for a property which in 1790 was worth one hundred thousand. This was not losing the other four-fifths, since it became impossible to get more. Besides, had the sacrifice been real, there was no need of hesitation, for the advantages were immense.

In the first place, it obviated the inconvenience of the reduction to the course of exchange, which would have destroyed the paper. We have seen, in fact, that the assignat reduced to the course of exchange in making payment for every thing, even of the national property, would cease to have any fixed value whatever, and that it would fall to nothing. But in reserving it the power of being taken in payment for national property, it possessed a fixed value, for it would represent a certain quantity of land; being always capable of procuring that, it would always preserve the value of land, and no more perish than the land itself. Thus the annihilation of the paper was avoided. But there was something more; it was certain, and what took place two months afterwards proved it, that all the national property might have been sold immediately, on condition of paying for it thrice its value in 1790. All, or nearly all, the assignats might thus have been called in; those which should remain outstanding would have recovered their value; the state would then have issued more and made fresh use of this resource. It is true that in demanding only thrice the value of 1790, the state would be obliged to give much more land in order to withdraw the circulating mass of paper; but they would still have enough left to suffice for fresh extraordinary calls. Moreover, the assessed taxes, now reduced to nothing, because they were paid in depreciated assignats, would recover their value if the assignat were either withdrawn or raised. The national property, consigned at once to individual industry, would begin to be productive both for the owners and for the treasury; in short, the most frightful catastrophe was averted, for the just relation of value was re-established.

The plan of Bourdon (of the Oise) was adopted, and preparations were immediately made for carrying it into execution; but the storm which had been so long gathering, and of which the 12th Germinal had been but the harbinger, had become more threatening than ever; it had overspread the horizon, and was ready to burst. The two contending parties acted each after their own fashion. The counter-revolutionists, predominating in certain sections, got up petitions against the measures in favour of which Chénier had reported, and particularly against that article which punished with banishment the abuse of the press by the royalists. The patriots, on their part, at the last extremity, were contemplating a desperate project. The execution of Fouquier-Tinville, condemned with several jurymen of the revolutionary tribunal for the manner in which he had performed his functions, had pushed their irritation to the highest pitch. Though discovered in their plan of the 29th Germinal, and recently thwarted in a second attempt to make all the sections permanent upon pretext of the dearth, they did not the less conspire in various populous quarters. They concluded by forming a central committee of insurrection, whose station was in the Rue Mauconseil between the quarters of Saint Denis and Montmartre. It was composed of old members of the revolutionary committees and divers individuals of the same character, almost all unknown out of their own quarter. The plan of insurrection was sufficiently pointed out by all the events of the same nature; to put the women in front, to cause them to be followed by an immense mob, to surround the convention by so great a crowd that no one could come to her assistance, to force her to turn out the seventy-three, to recall Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, to release the deputies confined at Ham, as well as the imprisoned patriots, to put in force the constitution of 1793, and thus give a new commune to Paris, to recur anew to all the revolutionary measures, the maximum, requisitions, &c.; such was the plan entertained by all the patriots. They reduced it into the form of a manifesto, consisting of eleven articles, and published in the name of the sovereign people who had resumed their rights. They caused it to be printed on the evening of the 30th Floréal (May 19th), and caused it to be circulated throughout Paris. The inhabitants of Paris were therein exhorted to repair to the convention, with these words on their hats;—Bread, and the constitution of '93! The whole night between the 30th Floréal and the 1st Prairial (May 20) was passed in uproar, shouts, and threats. The women ran about the streets, declaring that they must next day go to the convention, that the convention had put Robespierre to death merely to seat herself in his place, that she was starving the people, protecting the shopkeepers who were sucking the blood of the poor, and put all the patriots to death. They encouraged one another to march in the front, because, they said, the armed force would not dare fire upon women.

Next morning, (1st Prairial, year III. Wednesday, May 20,) at day-break, there was a general tumult in the faubourgs Saint-Antoine and Saint-Marceau, in the quarter of the Temple, in the Rues Saint-Denis and Saint-Martin, and more particularly in the ciôté. The patriots caused all the bells which they could get at to be rung; they beat the generale, and fired cannon. At the same moment, the tocsin was rung in the Tower of L'Unité, by order of the committee of general safety, and the sections assembled, but those who were in the plot had assembled very early, and were already marching in arms long before the others received the intelligence. The mob constantly increasing, gradually advanced in the direction of the Tuileries. A disorderly crowd of women mixed with drunken men, shouting, Bread, and the constitution of '93! bands of ruffians armed with pikes, sabres, and all sorts of weapons, a torrent of the lowest rabble, lastly, some battalions of the sections regularly armed, composed this concourse, and marched without order towards the object pointed out to all, the convention. Near ten o'clock they reached the Tuileries, besieged the hall of the assembly, and closed all the outlets.

The deputies, hastily assembled, were at their post. The members of the Mountain, who had no communication with that obscure committee of insurrection, had not been informed of this movement, and, like their colleagues, knew nothing of the commotion except by the shouts of the populace and the jangling of the tocsin. They even mistrusted, first the committee of general safety had laid a snare for the patriots, and had caused them to commit an outbreak for the purpose of wreaking its vengeance upon them. The assembly had scarcely met, when the deputy Lebean read the manifesto of the insurrection. The guillotine, occupied from early hour in the morning by the patriots, immediately rang with boisterous applause. On seeing the convention thus surrounded, a deputy exclaimed, that she would know how to die at her post. "Yes! yes!" cried all the deputies, rising immediately. One of the galleries, better occupied than the others, applauded this declaration. At this moment they heard the uproar increase on the outside, the waves of that animated tide, the populace, were heard to roar, the deputies, meanwhile, succeeded each other in the tribune, offering various observations. All at once, a swarm of women poured into the galleries, trampling over those who occupied them, and shouting, Bread! bread! Veinier, the president, put on his hat and commanded silence, but they still continued to cry out, Bread! bread! Some shook their fists at the assembly, others jeered at its confusion. A great number of members rose for the purpose of speaking, they could not make themselves heard. They desired the president to enforce respect for the convention, but the president was not able to do this. André Dumont, who had presided with firmness on the 12th Germinal, succeeded Veinier in the chair. The uproar continued, the shouts of Bread! bread! were repeated by the women who had rushed into the galleries. André Dumont declared that he would have them turned out; he was answered by yells on the one side, and greeted with applause on the other. At this moment were heard the noise of violent blows against that door which is on the left of the clerks' table, as also the confused noise of a multitude striving to break it open. The hinges of the door creaked, and pieces of plaster began to fall. In this perilous situation the president addressed a general, who had appeared at the bar with a company of young men, to present a very proper petition in the name of the section of Bon-Consil. "General," said he, "I charge you to protect the national representation, and I appoint you provisional commandant of the armed forces." The assembly confirmed this appointment by then cheers. The general declared that he would die at his post, and withdrew to repair to the scene of the conflict. At this moment the noise that was made at one of the doors ceased, and a slight degree of tranquillity was restored. André Dumont, addressing the galleries, charged all the good citizens who occupied them to withdraw, declaring that force would be immediately employed to clear them. Many citizens went out, but the women remained, still shouting the same words. A few moments afterwards, the general, charged by the president to protect the convention, returned with an escort of fusiliers and a number of young men, who had provided themselves with postillions' whips. They scolded the galleries, and turned the women out by using the whips. The women fled, screaming dreadfully, amidst the loud applause of part of the spectators.

The galleries had been scarcely cleared, than the noise at the left hand door increased. The mob had returned to the charge, it made a fresh attack on the door, which, yielding to the violence used, was burst open and broken. The members of the convention retired to the upper benches, the general forming a line around them for their protection. The armed citizens of the sections immediately entered the hall by the right hand door to drive out the populace. They turned back at first and seized some women; but they were soon driven back in their turn by the victorious populace. Fortunately, the section of Grenelle, the first to run to the assistance of the convention, at this moment came up and furnished a useful reinforcement. The deputy Augus was at its head, sabre in hand. "Forward!" he cried. His men closed, advanced, crossed bayonets, and drove back, without wounding, the multitude of the assailants, who gave way at the sight of cold steel. One of the rioters was seized by the collar, dragged to the foot of the clerks' table, searched, and his pockets were found full of bread. It was now two o'clock. Quiet being somewhat restored in the assembly, it was declared that the section of Grenelle had deserved well of the country. All the foreign ambassadors had repaired to the box reserved for them, as if to share, in some measure, the dangers of the convention, and they witnessed this scene. It was decreed that mention should be made in the printed vote of the day of their courageous devotedness.

Meanwhile the crowd around the hall kept increasing. Scarcely had two or three sections time to come up and to throw themselves into the national palace; but they could not withstand the constantly increasing host of the assailants. Others were coming up, but they could not make their way into the interior. They were without any communication with the committees, they had received no orders, they knew not what use to make of their arms. At this moment the mob made a fresh attempt on the hall of liberty, and got as far as the broken door. Shouts of Aux armes! were renewed, and the armed force within the hall hastened to the door that was exposed; the president put on his hat; the assembly continued calm. The parties closed with one another, and a battle took place before the door itself. The defenders of the convention crossed bayonets. The assailants on their part fired, and the balls struck the walls of the hall. The deputies rose, crying, The republic for ever! Fresh detachments arrived, crossed over from the right to the left, and assisted to repel the attack. The firing increased; they charged, they intermingled, and fought hand to hand with swords. But an immense crowd in the rear of the assailants propelled and pushed them in spite of themselves upon the bayonets, overthrowing all the obstacles that opposed it, and rushed violently into the assembly. A young deputy, inspired by courage and self-devotion, Féraud, who had recently returned from the army of the Rhine, and had been for a fortnight running about in the vicinity of Paris to hasten the arrival of supplies, flew to meet the rioters, and besought them not to advance further. "Kill me," cried he, baring his bosom; "you must pass over my body before you shall enter." Accordingly he threw himself on the ground to endeavour to stop them; but these furious wretches, without heeding him, passed over his body and rushed towards the clerks' table. 'Threes o'clock came. Drunken women, men armed with sabres, pikes, and muskets, having on their hats the words, Bread, and the constitution of '93! filled the hall. Some seated themselves on the lower benches which the deputies had left on retiring to the upper ones; others covered the floor, placed themselves before the bureau, or ascended the small flight of steps leading to the president's chair. A young officer of the sections, namely Mally, who was standing on the steps of the clerks' table, snatched from one of these men the inscription which was on his hat. He was instantly fired at, and fell wounded in several places. At this moment all the pikes and all the bayonets were turned towards the president. A fence of iron was placed around his head. It was Boissy-d'Anglas who had succeeded André Dumont; he remained calm and immovable. Féraud, who had got up from the floor, hastened to the foot of the tribune, tore his hair, beat his breast for very vexation; and on perceiving the danger of the president, rushed towards him for the purpose of covering him with his own body. One of the pikemen would have pulled him back by the coat; an officer, with a view to release Féraud, struck with his fist the man who held him; the latter returned the blow by firing a pistol-shot, which wounded Féraud in the shoulder. The unfortunate young man fell; he was dragged away, trampled upon, carried out of the hall, and his dead body handed over to the populace.

Boissy-d'Anglas continued calm and unshaken during this frightful scene; bayonets and pikes still surrounded his head. At this moment commenced a scene of confusion which baffles description. Every one attempted to speak, and shouted to no purpose to make himself heard. The drums bent to restore silence; but the mob, enjoying the confusion, bawled, kicked, and stamped with delight, on seeing the state to which that supreme assembly was reduced. It was not so done on the 31st of May, when the revolutionary party, headed by the commune, the staff of the sections, and a great number of deputies to receive and give the password, surrounded the convention with a mute and armed multitude, and besieging without rushing in upon her, obliged her to pass, with an apparent dignity, the decrees it wanted to obtain. Here there was no mutual communication, or any means whatever adopted for extorting at least the apparent sanction of the wishes of the patriots. A cannoner surrounded by fusiliers ascended the tribune, for the purpose of reading the plan of insurrection. His reading was every moment interrupted by shouts, by abuse, and by the rolling of the drums. One man wanted to speak and to address the multitude. "My friends," said he, "we are all here for the same cause. The danger presses, we want decrees; allow your representatives to pass them." Shouts of "down! down!" were the only reply. The deputy, Rhul, a venerable-looking old man, and a zealous Mountaineer, would have spoken a few words from his place, with a view to obtain silence, but he was interrupted by renewed bawlings. Romme, an austere man, disconnected with the insurrection, as was the whole Mountain, but who was desirous that the measures demanded by the people might be adopted, and saw with pain that this tremendous confusion would be unproductive of result, like that of the 12th Germinal; Romme asked leave to speak: Duroi also asked it, for the same purpose, but neither the one or the other could obtain the permission. The tumult commenced anew and lasted for more than an hour. During this scene, a head was brought in on the point of a bayonet. The deputies fixed their eyes on it with horror, but could not recognise it. Some said it was the head of Fréron, others that it was Féraud's. It was in fact the head of Féraud, which some ruffians had cut off and put upon the point of a bayonet. They paraded it in the hall, amidst the yells of the rabble. The rage against the president, Boissy-d'Anglas, was again exhibited; again he was in danger, his head was encompassed with bayonets; he was pointed at from all sides, he was exposed to a thousand deaths.

It was now seven in the evening. The assembly trembled, fearing lest this mob, among whom were to be found some most dreadful ruffians, should proceed to the last extremities, and murder the representatives of the people amidst the darkness of night. Several members of the centre persuaded certain Mountaineers to speak and to exhort the multitude to disperse. Vernier did his best to hint to the rioters that it was late, that they ought to think of retiring, and that they were likely to expose the people to the want of bread by disturbing the expected arrivals. "It is a mere put-off," replied the mob; "you told us that three months ago." Several voices were then successively raised from amidst the crowd. One demanded the release of the patriots and of the arrested deputies; another the constitution of '93; a third, the apprehension of all the emigrants; a multitude of others, the permanence of the sections, the re-establishment of the commune, the appointment of a commander of the armed Parisian force, domiciliary visits to search for hidden articles of consumption; assignats at par, &c. One of these men, who contrived in making himself heard for a few moments, desired the immediate appointment of a commander of the Parisian armed force, and that Soubrany should be chosen. Lastly, one man more, not knowing what to ask, cried out, The arrest of the rogues and the cowards! and for half an hour he kept repeating from time to time, The arrest of the rogues and the cowards!

One of the ringleaders, at length aware of the necessity of settling something, proposed to make the deputies descend from the upper benches on which they had seated themselves, in order to collect them in the middle of the hall, and make them deliberate. The suggestion was instantly adopted. They were pushed from their seats, forced to descend, and driven like a flock of sheep into the space which divides the tribune from the lower benches. Here they were surrounded by men who hedged them in with a row of pikes. Vernier now took the chair, instead of Boissy-d'Anglas, who was exhausted with fatigue after so perilous a presidency of six hours. It was now nine o'clock. A sort of deliberation was now organized; it was settled that the people should remain covered, and that the deputies alone should take off their hats in token of approbation or disapprobation. The Mountaineers began to hope that the decrees might be passed, and prepared to speak. Romme, who had already spoken once, demanded that a decree should be passed for the release of the patriots. Duroi said that ever since the 9th Thermidor, the enemies of the country had exercised a baneful reaction; that the deputies arrested on the 12th Germinal had been illegally arrested, and that their recall ought to be pronounced. The president was compelled to put these various propositions to the vote; hats were taken off, they shouted adopted! adopted! amidst a tremendous uproar, without any body being able to distinguish whether the deputies had really given their votes or not. Goujon succeeded Romme and Duroi, and said that it was necessary to insure the execution of the decrees; that the committees did not make their appearance, that it was right to inquire what they were about; that they ought to be summoned to give an account of their operations, and be replaced by an extraordinary commission. It was that, in point of fact, in which the peril of the day consisted. Had the committees continued free agents, they could have come and delivered the convention from its oppressors. Albitto, the elder, observed that the deliberation was not carried on with sufficient order, that there was no one at the clerks' table, and that the bureau should be formed. The bureau was immediately arranged. Bourbotte demanded the arrest of the journalists. An unknown voice made itself heard, and said, that in order to show that the patriots were not cannibals, the punishment of death ought to be abolished. "Yes, yes," cried another, "except for the emigrants and the forgers of assignats." This proposition was adopted in the same form as the preceding. Duquesnoi reverted to Goujon's proposition, and renewed the demand for the suspension of the committees, and the appointment of an extraordinary commission of four members. Bourbotte, Prieur (of La Marne), Duroi, and Duquesnoi were immediately nominated. These four deputies accepted the functions committed to their charge. Were they ever so perilous, they would learn, they said, to fulfil them, or to die at their post. They withdrew for the purpose of repairing to the committees, and possessing themselves of all the powers. That was the difficulty, and the events of the day depended entirely on the results of the operation.

It was nine o'clock. Neither the insurrectional committee or the government committees appear to have acted during this long and awful day. All that the insurrectional committee had been able to do was to set the populace upon the convention; but, as we have already observed, obscure leaders, such as are left at the rag-end of a party, having at their disposal neither the commune, or the staff of the sections, or a commandant of the armed force, or deputies, had not been able to direct the insurrection with the prudence and the vigour which would have insured its success. They had set on a pack of furious wretches, who had perpetrated atrocious outrages, but who had not done any one thing they ought to have done. No detachment had been sent to suspend and neutralize the committees, to open the prisons, and to deliver the energetic men whose assistance would have been so precious. They had merely possessed themselves of the arsenal, which the gendarmerie of the tribunals, composed entirely of Fouquier-Tinville's militia, had given up to the first comers. In the mean time the committees of the government, surrounded and defended by the jeunesse dorée, had been exerting all their efforts to assemble the sections. This was no easy task, with the tumult that prevailed, with the consternation that had seized many of them, and the ill-will that was even manifested by some of them. They had at the outset collected two or three, whose efforts, as we have seen, had been repelled by the assailants. They had subsequently contrived to collect a greater number, thanks to the zeal of the section Lepelletier, formerly called Filles-Saint-Thomas, and they were preparing towards night to seize the moment when the people, completely wearied out, should be thinning, to fall upon the rioters and to deliver the convention. Foreseeing clearly that in this long period of duration the mob would have wrung from the assembly the decrees she had no desire to pass, they had adopted a resolution declaring that they should not consider as legal the decrees issued on that day. These arrangements being made, Legendre, Auguis, Chénier, Delecloi, Bergoong, and Kervélégan had repaired at the head of strong detachments to the convention. Having got thither, it was arranged that the doors should be left open, so that the mob, pressed on one side, might be able to go out on the other. The next thing was for Legendre and Delecloi to make their way into the hall, to mount the tribune in spite of every danger, and to call upon the rioters to withdraw. "If they do not obey," said those deputies to their colleagues, "charge, and don't concern yourselves about us. Keep pushing on, even though we should perish in the fray."

Legendre and Delecloi actually did get into the hall, at the moment when the four deputies appointed to form the extraordinary commission were leaving. Legendre ascended the tribune in the midst of insults and blows, and began to speak, although hooted at. "I exhort the assembly to remain firm," said he, "and the citizens who are here to withdraw." "Down! down!" was the cry. Legendre and Delecloi were compelled to retire. Duquesnoi then addressed his colleagues of the extraordinary commission, and desired them to follow him, in order to suspend the committees, who, as they saw, were adverse to the operations of the assembly. Soubrany urged them to lose no time. As all four of them were going out, they met the detachment headed by the representatives Legendre, Kervélégan and Auguis, as also by Raffet, the commandant of the national guard. Prieur (of La Marne) asked Raffet if he had obtained the president's order for entering. "I am not accountable to you," replied Raffet, and he advanced. He then ordered the mob to withdraw, and the president also exhorted it to do so in the name of the law. The mob replied by hissing and hooting. The bayonets were immediately lowered; the detachment entered; the unarmed rabble gave way, but the armed men mingled with the crowd resisted for a moment; they were driven back, and fled, shouting, "Hé!p, sans-culottes!" A part of the patriots returned at this cry, and charged with fury the detachment that had got in. They obtained a momentary advantage: Kervélégan was wounded in the hand; the Mountaineers, Bourbotte, Peyssard, and Gaston, shouted, "Victory!" But the charge-step was heard in the outer hall; a considerable reinforcement had arrived, who fell again upon the insurgents, drove them back, and pursued them with swords and bayonets. They fled, either crowding to the doors, or clambering up to the galleries, or made their escape by the windows. The hall was at length cleared: it was now midnight.

The convention, delivered from the assailants who had carried violence and death into its presence, took a few minutes to recover itself. Order was at length restored. "It is then true," exclaimed a member, "that this assembly, the cradle of the republic, had once more nearly been its grave. Fortunately, the crime of the conspirators is rendered abortive. But, representatives, you would not be worthy of the nation, if you were not to avenge it in a signal manner." Applause burst from all sides, and, as on the 12th Germinal, the night was spent in punishing the illegalities of the day; but acts quite as important, although differing in their character, called for measures of another kind of severity. The first thing done was to repeal the decrees proposed and passed by the rioters. "Repeal (rapporter) is not the proper word," it was observed to Legendre, who had made this motion. "The convention has not voted, nay, could not vote, while one of its members was being murdered. All that has been done concerns her not, but rather the brigands who oppressed her, and some guilty representatives who made themselves their accomplices." All that had been done was then declared null and void. The secretaries burned the minutes of the decrees passed by the rioters. They now sought for those deputies who had spoken during that terrible sitting; they were pointed out with the finger; they were called upon with vehemence. "There is no longer," said Thibaudéau, "any hope of reconciliation between ourselves and a factious minority. Since the sword is drawn, we must fight that minority, and avail ourselves of circumstances for restoring peace and security for ever to this assembly. I move that you decree forthwith the arrest of those deputies who, betraying their duty, have endeavoured to realize the wishes of rebellion, and framed them into laws. I propose that the committees immediately submit to you the severest measures against those representatives who have shown themselves so regardless of their country and their oaths." They were then named: there were Rhul, Romme, and Duroi, who had commanded silence for the purpose of opening the deliberation; Albitte, who had proposed the appointment of a bureau; Goujon and Duquesnoi, who demanded the suspension of the committees, and the formation of an extraordinary commission of four members; Bourbotte and Prieur (of La Marne), who with Duroi and Duquesnoi had consented to be members of that commission; Soubrany, whom the rebels had nominated commandant of the Parisian army; and Peyssard, who shouted victory during the fight. Duroi and Goujon desired to speak: they were prevented; they were treated as murderers; a decree was instantly passed against them, and it was begged that they should not be suffered to escape, like most of those against whom a decree had been passed on the 12th Germinal. The president directed the gendarmerie to take charge of them and bring them to the bar. Romme, who delayed coming forward, was sought for; Bourdon pointed him out with his finger, and he was dragged to the bar with his colleagues. Retributory vengeance did not stop there; the feeling was for its being extended to all those Mountaineers who had rendered themselves conspicuous by extraordinary missions in the departments. "I demand," cried one voice, "the arrest of Lecarpentier, the executioner of La Manche." "Of Pinet the elder," cried another, "the executioner of the people of Biscay." "Of Borie," cried a third, "the devastator of the south, and of Fayau, one of the exterminators of La Vendée." These propositions were decreed, with shouts of The convention for ever! the republic for ever! "Let us have no more half measures," said Tallien. "The object of this day's movement was to re-establish the Jacobins, and particularly the commune: we must destroy what remains of them; Pache and Bouchotte ought to be arrested. This is only the prelude to the measures which the committee will submit to you. Vengeance, citizens, vengeance against the murderers of their colleagues and of the national representation. Let us take every advantage of the unskilfulness of these men, who fancy themselves the equals of those who overthrew the throne, and strive to compete with them; of these men, who wish to create revolutions, but can only concoct riots. Let us take every advantage of their unskilfulness; let us lose no time in punishing them, and thus put an end to the revolution." The proposition of Tallien was applauded and adopted. In this paroxysm of vengeance there were voices which denounced Robert Lindet, whose virtues and whose services had hitherto protected him from the fury of the reaction. Lehardi demanded the arrest of that monster; but so many voices were raised to extol Lindet's humanity, to attest that he had saved communes and whole departments, that they passed on to the order of the day. After these measures, the disarming of the Terrorists was again ordered. It was decreed that on the following Quintidi (Sunday, May 24), the sections should assemble, and proceed immediately to the discarding of the murderers, the blood-drinkers, the robbers, and the agents of the tyranny which preceded the 9th Thermidor; they were even authorized to cause all those to be apprehended whom they were of opinion should be brought before the tribunals. It was decided at the same time, that, till further order, women should not be admitted into the tribunals. It was now three in the morning. The committees sent word that all was quiet in Paris, and the sitting was adjourned to ten o'clock.

Such was the insurrection of the 1st of Prairial. No event of the revolution had exhibited so fearful a spectacle. If on the 31st of May and the 9th Thermidor, cannon had been pointed at the convention, still the place of its sittings had not been invaded, stained with blood spilt in a conflict, traversed by musket-balls, or sullied by the murder of a representative of the people. The revolutionists had this time acted with the awkwardness and violence of a party long beaten, without accomplices in the government from which it is excluded, deprived of its leaders, and directed by obscure, compromised, and desperate men. Without knowing how to make use of the Mountain, without even apprising it of the movement, they had jeopardized and exposed to the scaffold upright deputies, no parties to the excesses of the terror, attached to the patriots by the fear of reaction, and who had spoken merely to prevent greater calamities, and to accomplish some aspirations with which they were identified.

The rioters, however, seeing the fate that awaited them all, habituated moreover to revolutionary conflicts, were not the men to disperse all at once. They assembled on the following day at the commune, proclaimed themselves in permanent insurrection, and endeavoured to rally around them the sections most devoted to their cause. However, conceiving that the commune was not a good post, though it was situated between the quarter of the Temple and the cité, they preferred establishing the centre of the insurrection in the faubourg Saint-Antoine. Thither they transferred themselves in the middle of the 12th of the preceding day, to renew the attack of the preceding day. On this occasion they ^{thought} ~~thought~~ to act with more order and caution. They despatched three battalions, completely armed, disciplined; they were those of the sections of the Quinze-Vingts, of Montreuil, and of Popincourt, all three composed of stout working men, at ^{the} ~~under~~ the command of fearless leaders. These battalions advanced alone, without the concurrence of people which accompanied them on the preceding day, met some of the sections that adhered to the convention, but who were not strong enough to stop them, and came in the afternoon to draw up with their cannon before the national palace. The sections of Lepelletier, of the Butte-des-Moulins, and others, immediately stationed themselves opposite to protect the convention. It was, nevertheless, doubtful in case a battle should ensue, whether victory would remain with the defenders of the national representation. By an unfortunate coincidence, the cannoneers, who in all the sections were mechanics and hot revolutionists, abandoned the sections drawn up before the palace, and went with their cannon to join those of Popincourt, Montreuil, and the Quinze-Vingts. Shouts of "To arms!" were heard. The muskets were loaded on both sides, and every thing seemed to be ready for a bloody conflict. The dull rolling of the guns was heard in the assembly. Many of the members rose to speak. "Representatives!" exclaimed Legendre, "be calm, and remain at your post. Nature has decreed that we must all die; whether a little sooner or a little later is of no consequence. Good citizens are ready to defend you. Meanwhile, the most becoming motion is to keep silence." The whole assembly again sent itself, and showed the same impressive calmness as it had displayed on the 9th Thermidor, and on so many occasions in the course of this stormy session. During this time the adverse forces were face to face in the most threatening attitude. Before they came to blows, some individuals exclaimed that it was a frightful thing for good citizens to slaughter one another, that they ought at least to explain themselves, and endeavour to understand one another. They left their ranks and stated their grievances. Members of the committees, who were present, introduced themselves among the battalions of the hostile sections, talked to them, and finding that much might be effected by conciliatory means, they required of the assembly twelve of her members to come and fraternize. The assembly, who considered this step as a kind of weakness, was by no means disposed to assent to it; still, as she was informed that the committees deemed it ^{very} ~~very~~ ^{useful} ~~useful~~ for preventing the effusion of blood, the twelve members were sent, and introduced themselves to the three sections. The ranks were soon broken on both sides, and became intermixed. The uncultivated man of a lower class is always sensible of the amicable demonstrations of the man who is placed above him by dress, language, and manners. The soldiers of the three adverse battalions were affected, and declared that they would neither spill the blood of their fellow-citizens, or be deficient in the respect due to the national convention. The ringleaders, nevertheless, insisted on having their petition heard. General Dulong, commanding the cavalry of the sections, and twelve representatives deputed to fraternize, were sent to introduce at the bar a deputation of the three battalions.

In fact, they did present it, and requested that the petitioners should be heard. Some of the deputies were for refusing them; at last, however, it was granted. "We are commissioned to demand at your hands," said the spokesman of the troop, "the constitution of 1793, and the release of the patriots." At these words the galleries began to hoot and shout, "Down with the Jacobins!" The president imposed silence on these interrupters. The speaker continued, and said that the citizens assembled before the convention were ready to retire into the bosom of their families, but that they would die rather than forsake their post, if the claims of the people were not hearkened to. The president replied with firmness to the petitioners, that the convention had just passed a decree relative to articles of consumption, and he would read it to them. He actually did read it, and then added, that the assembly would examine their proposals, and judge in its wisdom what it ought to decide upon. He next invited them to the honours of the sitting.

Meanwhile, the three hostile sections were still mingled with the others. They were told that their petitioners had been just then received, that their propositions would be inquired into, and that they must await the decision of the convention. It was eleven o'clock. The three battalions found themselves surrounded by the immense majority of the citizens of the capital; the day, moreover, was far advanced, especially for mechanics, and they resolved upon retiring to their faubourgs.

This second attempt had not been more successful than the former for the patriots. They nevertheless remained assembled in the faubourgs, preserving their hostile appearance, and not yet desisting from the demands they had made. Since the morning of the 3rd, the convention had passed several decrees which the state of things required. To impart more unity and energy to the employment of these means, she gave the direction of the armed force to the representatives, Gilet, Aubry, and Delmas, and authorized them to resort to arms for the purpose of insuring the public tranquillity; she punished with six months imprisonment any one who should beat the drum without order, and with death whosoever should beat the generale without being authorized so to do by the representatives of the people. She ordered the formation of a military commission for the immediate trial and execution of all the prisoners taken from the rebels of the 1st Prairial. She converted into a decree of accusation the decree of arrest issued against Duquesnoi, Duroi, Bouchotte, Prieur (of La Marne), Romme, Soubrany, Goujon, Albitte the elder, Peyssard, Lecarpentier (of La Manche), Pinet the elder, Borie, and Fayau. The convention made the same adjudication respecting the deputies arrested on the 12th and 16th Germinal, and enjoined her committees to present a report respecting the tribunal that was to try both the one and the other.

The three representatives lost no time in collecting in Paris the troops dispersed in the environs to protect the arrivals of corn; they made the sections attached to the convention remain under arms, and surrounded themselves with a great number of the young men who had never quitted the committee during the whole insurrection. The military commission entered upon office the very same day: the first person whom it tried was the murderer of Féraud, who had been apprehended the preceding day; the commission condemned him to death, and directed that his execution should take place in the afternoon of the same day, the 3rd. The culprit was actually conveyed to the scaffold; but the patriots being apprised of the circumstance, some of the most determined of them assembled round the place of execution, rushed upon the scaffold, dispersed the gendarmerie, rescued the condemned man and took him to the faubourg. That very night they called to their aid all the patriots who were in Paris, and made their preparations for entrenching themselves in the faubourg Saint-Antoine. They put themselves under arms, pointed their cannon upon the Place de la Bastille, and thus awaited the consequences of this audacious deed.

As soon as this event was known to the convention, it decreed that the faubourg Saint-Antoine should be summoned to give up the condemned, and to surrender its arms and its cannon, and that, in case of refusal, it should be immediately bombarded. In fact, at this moment, the forces collected justified the convention in using more imperative language. The three representatives had found means to bring together three or four thousand men, troops of the line; they had more than twenty thousand men of the armed sections, to whom the fear of seeing the reign of terror re-established imparted great courage, and lastly, the devoted troop of the young men. They immediately invested general Menou with the command of this collective force, and prepared to march against the faubourg. On that same day, 4th Prairial (23rd May), while they were advancing, the jeunesse dorée had intended to make a bravado, and were first to reach the Rue Saint-Antoine. A thousand or twelve hundred individuals composed this adventurous troop. The patriots suffered them to engage without offering any resistance, and then surrounded them on all sides. These youths soon saw in their rear the formidable battalions of the faubourg; they perceived at the windows a multitude of incensed women, ready to hurl upon them a shower of stones; and they concluded that they were about to pay very dear for their imprudent bravado. Fortunately for them, the armed force was approaching; besides, the inhabitants of the faubourg had no intention to murder them; and they permitted them to leave their quarter after giving some of them a severe drubbing. At this moment, general Menou came up with twenty thousand men; he caused all the outlets of the faubourg to be occupied, and especially those which communicated with the patriot sections. He ordered the cannon to be pointed, and the insurgents to be summoned. A deputation appeared, and came to receive his ultimatum, which consisted in requiring the delivery of the arms, and of the murderer of Féraud. The manufacturers and all the peaceable and wealthy people of the faubourg, dreading a bombardment, lost no time in using their influence over the population, and decided the three sections to surrender their arms. In point of fact, those of Popincourt, the Quinze-Vingts, and of Montreuil, accordingly delivered up their cannon, and promised to search for the convict who had been carried off. General Menou returned in triumph with the cannon of the faubourg, and from that moment the convention had nothing to fear from the patriot party. Overthrown for ever, from that time this party only appears as experiencing retributive vengeance.

The military commission immediately began to try all the prisoners that could be taken. It condemned to death some gendarmes who had sided with the rebels, some mechanics and shopkeepers, members of revolutionary committees, and taken flagrante delicto on the 1st Prairial. In all the sections the disarming of the patriots and the apprehension of the most notorious individuals commenced; and as one day was not sufficient for this operation, the sections were to continue their sittings till they had concluded.

But it was not only in Paris that the desperation of the patriots produced an explosion. It burst forth in the south by events quite as distressing. We have seen them, to the number of from seven to eight thousand, taking refuge in Toulon, surrounding the representatives several times, rescuing from them prisoners accused of emigration, and striving to involve the workmen of the arsenal, the garrison, and the crews of the ships, in their revolt. The squadron was ready to sail, and they wanted to prevent it. The crews of the ships arrived from Brost, and united with the Toulon division for the expedition which was then contemplated, were entirely opposed to them; but they could rely on the sailors belonging to the port of Toulon. They selected nearly the same time as the patriots of Paris for putting themselves in action. The representative Charbonnier, who had asked for leave of absence, was accused of being their secret director. They rose on the 25th Floréal (14th May), marched to the camp of Soulié, seized fifteen emigrant prisoners, returned in triumph to Toulon, and nevertheless consented to give them up to the representatives. But a few days afterwards, they assembled riotously, roused the workmen in the arsenal, secured the arms which it contained, and beleaguered the representative, Brunel, to make him issue an order for the release of the patriots. Nion the representative, who was on board the fleet, hastened ashore; but the sedition was victorious. The two representatives were forced to sign the order for release. Brunel, extremely mortified at having given way, blew out his brains; Nion sought refuge on board the fleet. The insurgents then thought of marching for Marseilles, to excite a rising, they said, of the whole south. But the representatives on mission at Marseilles stationed a company of artillery on the road, and took every precaution to prevent the execution of their designs. On the 1st Prairial, they were masters of Toulon, without the power, it is true, of extending themselves further, and were striving to gain over the crews of the squadron, one part of whom made resistance, while the other, composed entirely of Provençal seamen, appeared to have made up their mind to join them.

A report was made of these events to the convention on the 8th Prairial. It could not fail to cause renewed hatred against the Mountaineers and the patriots. It was said that the events in Toulon and Paris were the result of concerted acts; the Mountaineer deputies were accused of being the secret organizers thereof, and every one abandoned himself to the bitterest feeling against them. The arrest of Charbonnier, Escudier, Ricord, and Salicetti, all four accused of agitating the south, was immediately ordered. The deputies placed under accusation on the 1st Prairial, and whose judges were not yet appointed, were exposed to further and aggravated severity. Without any respect for their quality of representatives of the people, they were transferred to the military commission constituted for trying the abettors and accomplices of the insurrection of the 1st Prairial. The only exception was old Rhul, whose discretion and virtues were attested by several members. There were sent to the tribunal of the Eure and Loire, the ex-mayor Pache, his son-in-law Artoquin, Bouchotte, formerly minister at war, and his adjoints, Daubigny and Hassenfratz; and lastly, the principal agents of Robespierre's police, Héron, Marchand, and Clemence. It seemed that the sentence of transportation pronounced against Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, had acquired the force of a final judgment; no such thing. In these days of severity the punishment was deemed too mild; it was settled that they should be tried anew, and sent before the tribunal of the Lower Charente, to suffer that death appointed for all the leaders of the revolution. Up to this time, the remaining members of the old committees appeared to be pardoned; the signal services of Carnot, Robert Lindet, and Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or), had seemed to protect them from their enemies; they were now denounced with terrific violence by the Girondist, Henri Larivière. Robert Lindet, although defended by a multitude of members acquainted both with his merits and with his services, was nevertheless arrested. "Carnot has organized victory," cried a great number of voices; the furious re-actionists durst not pass a decree against the conqueror of the allied powers. Nothing was said respecting Prieur (of the Côte-d'Or). So far as concerned those members of the old committee of general safety, who had not before been arrested, they were all of them arrested on the present occasion. David, whose genius had caused his acquittal, was arrested with Jagot, Elie Lacoste, Lavicomterie, Dubarran, and Bernard (of Saintes). The only exception made was in favour of Louis (of the Lower Rhine), whose humanity was too well known. Lastly, the report already ordered against all those who had executed missions, and who were called proconsuls, was demanded immediately. Proceedings were commenced against Artigoyte, Mallarmé, Javogues, Sergeant, Monestier, Lejeune, Allard, Lacoste, and Baudot. Preparations were made for reviewing the conduct of all those who had been appointed to any mission whatever. Thus none of the heads of that government that had saved France was pardoned; members of committees, and deputies on mission, all were subjected to the general law. Carnot alone was spared, because the regard of the armies commanded forbearance towards him; but Lindet was stricken, a citizen quite as useful and more generous; for victories did not protect him against the cowardice of the re-actionists.

There was assuredly no need of such sacrifices as these to appease the manes of young Féraud; the affecting marks of respect paid to his memory ought to have sufficed. The convention decreed a funeral sitting in his honour. The hall was hung with black; all the representatives went in full dress and in mourning. Soft and mournful music opened the sitting; Louvet then delivered a panegyric on the young representative, so devoted, so courageous, so soon torn away from his country. A monument was voted to immortalize his heroism. Advantage was taken of the present opportunity to order a commemorative fête in memory of the Girondists. Nothing was more reasonable: victims so illustrious as they were, even though they would have compromised their country, deserved marks of respect; but it would have been sufficient to scatter flowers on their tombs; there was no necessity to sprinkle them with blood. Nevertheless, it was spilt in torrents; for no party, not even that which takes humanity for its device, is wise in its vengeance. It seemed, in fact, as if, not content with her losses, the convention herself desired to add to them. The accused deputies, confined at first in the castle of Taureau, to prevent any attempt on their behalf, were brought to Paris, and the preliminary proceedings against them were commenced with the greatest activity. The aged Rhul, who had alone been excepted from the decree of accusation, did not care for this pardon; he considered liberty as undone, and terminated his existence by stabbing himself. Affected by so many melancholy scenes, Louvet, Legendre, and Fréron moved that the deputies delivered up to the commission should be sent before their ordinary judges; but Rovère, formerly a Terrorist, and now a fiery royalist, and Bourdon (of the Oise), implacable like a man who has been alarmed, urged the decree, and caused it to be confirmed.

The deputies were brought before the commission on the 29th Prairial. In spite of the most careful inquiries, there was no fact which could prove their secret connivance with the insurgents. In point of fact, it would have been difficult to detect any such; for they knew nothing of the movement; they did not even know any thing of one another: Bourbotte alone was acquainted with Goujon, from having met him during a mission to the armies. All that was proved was, that the insurrection being accomplished, they had been desirous of legalizing some of the aspirations of the people. They were nevertheless condemned; for a military commission, to whom a government sends accused persons of importance, never knows how to return them acquitted. The only person the commission acquitted was Forestier. He had been coupled with the condemned, although he had not made a single motion during that remarkable sitting. Peyssard, who had merely uttered one cry during the conflict, was sentenced to transportation. Romme, Goujon, Duquesnoi, Duroi, Bourbotte, and Soubrany, were condemned to death. Romme was a simple and austere man; Goujon was young, handsome, and endowed with excellent qualities; Bourbotte, as young as Goujon, combined extraordinary courage with the most polished education; Soubrany had formerly been a noble, but was sincerely devoted to the cause of the revolution. At the moment when their sentence was pronounced, they delivered to the registrar letters, packets, and portraits, to be retained for their families. They were made to withdraw, for the purpose of putting them into a room, before being conducted to the scaffold. They had promised themselves that they never should go thither. All that they had left among them was one knife and one pair of scissors, which they had concealed in the lining of their clothes. In going down stairs, Romme was the first who stabbed himself; and fearing that he had failed in his object, he stabbed himself several times in the breast, the throat, and the face. He handed the knife to Goujon, who, with steady hand, gave himself a mortal blow, and fell lifeless. From the hand of Goujon, the instrument of liberation passed to those of Duquesnoi, Duroi, Bourbotte, and Soubrany. Unfortunately Duroi, Bourbotte, and Soubrany did not succeed in inflicting mortal wounds upon themselves; they were dragged, all bleeding as they were, to the scaffold. Soubrany, weltering in his blood, nevertheless retained, in spite of his sufferings, the composure and dignified bearing for which he had always been distinguished. Duroi was exceedingly mortified at having failed. "Enjoy," he exclaimed, "enjoy your triumph, messieurs royalists!" Bourbotte retained all the serenity of youth, and spoke with imperturbable calmness to the people. At the moment when he was about to receive the fatal stroke, it was perceived that the blade had not been drawn up; it was necessary to put the instrument to rights: he availed himself of this interval to utter some few words. He declared that none could die more devoted to his country, and more anxious for her prosperity and liberty. There were but few spectators at this execution: the period of political fanaticism had passed; they no longer murdered with that fury which formerly rendered people insensible. All hearts revolted on learning the particulars of this execution, and it caused the Thermidorians merited disgrace. Thus, in that long succession of conflicting ideas, all had their victims. The very ideas of clemency, humanity, reconciliation, had their holocausts; for in revolutions no one idea can remain guiltless of human blood.

The Mountaineer party thus found itself entirely destroyed. The patriots had just been conquered at Toulon. After a very bloody battle, fought on the road to Marseilles, they had been obliged to give up their arms, and to surrender that place on which they placed their chief reliance for raising all France in rebellion. They were, therefore, no longer an impediment; and, as usual, their fall occasioned that of several revolutionary institutions. That celebrated tribunal, which had been almost reduced, since the law of the 8th Nivôse, to an ordinary tribunal, was definitively abolished. All the accused were transferred to the criminal tribunals, who were to adjudicate according to the procedure of 1791; conspirators alone were to be tried according to the procedure of the 8th Nivôse, and without appeal. The word 'revolutionary,' as applied to institutions and establishments, was suppressed. The national guards were re-organized upon the old footing; labourers, domestic servants, citizens in narrow circumstances, in short, the populace, were excluded from them; and thus the duty of watching over the public tranquillity was confided anew to that class which had the greatest interest in maintaining it. At Paris, the national guard, organized by battalions, by brigades, and commanded alternately by each brigadier-general, was placed under the direction of the military committee. Lastly, that concession most of all desired by the Catholics, the restitution of the churches, was granted them; they were restored to them on condition of maintaining them at their own cost. This measure, although it had been the result of the re-action, was at the same time supported by the wisest heads. It was deemed proper to tranquillize the Catholics, who would never believe that they had recovered the freedom of worship so long as they had not their ancient edifices wherein to celebrate its ceremonies.

The financial discussions interrupted by the events of Prairial were still the most urgent and the most arduous. The assembly had resumed them as soon as tranquillity had been restored. She had revived the decree that there should be but one sort of bread, to deprive the people of an occasion to censure the luxury of the wealthy; she had also ordered accounts of the quantity of corn in the country, to secure the surplus of each department for the supply of the armies and great communes; lastly, she had repealed the decree permitting the free trading in gold and silver. Thus the pressure of circumstances had brought her back to some of those revolutionary measures against which every body had been so violently inveterate. Jobbing had been carried to the highest pitch of mania. There were no longer bakers, butchers, and grocers, duly licensed; everybody bought and sold bread, meat, groceries, oils, &c. The garrets and cellars were filled with goods and eatables, in which every one speculated. At the Palais Royal, white bread was sold at the rate of twenty-five or thirty francs per pound. The regraters and forestallers rushed into the markets and bought up all the fruit and vegetables brought in by the country people, for the purpose of selling them again immediately at a higher price. People went and bought beforehand unripe fruit and corn, or herds of cattle, in order to speculate afterwards upon a rise in the price. The convention forbade regraters and forestallers to appear in the markets before a certain hour. She was obliged to decree that the licensed butchers should alone buy cattle; and that corn could not be bought before harvest-time. Thus every thing was turned upside down; all persons, even the most unacquainted with commercial speculations, were on the look out for every turn of the assignat, in order to make the loss fall upon another, and to obtain for themselves a higher value for an article of consumption or any other commodity.

We have seen that between the two schemes, either for reducing the assignat to the course of exchange, or for collecting the taxes in kind, the convention had preferred that of selling the national property, not by auction, but at three times the price of 1790. This was, as we have observed, the only mode of selling it; for sale by auction invariably raised the price of the property in proportion to the fall of the assignat, that is, to a price beyond what the public could afford. So soon therefore as the law was passed, the number of offers was extraordinary. When it was known that the first offer qualified the party to pay no more for national property than thrice the value of 1790 in assignats, people thronged from all parts. For some properties there were several hundred offers; at Charenton there were three hundred and sixty for one estate which had formerly belonged to the Fathers of Morey; and so many as five hundred were made for another. The town-halls were crowded. Mere agents, men of no property, but who happened at the moment to have sums in assignats in their hands, hastened away to make offers for property. As they were obliged to pay down no more than one-sixth, and the remainder in several months, they bought with small sums very considerable estates, with a view to sell them again at a profit to those who had made less haste. Owing to this eagerness, estates which were not known by the administrations to have become national property, were pointed out as such. The plan of Bourdon (of the Oise) was therefore completely successful, and there was reason to hope that soon great portions of the property would be sold, and that the assignats would be either cancelled or raised in value. It is true, that by these sales the republic sustained losses which, calculated in figures, were considerable. The valuation of 1790, founded on the apparent revenue, was frequently inaccurate; for the possessions of the clergy and all those of the order of Malta were let very low; the farmers paid the surplus of the amount by way of presents, which were frequently equal to four times the rent reserved. A farm, ostensibly farmed at one thousand francs, produced in reality four thousand; according to the estimate of 1790 this estate amounted to twenty-five thousand francs in value; it might therefore be bought for seventy-five thousand in assignats, which were worth in reality no more than seven thousand five hundred francs. At Honfleur, some salt-warehouses, the building of which had cost more than four hundred thousand livres, were going to be sold in reality for twenty-two thousand five hundred livres. According to this calculation the loss was great; but there was no help for it, except by making it less by demanding four or five times the value of 1790, instead of no more than three.

Rewbell and a great number of deputies could not comprehend this; they only looked at the apparent loss. They alleged that the treasures of the republic were wasted, and this was how she was crippled in her resources. A great outcry was raised on all sides: those who did not understand the question, and those who saw with pain the property of the emigrants disappearing, leagued together to obtain a suspension of the decree. Balland and Bourdon (of the Oise) warmly defended it; they were unable to assign the essential reason, namely, that it was useless to ask more for property than the buyers could afford to give; but they said, what was true enough, that the numerical loss was not so great as it appeared to be; that seventy-five thousand francs in assignats were worth no more than seven thousand five hundred in monies numbered; but that money was worth thrice as much as formerly, and that seven thousand five hundred francs certainly represented fifteen thousand or twenty thousand francs in 1790; they said also that the actual loss was counterbalanced by the advantage that was gained by instantly putting an end to that financial catastrophe, by the cancelling or raising the assignats, by putting a stop to jobbing in merchandise, by attracting paper to land, by giving up forthwith the mass of the national property to individual industry, and lastly by taking away all hope from the emigrants.

The decree was nevertheless suspended. The administrations were ordered to continue to receive offers, so that all the national possessions might thus be discovered from private motives, and that a more accurate statement of them might be drawn up. A few days afterwards, the decree was repealed altogether, and it was decided that the national property should continue to be sold by auction.

Thus, after having had a glimpse of the means of putting an end to the crisis, it was abandoned, and the public relapsed into the frightful distress from which it might have extricated itself. In the mean time, as nothing was done to raise the assignats, it could not persist in the cruel fallacy of their nominal value, which was ruining the republic and the individuals paid in paper. It was absolutely necessary to return to the proposition already made of reducing the assignats. The proposal to reduce them to the currency of money was rejected, because the English, it was said, abounding in money, would govern the course of exchange, neither would the government consent to reduce them to the standard of coin, because the price of coin had considerably increased, the government had refused to take this opportunity to create a standard, and to reduce paper a certain amount every month, because that would be, as was said, divesting paper of its monetary character, and avowing a national bankruptcy. All these reasons were frivolous, whether they chose money, coin, or time, to determine the reduction of the paper. The bankruptcy did not consist in reducing the value of the assignat between private individuals, for the reduction, in fact, had already taken place, and to recognise it was only to prevent frauds, the bankruptcy rather consisted in re-establishing the sale of the national property by auction. What the republic had promised, indeed, was not that the assignats should be worth this or that sum between private individuals (for this did not depend upon her), but that they should procure a certain quantity of national property. Now in establishing the sale by auction the assignat would no longer procure a certain quantity of property, it became ineffective in regard to property as in respect of articles of consumption, it experienced the same fall from the effect of competition.

The government wanted to discover some other rule than money, coin, or time, for reducing the assignat, they chose the quantity of issues. It is true in principle that the increase of money in circulation proportionally augments the prices of all commodities. Now, if an article was worth one franc when there were two thousand millions of money in circulation, it must be worth two when there were four, three when there were six, four when there were eight, five when there were ten. Supposing the present circulation of assignats amounted to ten thousand millions, there must at this time be paid five times more for any thing than when there were only two thousand millions. A sliding scale was established, to commence from the period when there were but two thousand millions of assignats in circulation, and it was decided that in all payments made in assignats one-fourth more should be added for every five hundred millions added to the circulation. Thus for a sum of two thousand francs, promised to be paid when there were two thousand millions in circulation, there should be paid when there were two thousand five hundred millions, two thousand five hundred francs, when there were three thousand millions, there should be paid three thousand francs, and lastly, at the present moment, when there were ten thousand millions there were to be paid ten thousand francs.

Those who considered the divesting the assignat of its monetary character (démoneïsation) as a bankruptcy, were not likely to be satisfied with this measure; for instead of démoneïsation in the proportion of money, coin, or time, it démoneïsait in proportion to the issues, which amounted to the same thing, with the exception of one inconvenience, which was greater in the present instance. By means of the new scale, each issue would diminish the value of the assignat by a fixed and known quantity. In issuing five hundred millions, the state would take from the holder of the assignat a fourth, a fifth, a sixth, and so on, of what he possessed.

Although this scale, which had its inconveniences like all the other reductions to the current price of bullion or coin, ought at least to have been applied to every other transaction, yet the government did not venture upon this, it was first applied to the taxes and then arrears. A promise was given that it should be applied to the public officials when their number should have been reduced, and to the creditors of the state when the first receipts of the taxes after the new scale should admit of their being paid on the same footing. They did not dare permit creditors, of whatever kind they might be, owners of houses in town or country, or proprietors of factories, &c. to take advantage of the scale. The only favoured persons were the great landowners. The farmers making exorbitant profits upon the articles of consumption, and paying by means of the assignats only a tenth or a twelfth of the amount of their rent, were obliged to pay it according to the new scale. They were to furnish a quantity of assignats proportionate to the quantity issued since the time when their rent became due.

Such were the measures by which the government endeavoured to repress jobbing, and to put an end to the fluctuation in the value of all things. They consisted, as we have seen, in forbidding speculators to forestall the consumer in the purchase of estates and articles of consumption, and by settling a proportion between the amount that might be paid in assignats and the quantity of paper in circulation.

The closing of the Jacobins in Brumaire was the commencement of the ruin of the patriots, the event of the 12th Germinal had advanced it, but the event of Prarial perfected it. The mass of the citizens, who were hostile to them, not from royalism but from the dread of a new terror, were more inveterate against them than ever, and pursued them with the utmost rigour. They imprisoned or dismissed all those men who had ardently followed up the revolution. They exercised in respect to them acts quite as arbitrary as those against the old suspected persons. The prisons were crowded, as before the 9th Thermidor, but they were crowded with revolutionists. The number of the prisoners amounted not as then to nearly one hundred thousand persons, but to twenty or twenty-five thousand. The royalists triumphed. The disarming or imprisonment of the patriots, the execution of the Mountain deputies, the proceedings commenced against a great number of others, the suppression of the revolutionary tribunal, the restoration of the churches to the catholic religion, and the remodelling of the national guard, were all measures that filled them with joy and hope. They flattered themselves that they should soon compel the revolution to destroy itself, and that they should see the republic in prison or put to death all those who had founded it. To accelerate this movement, they intrigued in the sections, they excited them against the revolutionists, and instigated them to the greatest excesses. A vast number of emigrants returned, either with false passports or upon pretext of soliciting their erasure from the lists. The local administrations, renewed since the 9th Thermidor, and filled with men either weak in themselves or hostile to the republic, lent themselves to all the official falsehoods.

red of them: whatever had a tendency to atc the lot of those who were styled the vic- of terror seemed permissible in their eyes, they thus furnished a multitude of the enemies ier country with the means of returning to it in pieces. At Lyons, and in the whole of South, the royalist agents continued to make appearance again secretly. The companies asus and of the Sun had committed fresh mur- . At Nîmes, Avignon, and Mar- les, similar massacres had taken place. In the city, the mob had gone to Fort Saint-Jean, i there renewed the horrors of September inst the prisoners. The dominant party in the convention, com- sed of Thermidorians and Girondists, while ded- ing itself against the revolutionists, kept an e on the royalists, and felt the necessity of re- sssing them. This party immediately obtained leecree that the city of Lyons should be disarmed a detachment of the army of the Alps, and that e authorities who had suffered the patriots to be ordered should be removed. At the same time, e civil committees of the sections were enjoined revise the lists of detention, and to order the lease of those who were confined without suffi- ent cause. Forthwith the sections, excited by triguig royalists, roused themselves; they went id addressed threatening petitions to the convention, complaining that the committee of general safety was enlarging the Terrorists, and was restoring them their arms. The sections of Lepelletier and of the Théâtre Français (Odéon), always the most fervid against the revolutionists, wanted to know if the assembly meant again to raise up the overthrown faction, and whether it was to cause Terrorism to be forgotten, that folks began to talk about royalism to France.

To these petitions, often far from respectful, persons interested in disorder added such rumours as were most likely to agitate the public mind. It was either that Toulon had been delivered up to the English, or that the prince of Condé and the Austrians were about to enter by Franche-Comté, while the English were to make their way into France by the west; that Pichegru was dead; that articles of consumption would soon be very scarce, because the free trade in them was about to be restored; lastly, that there had been a general meeting of the committees, who, alarmed at the public dangers, had deliberated on the re-establishment of the system of Terror. The journals devoted to royalism excited and circulated all these reports; and amidst this general agitation it might truly be said that the reign of anarchy was come. The Thermidorians and the Counter-revolutionists deceived themselves when they called by the name of anarchy that system which had preceded the 9th Thermidor: that system, indeed, had been a frightful dictatorship; but anarchy had commenced from the time that two factions, nearly equal in strength, were fighting one another, while the government was not strong enough to overcome them both.

CHAPTER XXX.

SITUATION OF THE ARMIES AT THE NORTH AND ON THE RHINE, AT THE ALPS AND THE PYRENEES, TOWARDS THE MIDDLE OF THE YEAR III.—THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE TREASONABLE PRACTICES OF PICHEGRU—STATE OF LA VENDÉE AND BRITTANY.—INTRIGUES AND SCHEMES OF THE ROYALISTS—RENEWAL OF HOSTILITIES UPON SOME POINTS OF THE PACIFIED COUNTRIES.—THE QUILBERON EXPEDITION—DESTRUCTION OF THE ROYALIST ARMY BY HOCH—THE REASON WHY THIS ATTEMPT PROVED SO UNSUCCESSFUL.—PEACE WITH SPAIN—PASSAGE OF THE RHINE BY THE FRENCH ARMIES.

THE situation of the armies was but little changed, and though half the summer weather was gone, no important event had occurred. Moreau had been appointed to the command of the army of the North, encamped in Holland; Jourdan to that of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, stationed upon the Rhine, in the direction of Cologne; Pichegru to that of the army of the Rhine, cantoned from Mentz to Strassburg. The troops were in a state of privation, which had been greatly increased by the relaxation of all the springs of the government, and by the utter depreciation of the paper-money. Jourdan had no materials for making a bridge, so as to cross the Rhine, nor a single horse to draw his artillery and baggage. Kléber, before Mentz, had not a fourth of the artillery necessary for besieging that place. The soldiers all deserted to the interior. Most of them thought that they had done enough for the republic, in carrying her victorious colours to the Rhine. The government knew not how to maintain them; neither did it know how to satisfy and rekindle their ardour by grand operations. It durst not bring back by force those who deserted their colours. It was well known that the young men of the first requisition, who had returned into the interior, were neither sought after or punished; nay, in Paris they were in favour with the committees, whose volunteer militia they formed. The number of desertions was likewise considerable; the armies had lost a fourth of their effective strength, and there ensued that general relaxation which detaches the soldier from the service, renders the officers discontented, and puts their fidelity in jeopardy. The deputy Aubry, charged as a member of the committee of public welfare with the recruiting of the army, had effected an absolute re-action against all the patriot officers, in favour of those who had not served in the two glorious years 1793 and 1794.

If the Austrians had not been so demoralized, this had been the moment for them to recover their losses; but they were slowly reorganizing themselves the other side the Rhine, and durst not do any thing towards hindering the only two operations undertaken by the French army—the siege of Luxembourg, and that of Mentz. Those two fortresses were the only points the allied powers had preserved on the left bank of the Rhine. The reduction of Luxembourg would complete the conquest of the Netherlands, and render it decisive; that of Mentz would deprive the imperialists of a litté-de-pont, which always permitted them to cross the Rhine in safety. Luxembourg, blockaded during the whole winter and spring, surrendered on account of famine on the 6th Messidor (June 24). Mentz could not be reduced without a siege, but artillery was wanting; it was necessary to invest the place on both banks, and for this purpose either Jourdan or Pichegru must cross the Rhine, a difficult operation in the face of the Austrians, and impracticable without materials for constructing a bridge. Thus our armies, although victorious, were stopped by the Rhine, which they could not cross for want of the means; and like every other department of the government, they felt the effects of the weakness of the present administration.

On the frontier of the Alps our situation was still less satisfactory. On the Rhine we had at least made the important conquest of Luxembourg, while on the Italian frontier we had retreated. Kellermann commanded the armies of the Alps; they were in the same state of privation as all the others; and besides the desertion, they had been weakened by various detachments being made. The government had devised an absurd sort of bold stroke upon Rome. Desirous of avenging the murder of Basseville, it had put ten thousand men on board the Toulon squadron, completely repaired under the superintendence of the old committee of public welfare; it was intended to send them to the mouth of the Tiber, for the purpose of levying a contribution on the papal city, and of then returning with all speed to their ships. Fortunately, an action with Lord Hotham, after which both squadrons left each other equally damaged, had prevented the execution of this plan. There was restored to the army of Italy the division detached from it; but it had been found necessary to despatch a division to Toulon, to fight the Terrorists, and another to Lyons, to disarm the national guard, who had suffered the patriots to be murdered. In this manner the two armies of the Alps had been deprived of part of their force, in the face of the Piedmontese and the Austrians, reinforced by ten thousand men from the Tyrol. General Devins, taking advantage of the moment when Kellermann had very recently detached one of his divisions for Toulon, had actually attacked his right towards Genoa. Kellermann, unable to resist a superior force, had been obliged to fall back. Still occupying with his centre the pass of the Tende, on the Alps, he no longer extended himself by his right to Genoa, and had taken a position in the rear of the line of Borghetto. We had to apprehend that we should not be able to communicate any longer with Genoa; for our trade with Genoa would have to encounter great difficulties as soon as the Riviera di Ponente * should be occupied by the enemy.

In Spain nothing conclusive had been done. Our army of the eastern Pyrenees still occupied Catalonia as far as the banks of the Fluvia. Several battles had been fought on the banks of that river, without producing any result, and without enabling the French to take a position beyond it. At the western Pyrenees, Moreau was organizing an army thinned by disease, with the intention of entering Guipuscoa, and advancing into Navarre.

Although our armies had lost nothing except in Italy, although they had even reduced one of the strongest fortresses in Europe, they were, as we observed, badly attended to, inefficiently managed, and affected by the general anarchy which pervaded every department of the administration.

This was then a favourable opportunity, not for conquering them, for the danger would have rekindled their energy, but for making attempts on their fidelity, and trying plans of counter-revolution. We have observed the royalists and the foreign cabinets concerting various designs upon the insurgent provinces; we have seen Puisaye and England preparing a scheme of making a descent upon Brittany; and the agents of Paris and Spain contemplating an expedition into La Vendée. The emigrants in the mean time were considering how they could push their way into France by another point. They wanted to attack us on the east, while the expeditions attempted by Spain and England were to be directed against the west. The prince of Condé had his headquarters on the Rhine, where he commanded an army of two thousand five hundred foot and one thousand five hundred horse. All the emigrants dispersed over the continent were to be ordered to join him, upon pain of being no longer suffered by the powers to remain in their territories; his army would thus be augmented by all the emigrants who had hitherto remained useless: and leaving the Austrians occupied on the Rhine to keep the republican armies in check, he was to endeavour to penetrate by Franche-Comté and to march to Paris, while the count d'Artois, with the insurgents of the west, should advance towards it on that side. If they should not succeed, they had at least hopes of obtaining a capitulation like that of the Vendéans; they had the same reasons for asking it. "We are," might have said the emigrants assisting in this expedition, "Frenchmen who have had recourse to civil war, but in France, and without admitting foreigners into our ranks." This was, as said the advocates of this plan, the only way for the emigrants to re-enter France, were it either by counter-revolution or by an amnesty.

The English government, who had taken the army of Condé into its pay, and earnestly desired a diversion towards the eastern frontier, while it should be operating on the west, insisted that the prince of Condé should make some attempt, no matter what. It had promised him through Wickham, its ambassador in Switzerland, assistance in money, and the means necessary for forming new regiments. The brave prince desired nothing better than to have some enterprise to attempt; he was utterly incapable of directing either a matter of business or a battle, but he was ready to rush headlong upon danger the moment it was shown to him.

The English government suggested to him the idea of making an attempt to seduce Pichegru, who commanded the army of the Rhine. The terrible committee of public welfare no longer awed the generals, no longer kept the watchful eye and the uplifted hand over them; the republic, paying its officers in assignats, scarcely gave them wherewithal to satisfy their most pressing necessities; the disorders which had arisen in the body of the republic, made her existence even questionable, and alarmed the ambitious, who were afraid of losing by her fall the high dignities they had attained. It was notorious that Pichegru was addicted to women and debauchery; that the four thousand francs which he received per month in assignats, worth scarcely two hundred on the frontiers, could not be enough for him, and that he was disgusted in serving a tottering government. It was recollected that in Germinal he had employed main force against the patriots in the Champs Elysées. All these circumstances suggested the idea that Pichegru might probably be accessible to splendid offers. In consequence, the prince had recourse for the execution of this scheme to M. de Montgaillard, and the latter to M. Fauche-Borel, a bookseller of Neufchatel, who, the subject of a wise and happy republic, was going to make himself the obscure servant of a dynasty under which he was not born. This M. Fauche-Borel repaired to Altkirch, where Pichegru's head-quarters were. After he had followed him in several reviews, he at length attracted his notice by dogging his steps so closely, and ventured to accost him in a corridor; he opened by talking of a manuscript which he was desirous of dedicating to him; and Pichegru having in some measure encouraged his communications, he concluded by explaining himself. Pichegru required a letter from the prince of Condé himself, that he might know with whom he was dealing. Fauche-Borel returned to M. de Montgaillard, and the latter to the prince. A whole night was spent in getting the prince to write a letter of eight lines. At one time he would not style Pichegru general, for he was anxious not to recognise the republic; at another time he objected to seal the envelope with his arms. At last the letter being written, Fauche-Borel returned to Pichegru, who, on seeing the handwriting of the prince, immediately entered into conference. He was offered for himself the rank of marshal, the government of Alsatia, a million in money, the château and park of Chambord, as an inheritance, with twelve pieces of cannon taken from the Austrians, and a pension of two hundred thousand francs income, with the reversion to his wife and children. For his army he was offered the confirmation of all ranks, a pension for the commandants of fortresses who should give them up, and exemption from assessed taxes for fifteen years for such towns as should open their gates. But it was required that Pichegru should hoist the white flag, that he should deliver up the fortress of Huningen to the prince of Condé, and that he should march with him to Paris. Pichegru was too cunning to accede to such demands. He would neither surrender Huningen nor hoist the white flag in his army; that would have been going a great deal too far, and committing himself. He requested to be allowed to cross the Rhine with a body of picked men; there he promised to hoist the white flag, to take with him the corps of Condé, and then to march upon Paris. One does not see what his design could have been improved by this; for it would have been as difficult to seduce the army beyond as it would have been on this side of the Rhine; but he would not have run the risk of surrendering up a fortress, of being surprised when surrendering it, and of having no excuse to assign for his treason. On the contrary, in crossing to the other side of the Rhine, he was still at liberty not to consummate the treason, if he could not come to a good understanding with the prince and the Austrians; or if he were discovered too soon, he might avail himself of the passage obtained, to execute the operations commanded by his government, and say that he had listened to the enemy's overtures merely to turn them to advantage against him. In either case he reserved to himself the means of betraying either the republic or the prince with whom he was treating. Fauche-Borel returned to those who had sent him, but they sent him back again to insist on the same proposition. He went several times to and fro, without being able to accommodate the difference, which consisted always in this, that the prince wanted to obtain Huningen, and Pichegru the passage of the Rhine. Neither one or the other would make the first advances in respect of so great a concession. The motive which prevented the prince, in particular, from acceding to the demand made upon him, was the necessity of having recourse to the Austrians for authority to open the passage; he wished to act without their concurrence, and to secure for himself alone the honour of the counter-revolution. It appears, however, that he was obliged to refer the matter to the Aulic council; and during this interval, Pichegru, closely watched by the representatives, was obliged to suspend his correspondence and his treason.

While these matters were taking place at the army, the agents in the interior, Lemaître, Brotier, Despomelles, Laville-Heurnois, Duverne de Presle, and others, continued their intrigues. The young prince, son of Louis XVI., had died of a tumour in his knee, originating in a scrofulous habit of body. The royalist agents asserted that he had been poisoned; and they had eagerly sought for information relative to the ceremonial of the consecration, for the purpose of sending it to Verona. The regent had become king according to their notions, and was called Louis XVIII. The count d'Artois had become Monsieur.

The pacification in the insurgent countries had been only apparent. The inhabitants, who began to enjoy a little tranquillity and security, were, it is true, disposed to remain in peace; but the leaders, and the men habituated to war who surrounded them, only waited for an occasion to take up arms again. Charette, having under his command those provincial guards, with whom were incorporated all those who exhibited a decided predilection for war, thought of nothing else, under the pretext of attending to the police of the country, but preparing the nucleus of an army, so as to take the field again. He kept to his camp at Belleville, and was continually receiving there the royalist emissaries. The Paris agents had forwarded to him a letter from Verona, in reply to that in which he sought to excuse the pacification. The pretender dispensed with his making excuses, and retained him in his confidence and favour, appointed him lieutenant-general, and announced to him speedy assistance from Spain. The Paris agents, enlarging upon the expressions of the prince, flattered Charette's ambition with the most magnificent prospects; they promised him the command of all the royalist country, and a considerable expedition, which was to sail from the Spanish ports with assistance for the French princes. As for that which was preparing in England, they appeared to put no faith in it. The English, they said, had always promised and always deceived; it was right, nevertheless, to make use of their means, if possible, but to make use of them in a very different way from that for which they were intended; the relief appropriated for Brittany must first be landed in La Vendée, and that country must be under the control of Charette, who alone enjoyed the confidence of the present king. Such ideas could not fail to minister at once to the ambition of Charette, his hatred of Stofflet, his jealousy of the recent importance of Puisaye, and his resentment against England, whom he accused of never having done any thing for him.

As for Stofflet, he was much less inclined to resume hostilities than Charette, although he had shown much greater reluctance to abandon them. His country became more sensible than the others of the advantages of peace, and manifested a great reluctance to war. He was himself deeply hurt at the preference shown for Charette. He was quite as deserving of the rank of lieutenant-general, which was conferred on his rival, and he was much disgusted by the injustice of which he considered himself the subject. Brittany, organized as before, was quite ripe for insurrection. The leaders of the Chouans had obtained, like the Vendean chiefs, the organization of their best soldiers into regular companies, under pretext of enforcing the police of the country. Each of these leaders had appropriated for himself a select company of light infantry (chasseurs), wearing a green coat and pantaloons, with a red waistcoat, and composed of the bravest Chouans. Cormatin, in sustaining his part, had assumed a ridiculous air of importance. He had established what he called his head-quarters at La Prevalaye; he issued publicly orders to all the Chouan chiefs, dated from those head-quarters; he went from one division to another, to discipline the companies of chasseurs; he affected to repress infractions of the truce when any had been committed, and seemed to have become in reality the governor of Brittany. He frequently went to Rennes in his Chouan uniform, which had been brought into fashion; in the companies there, he received tokens of the consideration of the inhabitants, and the caresses of the women, who thought they beheld in him an important personage and the chief of the royalist party.

In secret he continued to incline the Chouans to war, and to correspond with the royalist agents. His part, in regard to Puisaye, was embarrassing.

He had disobeyed him, he had betrayed his confidence, and thenceforward he had had no other resource than to throw himself into the arms of the Paris agents, who had held out hopes to him of his being made commander of Brittany, and had included him in their designs with Spain. That power had promised one million five hundred thousand francs per month, on condition that the royalists should act without England. Nothing could be more suitable to Cormatin than a plan which would enable him to break with England and Puisaye. Two other officers whom Puisaye had sent from London to Brittany, MM. de Vieuxville and Dandigné, had also entered into the system of the Paris agents, and persuaded themselves also that England meant to deceive us at Toulon, and to make use of the royalists in order to get a seaport, to make Frenchmen fight against Frenchmen, but not to afford any substantive assistance effective enough to advance the party of the princes and secure their triumph. While one part of the Breton chiefs were wrapped up in these ideas, those of Morbihan, Finistère, and the Côtes-du-Nord, long connected with Puisaye, and accustomed to serve under him, organized by his efforts, and unconnected with the Paris intriguers, had remained attached to him, called Cormatin a traitor, and wrote to London that they were again ready to take up arms. They made preparations, purchased ammunition and stuff for making black collars, seduced the republican soldiers, and prevailed on them to desert. They were very successful in this, because, being masters of the country, they had abundance of provisions; and the republican soldiers, badly fed, and having nothing but assignats to make up for their rations, were obliged to desert their colours in order to exist. Besides, the republicans had been so imprudent as to leave many Bretons in the regiments serving against the royalist countries, and it was but natural that they should transfer themselves to the ranks of their countrymen.

Hoche, ever vigilant, was attentively observing the state of the country; he saw how the patriots were persecuted under pretext of the law for depriving them of their arms, the royalists full of exultation, articles of consumption kept back by the farmers, the roads very unsafe; the public vehicles obliged to travel in convoys so as to get an escort, the Chouans forming secret meetings, and the frequent communications kept up with the Jersey islands; and he had written to the committee and to the representatives that the pacification was a notable deception, that the republic was cheated, and that every thing indicated the speedy resumption of arms. He had employed his time in forming moveable columns, and in distributing them throughout the country, so as to insure tranquillity, and to be ready to fall upon the first gathering that should be formed. But the number of his troops was inadequate to the surface of the country and the immense line of coast. Every moment, the fear of a rising in some part of the country, or of the appearance of the English fleet on the coast, required the presence of his columns, and they were worn out by incessant running to and fro. To render such a service as this effective, there was called for, on his and his army's part, a resignation a hundred times more noble than that courage which defies death. Unfortunately, his soldiers compensated themselves for their fatigues by excesses: this deeply afflicted him, and he had as much trouble to keep his own army in due bounds as to watch the enemy.

He soon had occasion to take Cormatin in the very act. Despatches sent by him to several Chouan chiefs were intercepted, and thus a substantial proof of his secret plottings was obtained. Having learned that he was to be on a fair day at Rennes with a number of disguised Chouans, and fearing lest he might be induced to make an attempt on the arsenal, Hoche caused him to be apprehended on the evening of the 6th Prairial, and thus put an end to the part he was playing. The different leaders immediately raised a great outcry, and complained that the truce was violated. Hoche printed Cormatin's letters, and sent him with his accomplices to the prison of Cherbourg; at the same time he kept all his columns in readiness to pour down upon the first rebels who should show themselves. In the Morbihan, chevalier Desilz having risen, was immediately attacked by general Josnet, who killed three hundred of his men and completely routed him: the leader himself perished in the action. In the Côtes-du-Noir, Bois Hardi also rose; his little army was dispersed, and he was himself taken and put to death. The soldiers, enraged at the bad faith of this young leader, who was the most formidable in the whole country, cut off his head and carried it on the point of a bayonet. Hoche, indignant at this grossness towards a fallen enemy, addressed a truly noble letter to his soldiers, and ordered search to be made for the culprits, that they might be punished. This sudden destruction of the two chiefs who had made an attempt at insurrection, made a deep impression upon the others. They remained perfectly still, awaiting with impatience the arrival of that expedition which had been so long announced. Their cry was: The King, England, and Bonchamps for ever!

At this moment great preparations were going forward in London. Puisaye was on the best understanding possible with the English ministers. They had not granted him all that they had at first promised, because the pacification had diminished their confidence; but they gave him the emigrant regiments and a considerable train of artillery to attempt a landing; they promised him moreover all the resources of the monarchy, if the expedition showed a promise of success. The interest of England alone ought to have induced him to put faith in these promises; for, driven from the continent ever since the conquest of Holland, she would recover a field of battle, she would transfer this field of battle to the very heart of France, and take Frenchmen into her armies. The means the English afforded Puisaye were these. The emigrant regiments of the continent had been, ever since the opening of the present campaign, taken into the service of England; those which formed the division of Condé were, as we have seen, to remain on the Rhine; the others, which were a mere wreck, were to embark at the mouth of the Elbe and to be transferred to Brittany. Besides these old regiments, which wore the black cockade, and were deeply disgusted with the unprofitable and destructive service in which they had been employed by the powers, England had agreed to form nine new regiments, which should be in her pay, but which should wear the white cockade, so that their appointment might appear to be more than ever French. The difficulty consisted in recruiting them; for if, in the first moment of fervour, the emigrants had consented to serve as soldiers, they would not do so now. It was considered best to pick up on the continent French deserters or prisoners. As for deserters, none were to be found, for the conqueror never deserts to the conquered; they then resorted to the French prisoners. Count d'Iervilly having met in London with some Toulonnese refugees who had formed a regiment, enlisted them in his own, and thus raised it to eleven or twelve hundred men, that is, to more than two-thirds of the complement. Count d'Iector composed his of seamen who had emigrated, and made it as high as six hundred men. Count du Dresnay found in the prisons a number of Bretons, enlisted against their will at the time of the first requisition, and made prisoners during the war; he selected four or five hundred from them. But these were all the French that could be got together to serve in those regiments with the white cockade. Thus, out of the nine no more than three were formed, one having only two-thirds of its complement, and two that had no more than one-third of theirs. There was still in London lieutenant-colonel Rothalier, who commanded four hundred Toulonnese cannoners. With these was formed a regiment of artillery; to which were added some French engineers, with whom a corps of engineers was composed. As for the crowd of emigrants who would not serve unless in their former rank, and who did not find soldiers to compose regiments for themselves, it was resolved to form with them some small companies which should be filled up in Brittany with insurgents. In that country there was no want of men, and experienced officers being seldom to be met with, they would find their proper level. They sent them to Jersey to be thoroughly drilled, and to be in readiness to follow the descent upon France. In the mean time, while he was making up his forces, Puisaye looked out for pecuniary assistance. England at first promised him sufficient money, but he desired to supply himself with assignats. To this end he obtained from the French princes an authority to forge assignats to the amount of three thousand millions, and in this operation he employed idle ecclesiastics who were unfit to wield the sword. The bishop of Lyons, judging of this measure very differently from Puisaye and the princes, forbade ecclesiastics to have any thing to do with it. Puisaye then had recourse to other agents, and forged the sum which he had resolved to carry with him. He also desired a bishop to fill the part of a pope's legate to the Catholic districts. He recollected that an adventurer, the pretended bishop of Agra, by assuming that usurped character in the first war with Vendée, had exercised an extraordinary influence over the minds of the peasantry; he therefore took with him the bishop of Dol, who had a commission from Rome. He then procured from the count d'Artois the powers necessary for commanding the expedition, and appointing officers of all ranks until his arrival thither. The English ministry on its part conferred on him the direction of the expedition; but having some misgivings on account of his temecity and his extreme ardour to land, it invested count d'Hervilly with the command of the emigrant regiments till the moment that the descent should be carried into effect.

All these arrangements being made, they shipped on board a squadron, d'Hervilly's regiment, the two regiments of Hector and du Dresnoy, all wearing the white cockade, the four hundred Toulonense artillerymen commanded by Rothbar, and an emigrant regiment of old formation, that of La Chatre, known by the name of Loyal Emigrants, and reduced by the war on the continent to four hundred men. This last valorous relic was reserved for decisive actions. On board this squadron were stowed provisions for an army of six thousand men for three months, one hundred saddle and draught horses, seventeen thousand complete infantry uniforms, four thousand cavalry uniforms, twenty seven thousand muskets, ten field pieces, and six hundred barrels of powder. They gave Puisaye ten thousand louis in gold, and letters of credit on England, so as to add to his forged assignats more assured means of finance. The squadron which carried this expedition consisted of three ships of the line of seventy-four guns each, two frigates of forty-four, four vessels of thirty to thirty-six, and several gun boats and transports. The command was taken by commodore Warren, one of the most gallant and distinguished officers in the British navy. This was the first division. It was agreed, that immediately after its departure another naval division should go to Jersey to take up the emigrants organized in small companies; that it should cruise for some time off Saint-Malo, where Puisaye had been working his intelligence, and which place some traitors had promised to surrender to him; and after this cruise, if Saint Malo were not delivered up, the squadron was to rejoin Puisaye, and convey the small companies to him. At the same time transports were to proceed to the mouth of the Elbe, to fetch the emigrant regiments with the black cockade, and convey them to join Puisaye. It was calculated that these different detachments would arrive nearly about the same time as himself. If all that he had said were realized, if the landing could be effected without difficulty, if a part of Brittany came forth to meet him, if he could secure a strong position on the coast of France, either by the delivery into his hands of Saint-Malo, L'Orient, Port Louis, or any support whatever, then a new expedition, carrying an English army, further supplies of artillery, and count d'Artois, were to set sail immediately. Lord Moura had actually gone to the continent to fetch the prince.

There was but one fault to be found with these arrangements, that is, that the expedition was divided into several detachments, and especially that the French prince was not put at the head of the first.

The expedition sailed towards the end of Prairial (the middle of June); Puisaye took with him the bishop of Dol, a numerous clergy, and forty gentlemen, all bearing illustrious names, and serving as simple volunteers. The point of landing was a secret, except to Puisaye, commodore Warren, and MM de Tinténac and d'Allegre, whom Puisaye had despatched to announce his coming.

After long deliberation, the south of Brittany had been preferred to the north, and they settled upon the bay of Quiberon, one of the best and safest of the continent, and the English were surprisingly well acquainted with it because they had long been accustomed to anchor there. While the expedition was under sail, Sidney Smith and lord Cornwallis made demonstrations on all the coasts, to mislead the republican armies as to the point of landing, and lord Bridport, with the squadron stationed off the Isle of Ushant, protected the convoy. The French naval force in the ports of the Atlantic had not been very formidable since the unfortunate cruise of the preceding winter, during which the Brest fleet had suffered dreadfully from the weather. However, Villaret-Joyeuse had received orders to sail with the nine ships of the line anchored in Brest, and to go and collect a division blockaded at Belle Isle. He sailed accordingly, and after being joined by that division, and given chase to some English ships, he was returning to Brest, when he was overtaken by a gale, which for a moment dispersed his squadron. He lost some time in collecting it again, and during this interval, he fell in with the expedition destined for the coast of France. He was superior in number, and might have taken the whole of it, but commodore Warren, perceiving the danger, hoisted all sail, and placed his convoy at a distance, so as to give it the appearance of a second line, at the same time he despatched two cutters in quest of the strong squadron under lord Bridport. Villaret, conceiving that he could not fight with advantage, pursued his course towards Brest, according to the instructions he had received. At that moment lord Bridport came up, and immediately attacked the republican fleet. It was the 5th Messidor (June 23) Villaret, keeping pace with the Alexandre, which was a bad sailor, lost time that could not be recovered in effecting his manœuvres. The line fell into confusion, he lost three ships, the Alexandre, the Formidable, and the Tigre, and unable to regain Brest, he was obliged to put into L'Orient.

The expedition having thus distinguished its outset, made sail for the bay of Quiberon. A division of the squadron went and summoned the garrison of Belle Isle, in the name of the king of France; but it received from general Boucret nothing but an energetic answer and a cannonade. The convoy came to an anchor in the bay of Quiberon on the 7th Messidor (June 25). Puisaye, according to the information he had procured, knew that there were very few troops on the coast. He wanted, in his ardour, to land immediately. Count d'Hervilly, a brave man, capable of cleverly drilling a regiment, but incapable of directing an operation with any degree of talent, and extremely punctilious withal in matters of authority and duty, said that he was commander of the troops, that he was responsible to the English government for their safety, and that he should not hazard them upon a hostile and unknown coast till he had made his observations. He lost a whole day in examining the coast with a telescope, and though he could not see a single soldier, he nevertheless refused to put the troops on shore. Puisaye and commodore Warren having determined on the landing, d'Hervilly at last assented, and on the 9th Messidor (June 27), those imprudent and stultified Frenchmen landed full of joy in a country to which they brought civil war, and where they were destined to meet with such a deplorable fate.

The bay in which they landed is formed on the one hand by the coast of Brittany, on the other by a peninsula nearly a league in breadth and two in length: this is the well-known peninsula of Quiberon. It is joined to the mainland by a narrow strip of sand, a league in length, called the Falaise. Fort Penthièvre, situated between the peninsula and the Falaise, defends it from approach on the land side. In this fort there was a garrison of seven hundred men. The bay formed by this peninsula and the coast presents one of the safest and most sheltered roads of the continent for shipping.

The expedition had disembarked at the bottom of the bay, at the village of Carnac. At the moment of its arrival, several leaders, Dubois Berthelot, d'Allegre, George Cadoudal, and Mercier, apprized by Tinténiac, hastened up with their troops, dispersed some detachments which were guarding the coast, drove them back into the interior, and proceeded to the shore. They brought with them four or five thousand men inveterate to war, but ill armed, ill clothed, not marching in ranks, and looking more like plunderers than soldiers. These Chouans had been joined by peasants of the neighbouring country, shouting Vive le Roi! and bringing eggs, poultry, and provisions of all kinds to this liberating army, which came to restore to them their prince and their religion. Overjoyed at this sight, Puisaye felt confident that all Brittany was ready to rise. The emigrants who accompanied him experienced far different impressions. Having lived in courts, or served in the finest armies of Europe, they looked with disgust and very little confidence at those soldiers who were about to be placed under their command. Contemptuous expressions and complaints already began to make their round. Chests of muskets and uniforms were brought; the Chouans fell upon them; the sergeants of d'Hervilly's regiment endeavoured to maintain order; a quarrel ensued, and but for Puisaye it might have had fatal consequences. These opening occurrences were not at all likely to establish confidence between the insurgents and the regular troops, which, coming from England, and belonging to that power, were as such rather suspected by the Chouans. Meanwhile the bands were armed as they arrived. Their numbers amounted in two days to ten thousand. Red coats and muskets were afforded them, and Puisaye's next care was to give them officers. He was in want of officers, for the forty gentlemen volunteers were quite inadequate; he had not yet the small companies of gentlemen at his disposal, for they had orders to cruise off Saint Malo; he purposed, therefore, to take a few officers from the regiments, in which they were very numerous, to distribute them among the Chouans, then to march rapidly upon Vannes and Rennes, so as not to give the republicans time to find them out, to raise the whole country, and then to advance and take a position behind the important line of the Mayenne. There, masters of forty leagues of country, and having raised the whole population, Puisaye conceived that it would be time to organize the irregular troops. D'Hervilly, a brave man, but standing on trifles, a stickler for rules, and despising the irregular Chouans, would not sanction the appointment of those officers. Instead of giving them to the Chouans, he proposed to select from among the latter men to complete the regiments, and then to advance, making observations and selecting positions. This was not Puisaye's plan. He threatened to use his authority; d'Hervilly denied it, saying that the regular troops belonged to him, that he was responsible for their safety to the English government, and that he ought not to jeopardise them. Puisaye represented to him that he held this command during the voyage only; that on landing in Bretagne he, Puisaye, was to be commander-in-chief, and to direct the operations. He immediately despatched a cutter to London, to obtain an explanation concerning their respective powers; and meanwhile he implored d'Hervilly not to cause the miscarriage of the enterprise by fatal divisions. D'Hervilly was a brave and perfectly sincere man, but he was unfit for a civil war, and he felt a downright dislike to those ragged insurgents. All the emigrants thought with him that they were not made to play the Chouan; that Puisaye compromised them by bringing them into Brittany; that it was in Vendée they ought to have made their descent, and that there they would have found the illustrious Charette, and without doubt a different sort of soldiers.

Several days had been spent in squabbles of this kind. The Chouans were divided into three regiments, for the purpose of taking advanced positions, so as to occupy the roads from L'Orient to Hennebion and Auray. Tinténiac, with a regiment of two thousand five hundred Chouans, was placed on the left at Landevant; Dubois-Berthelot, on the right towards Auray, with nearly an equal force. Count de Vauban, one of the gentlemen volunteers who had accompanied Puisaye, and one of those whose reputation and merit placed them in the first rank, was directed to occupy a central position at Mendon, with four thousand Chouans, so as to be able to assist Tinténiac or Dubois-Berthelot. He had the command of this whole line, defended by nine or ten thousand men, and advanced four or five leagues into the interior. The Chouans, finding themselves placed there, immediately asked why troops of the line were not put along with them; they relied more upon those troops than upon themselves; that they had come to range themselves around them, to follow them, to support them, but they counted upon their advancing first, to receive the formidable shock of the republicans. Vauban applied for only four hundred men, either to withstand a first attack, in case of need, or to impart confidence to his Chouans, to set them an example, and to prove that there was no intention of exposing them alone to danger. D'Hervilly at first refused, then delayed, and at last sent this detachment.

They had already been on land five days, and they had not got further than a few leagues. Puisaye was extremely dissatisfied; but he contained himself, hoping to overcome the delays and obstacles thrown in his way by his companions in arms. Conceiving that at all events he ought to secure a point of support, he proposed to d'Hervilly to gain possession of the peninsula by surprising fort Penhièvre. Once masters of this fort, which was the key to the Peninsula on the land side, supported on both sides by the English squadron, they would have an impregnable position; and that peninsula, a league broad, and two long, would then afford a footing quite as secure and more convenient than that of Saint Malo, Brest, or L'Orient. The English might there land all the men and stores they had promised. This measure of safety was of such a nature as to please d'Hervilly; he assented to it, but was for a regular attack on fort Penhièvre. Puisaye would not listen to him, and arranged a plan to take it by storm, and commodore Warren, in the plenitude of his zeal, offered to second him with all the guns of his squadron. They began to cannonade on the 1st of July (13th Messidor), and fixed the decisive attack for the 3rd. (15th Messidor.) While preparations were making, Puisaye sent out emissaries over all Brittany, to rouse Scépeaux, Charette, Stofflet, and all the leaders of the insurgent provinces.

The news of the landing spread with extraordinary rapidity. In two days, it was known over all Brittany, and in a few more throughout all France. The royalists rejoiced; the revolutionists enraged, already believed they saw the emigrants in Paris. The convention immediately sent two extraordinary commissioners to Hoche; she selected Blad and Tallien. The presence of the latter at the threatened point was intended to prove that the Thermidorians were as opposed to royalism as to terror. Hoche, cool and resolute, wrote forthwith to the committee of public welfare, to dispel its apprehensions. "Coolness," said he, "activity, provisions, of which we are in want, and the twelve thousand men you promised me so long ago." He immediately gave orders to the chief of his staff; he directed general Chabot to be stationed between Brest and L'Orient, with a body of four thousand men, that he might fly to the assistance of either of those ports which should be threatened. "Keep your eye more particularly upon Brest," said he; "in case of need, shut yourselves up in the place, and defend yourselves even to death." He wrote to Aubert Dubayet, who commanded the coasts of Cherbourg, to send off troops for the north of Brittany, in order to protect Saint-Malo and the coast. To secure the south, he begged Canclaux, who was still watching Charette and Stofflet, to send general Lemoine with reinforcements to him by Nantes and Vannes. He then collected all his troops about Rennes, Plérmel, and Vannes, and moved them en échelon upon those three points, so as to guard his rear; lastly, he himself advanced to Aurai, with all the force he could get together. On the 14th Messidor (July 2nd), he was already in person at Aurai, with three or four thousand men.

The entire of Brittany was thus protected. The illusions which the first insurrection of La Vendée had generated were about to be dispelled; merely because in 1793 the peasants of La Vendée, encountering only national guards, composed of tradesmen who knew not how to handle a musket, had made themselves masters of all Poitou and Anjou, and then formed in their ravines and on their heaths an establishment which it was difficult to destroy, it was imagined that Brittany would rise at the first signal from England. But the Bretons were far from possessing the ardour of the first Vendéans; a few banditti only, under the name of Chouans, were bent upon war, or, to speak more correctly, on pillage; and what was more, a young commander, whose activity was equal to his genius, having experienced troops at his disposal, repressed an entire population with a firm and steady hand. Could Brittany rise under such circumstances, unless the army that came to support it advanced rapidly, instead of groping about on the seashore?

This was not all: a party of the Chouans, who were under the influence of the royalist agents in Paris, were waiting for a prince to appear along with Puisaye before they would join him. The cry of the agents and of all those who were in their intrigues was, that the expedition was inadequate and fallacious, and that England had come to Brittany to re-enact the events of Toulon. They no longer said that she meant to give the crown to the count d'Artois, since he was not there, but to the duke of York; they wrote, stating that there was no necessity for forwarding the expedition, but rather to compel it to put to sea and to make a descent near Charette. This was exactly what the latter desired. To the solicitations of Puisaye's agents he replied, that he had sent M. de Scépeaux to Paris, to claim the execution of one of the articles of the treaty; that he must therefore wait the return of that officer, and not expose him to the danger of being arrested by resuming arms. As for Stofflet, who was much more favourably disposed toward Puisaye, he sent word that, if the rank of lieutenant-general were conferred on him, he would march immediately and make a diversion on the rear of the republicans.

Thus every thing combined against Puisaye; his views were opposed to those of the royalists in the interior, jealousies supervened among the Vendean chiefs, and lastly, a skilful adversary had at his disposal forces sufficiently qualified to repress any royalist zeal that existed among the Bretons.

It was on the 15th Messidor (July 3), that Puisaye had resolved to attack fort Penhièvre. The soldiers who defended it had been without bread for three days. Exposed to a storming, cannonaded by the ships, and badly commanded, they surrendered and delivered up the fort to Puisaye. But at this very moment, Hoche, posted at Aurai, caused all the advanced posts of the Chouans to be attacked, in order to restore the communication of Aurai with Hennebont and L'Orient. He had ordered a simultaneous attack on Landevant and in the direction of the post of Aurai. Tinténac's Chouans, vigorously assailed by the republicans, could not keep their ground against troops of the line. Vauban, who was immediately posted at Mendon, hastened with part of his reserve to the assistance of Tinténac, but he found the band of the latter dispersed, and the one he brought with him dispersed on witnessing the defeat. He was obliged to flee, and even to swim across two arms of the sea before he could get back to the remainder of his Chouans at Mendon. On his right, Dubois-Berthelot had been repulsed; he thus saw the republicans advancing on his right and on his left, and it was likely that he would soon find himself en flèche between them. At this moment, the four hundred men of the line he had asked for would have been of great service for supporting his Chouans and bringing them back to the fight, but d'Heilly had just recalled them for the attack of the fort. However, Dubois Bertholot infused some courage into his soldiers, and decided them to take advantage of the opportunity by falling upon the rear of the republicans, who had advanced very far in pursuit of the fugitives. He then threw himself upon their left, and rushed upon a village which the republicans had just entered at the heels of the Chouans. They had not expected this brisk attack, and were obliged to retreat. Vauban then returned to his position at Mendon, but there he was left alone. All round him had fled, and he too was obliged to fall back, but in good order, and after in wet of vigour which had checked the rapid progress of the enemy.

The Chouans were indignant at having been expelled alone to the attack of the republicans. They complained bitterly that the four hundred men of the line had been taken from them. Painsy found fault with d'Heilly, the latter replied that he had recalled them for the attack of the fort. These mutual complaints did not mend matters, and each party continued to be greatly irritated with each other. However, they were masters of fort Penhuc. Painsy had landed all the stores sent by the English to be landed on the peninsula, where he fixed his head quarters, there he collected all his troops, and there he resolved to maintain a firm position. He ordered the engineers to perfect the defences of the fort, and to add thereto some advanced works. The white flag was there hoisted beside the English colours, in token of alliance between the kings of France and England. Lastly, it was settled that each regiment should contribute to the garrison a detachment proportionate to its strength. D'Heilly, who was very anxious to complete his own, and to make it complete with good troops, offered the republicans who had been taken prisoners to enter his service, and to form a third battalion in his regiment. Money and food, of which they were in want, a desire to remain prisoners, and the hope of being able soon to go over again to Hoche, decided them, and they were enlisted in d'Heilly's corps.

Painsy, whose thoughts were always for marching onward, and who had only stopped to take the peninsula in order to secure a position on the coast, spoke sharply to d'Heilly, gave him the best reasons to induce him to second his views, and even threatened to denounce his removal if he refused to comply. D'Heilly appeared for a moment to coincide with his plans. The Chouans, according to Painsy, only required support to make them display their bravery, that troops of the line ought to be distributed in their front and rear, to be thus placed in the middle, and with twelve or thirteen thousand men, nearly three thousand of whom were of the line, they might excel the army of Hoche, who had at that time scarcely five or six thousand. D'Heilly assented to this plan. At this instant Vauban, finding his position extremely perilous, having lost the position he had at first occupied, asked for directions and assistance.

D'Heilly sent him in order, worded in the most pedantic manner, in which he directed him to fall back upon Carnac, and prescribed such movements as could only have been executed by the most expert troops in Europe.

The 3rd of July (15th Messidor) Painsy left the Peninsula to review the Chouans, and d'Heilly also quitted it with his regiment to prepare for the execution of the plans formed the preceding day, of marching forward. Painsy found nothing but dejection, discouragement, and ill humour, among those men who a few days before were full of enthusiasm. They said that there was an evident intention to expose them unprotected, and to sacrifice them to the troops of the line. Painsy pacified them as much as he could, and endeavoured to revive their spirits. D'Heilly, on his part, seeing those soldiers clothed in red, who wore the uniform and carried their bayonets so awkwardly, said that nothing was to be done with such troops, and brought his regiment home again. Painsy met him at the moment, and asked it that was the way to execute the plan agreed upon. D'Heilly replied that he never would risk himself by marching with such soldiers; that all they could do was to embark again, or to shut themselves up in the peninsula, to await fresh orders from London, which, according to his notions, meant orders to make a descent on La Vendée.

Next day, July 6th (18th Messidor), Vauban received private intelligence that he should be attacked along his whole line by the republicans. He found himself in a most dangerous situation. His left was supported upon a post called Saint Barbe, which communicated with the peninsula, but his centre and his right extended along the coast of Carnac, and had no other retreat than the sea. Thus, if he were busily attacked, his right and his centre might be driven into the sea, his left alone being able to retreat by Saint Barbe to Quiberon. His Chouans, quite out of spirits, were incapable of standing their ground, he had therefore but one course to pursue, namely, to make his centre and his right fall back upon his left, and file off by the beach to the peninsula. But they would then be shutting themselves up on this strip of land without being able to leave it, for the post of Saint-Barbe, which would thus be abandoned, was, although defenceless on the land side, impregnable towards the side of Falaise, which it entirely commanded. Thus the scheme of a retreat would be equivalent to the determination to shut themselves up in the peninsula of Quiberon. Vauban, therefore, applied for assistance, that he might not be obliged to retire. D'Heilly sent him a fresh order, worded in all the affectation of military style, enjoining him to keep his ground at Carnac to the last extremity. Painsy immediately desired d'Heilly to send some troops, which he promised to do.

On the following day, July 7th (19th Messidor), at daybreak, the republicans advanced in deep columns, and attacked the ten thousand Chouans along the whole line. The latter looked towards the Falaise, but no regular troops were coming. They then became enraged against the emigrants, who did not come to their relief. Young George Cadoudal, whose men refused to fight, begged them not to disperse, but they would not listen to him. George, enraged in his turn, cried out that those rashly English and emigrants had only come to ruin Brittany, and he wished the sea had swallowed them up before it had brought them to that coast. Vubian then ordered his right and his centre to fall back on his left, that they might retire by the Falaise to the peninsula. The Chouans rushed thither indiscriminately, most of them followed by their families, who fled from the vengeance of the republicans. Women, children, and old men, carrying the wheel of their property, and intermixed with several thousand Chouans in red uniform, covered that long, narrow strip of land, washed on both sides by the sea, and already exposed to bullets and cannon-balls. Vubian then, getting all the officers round him, endeavoured to collect the bravest of the men, exhorted them not to bring ruin upon themselves by a precipitate flight, and conjured them, for their safety and their honour, to make an orderly retreat. They would make, he said, those troops of the line, who left them alone exposed to all the danger, blush for themselves. By degrees he roused their courage, and prevailed upon them to face the enemy, to stand firm, and to return. Then, owing to the good conduct of the officers, the retreat began to be effected with regularity, the ground was disputed foot by foot. Still Vubian was not sure that he should be able to withstand a vigorous charge, and not be driven into the sea; but, fortunately, the brave commodore Warren laying to with his ships and gun-boats, began to thunder from both sides of the Falaise upon the republicans, and prevented them, for that day at least, from pushing their advantages any further.

The fugitives pressed on to the entrance of the fort, but admittance was for a short time denied them, they then fell upon the palisades, tore them up, and rushed pêle mêle into the peninsula. At this instant d'Hervilly came up with his regiment, Vubian met him, and in a fit of passion told him that he should call him to account for his conduct before a council of war. The Chouans spread themselves over the whole peninsula, in which were several villages and hamlets. All the lodgings were occupied by the regiments, and quarrels took place, at last the Chouans lay down on the ground, half rations of rice were given to them, which they ate raw, having no means of cooking it.

Thus this expedition, which was so speedily to carry the standard of the Bourbons and the English to the banks of the Mayenne, was confined to a peninsula two leagues in length. There were now twelve or fifteen thousand more mouths to feed, and it was impossible to furnish them either with lodging, fuel, or utensils for cooking their food. That peninsula, defended by a fort at its extremity, lined on either side by the English squadron, was capable of opposing an invincible resistance, but it became at once extremely weak from the want of provisions. In point of fact, no more provisions had been brought than were sufficient to feed six thousand men for three months, and there were now eighteen or twenty thousand to subsist. To get out of this position by a sudden attack on Saint Barbe was scarcely possible, for the republicans, full of ardour, were intrenching that post in such a manner as to render it impregnable on the side towards the peninsula. While confusion, animosity, and dejection, pervaded the confused mass of Chouans and emigrants—in Hoche's camp, on the contrary, men and officers laboured assiduously in throwing up the intrenchments. "I saw," says Pussaye, "officers themselves stripped to their shirts, and distinguished only by their stock, handling the spade, and using on the labours of their soldiers."

Pussaye, however, determined upon a sortie for that very night, in order to interrupt those operations, but the darkness and the confusion of the enemy produced confusion in his ranks, and he was obliged to return. The Chouans, driven to despair, complained that they had been deceived. They longed for their old mode of warfare, and asked to be taken back to their woods. They were dying of hunger. D'Hervilly, with the intention of forcing them to enlist in the regiments, had ordered that only a half ration should be distributed among the irregular troops. They revolted. Pussaye, without whose knowledge this order had been issued, revoked it, and the whole ration was allowed.

That which distinguished Pussaye beyond his intelligences was his unconquerable perseverance, he was not discouraged. He conceived the idea of taking the châte of the Chouans, landing them in two divisions for the purpose of securing the country in the rear of Hoche, rousing the leaders of whom he had yet no tidings, and bringing them to bear en masse upon the camp of Saint Barbe, so as to take it in rear, while the troops of the peninsula should attack it in front. He should thus relieve himself from six or eight thousand mouths, employ them to some purpose, rekindle the nearly extinguished zeal of the Breton leaders, and prepare an attack on the rear of the camp of Saint Barbe. This plan being adopted, he made the best selection of his Chouans, gave four thousand of them to Tinténac, with three intrepid leaders, George, Mercier, and d'Allegre, and three thousand to MM. Jean Jean and Lantivy. Tinténac was to be put on shore at Sarzean, near the mouth of the Vilaine, and Jean Jean and Lantivy near Quimper. Both these divisions, after making a considerable circuit, were to form a junction at Baud, on the 14th of July (26th Messidor), and to march on the morning of the 16th upon the rear of the camp of Saint Barbe. At the moment when they were about to set out, the leaders of the Chouans went to Pussaye, and besought their old leader to accompany them, saying that these English traitors were going to ruin him. It was not possible that Pussaye could comply. They set out, and were lauded without accident. Pussaye immediately wrote to London, that every thing might be repaired, but that they must send over to him provisions, ammunition, troops, and the French prince without delay.

While these things were taking place in the peninsula, Hoche had already collected from eight to ten thousand men at Saint-Barbe. Aubert Dubayet had sent him from the coast of Cherbourg troops to protect the north of Brittany, Candiaux had despatched from Nantes a considerable reinforcement under the command of general Lemoine. The representatives had put a stop to all the intrigues which had for their object the surrender of L'Orient and Saint-Malo. The affairs of the republic were therefore improving every day. Meanwhile, Lemartre and Brothier were, by their intrigues, still combining with all their might to thwart the expedition. They had immediately written to Brittany in disapproval of it. The expedition, according to them, had a dangerous object, since the French prince was not there, and no one ought to promote it. In consequence, agents had spread themselves over the country, and given orders, in the name of the king, not to attempt any movement; and they had required Charette to persist in his inaction. According to their old system of taking advantage of the assistance of England and then deceiving her, they had suddenly devised a plan on the very spot. Mixed up with the intrigue which was to deliver Saint-Malo to Puisaye, they wanted to summon thither the emigrant companies (cadres) cruising on board the English fleet, and to take possession of the port in the name of Louis XVIII., while Puisaye was acting at Quiberon, perhaps, said they, for the duke of York. The intrigue at Saint-Malo having failed, they retreated to Saint-Brieuc, kept off that coast the squadron which had the companies of emigrants on board, and immediately sent emissaries to Tinténiac and Lantivy, whom they knew had landed, to desire them to proceed to Saint-Brieuc. Their aim was to form a counter-expedition in the north of Brittany, more sure, according to them, than that of Puisaye in the south.

Tinténiac had landed safely, and, after taking several republican posts, had arrived at Elven. There he found the injunction, issued in the king's name, to proceed to Coetlogon, where he was to receive fresh orders. It was to no purpose that he objected the commission of Puisaye, and the necessity of not marring his plan by removing himself from the appointed place. However, he acquiesced, hoping that by means of a forced march he might yet be in the rear of Saint-Barbe on the 16th. Jean-Jean and Lantivy, who likewise landed without accident, prepared to march towards Baud, when they found orders addressed to them to proceed to Saint-Brieuc.

Meanwhile Hoche, uneasy with respect to his rear, was obliged to send off fresh detachments to stop the bands, of whose march he was apprized; but he left in Saint-Barbe a force sufficient to resist any attack by storm. He was much distressed by the English gun-boats, which fired upon his troops the moment they appeared on the beach, and he reckoned upon scarcely any thing short of famine for reducing the emigrants.

Puisaye, on his part, put himself in order for the 16th (28th Messidor). On the 15th a fresh squadron arrived in the bay; it was that which had been to the mouth of the Elbe to bring away the emigrant regiments that had been taken into the pay of England, and were known by the name of regiments with the black cockade. This squadron brought the legions of Salm, Damas, Beon, and Périgord, reduced altogether to eleven hundred men by the losses of the campaign, and commanded by a distinguished officer, M. de Sombrenil. This squadron brought also fresh supplies of provisions and ammunition; it also brought the intelligence that three thousand English were being brought by Lord Graham, as well as of the speedy arrival of the count d'Artois with a still more considerable force. A letter from the English ministry informed Puisaye that the emigrant companies were detained on the north coast by the royalist agents in the interior, who intended, they said, to deliver up a sea-port to them. Another despatch, which arrived at the same time, terminated the dispute that had arisen between d'Hervilly and Puisaye, gave to the latter the absolute command of the expedition, and, what was more, conferred on him the rank of lieutenant-general in the service of England.

Puisaye, now free to command, made all requisite preparations for the following day. He would willingly have deferred the projected attack, in order to give Sombrenil's division time to land; but all being fixed for the 16th, and that being the day mentioned to Tinténiac, he could not delay it. On the evening of the 15th, he ordered Vauban to land at Carnac with twelve hundred Chouans, for the purpose of making a diversion on the extremity of the camp of Saint-Barbe, and to effect a junction with the Chouans, who were to attack it in the rear. The boats were got ready at a late hour, and Vauban could not embark before midnight. He had orders to fire a fusée if he succeeded in landing, and a second if he failed to keep his ground on the shore.

On the 16th of July (28th Messidor), at day-break, Puisaye left the peninsula with all the troops he had. He marched in columns. The brave loyal emigrant regiment was at the head, with Rothaler's artillery; on the right advanced the royal marine and Dresnay's regiments, with six hundred Chouans, commanded by the duke de Levis. D'Hervilly's regiment, and a thousand Chouans under the chevalier de Saint Pierre occupied the left. These regiments formed altogether nearly four thousand men. While they were advancing upon the Falaise, they perceived a first fusée fired by the count de Vauban. They saw no second, and concluded that Vauban had succeeded. They continued their march, and soon heard something like the distant sound of musketry. "It is Tinténiac!" exclaimed Puisaye; "forward!" A charge was then sounded, and they marched upon the intrenchments of the republicans. Hoche's advanced guard, commanded by Humbert, was placed before the heights of Saint-Barbe. On the approach of the enemy, it fell back and returned within the lines. The assailants advanced in high spirits. All at once, a division of cavalry, which had remained drawn out, made a movement, and unmasked formidable batteries. The emigrants were received with a fire of musketry and artillery: grape, balls, and shells were showered upon them. On the right the royal marine and Dresnay's regiments lost whole ranks without flinching; the duke de Levis was severely wounded at the head of his Chouans; on the left d'Hervilly's regiment advanced gallantly amidst the fire. Meanwhile the report of musketry, which the assailants thought they had heard on the rear and on the flanks, had ceased. Neither Tinténiac nor Vauban had therefore attacked, and there was no hope of storming the camp. At this moment the republican army, infantry and cavalry, sallied from its intrenchments: Puisaye, seeing nothing before him but certain death, advised d'Hervilly to order the right to retreat, while he would himself cause the same to be done on the left. At that very moment d'Hervilly, who braved the fire with the greatest courage, received an iron ball in the middle of the chest. He directed an aid-de-camp to carry the order for retreat; the aid-de-camp was taken off by a cannon-ball. As they received no orders, d'Hervilly's regiment and the thousand Chouans under the chevalier de Saint-Pierre continued to advance amidst this tremendous fire. While a retreat was sounded on the left, a charge was sounded on the right. The confusion and carnage were horrible. The republican cavalry then fell upon the emigrant army, and drove it back in disorder to the Palaise. Rothaler's cannon, being deep in the sand, were taken. After performing prodigies of valour, the whole army fled towards Fort Penhièvre; the republicans closely pursued them thither, and were on the point of entering the fort with them, but an unexpected assistance saved it from the further pursuit of the conquerors: Vauban, who ought to have been at Carnac, was at the extremity of the Palaise with his Chouans, and commodore Warren with him. Both of them from the gun-boats kept up such a brisk fire upon the beach as to stop the republicans, and once more save the unfortunate army of Quiberon.

Thus Tinténiac had not made his appearance; Vauban, having landed too late, had not been able to surprise the republicans, had been ill-seconded by his Chouans, who dipped their muskets in water that they might not fight, and had retreated near to the fort; his second fusée, kindled in broad daylight, had not been perceived, and thus it was that Puisaye, thwarted in all his combinations, had experienced this disastrous defeat. All the regiments had sustained frightful losses. That of the royal marine alone had lost fifty-three officers out of seventy-two, and the others had suffered in proportion.

It must be confessed that Puisaye had been too precipitate in attacking the camp. Four thousand men, going to attack ten thousand solidly intrenched, ought to have assured themselves in the most certain manner that all the attacks planned on the rear and flanks were ready to take effect. It was not sufficient to have appointed a rendezvous for regiments that had so many obstacles to overcome, in order to conclude that they would have come up at the point and the hour specified; some signal should have been agreed upon, or some other means should have been settled, for insuring the execution of the design. In this particular, Puisaye, though deceived by the sound of distant musketry, had not acted with sufficient precaution. At any rate, he had paid in his own person, and had a good answer for those who pretended to suspect his courage because they could not deny his abilities.

It is easy to comprehend why Tinténiac had not made his appearance. He had found at Elven the order to proceed to Coetlogon; he had complied with that strange order, in hopes of regaining the lost time by a forced march. At Coetlogon he had found women commissioned to deliver to him an order to march to Saint-Brieuc. This came from the agents opposed to Puisaye, who, using the name of the king, in whose name they always spoke, wanted to make the division detached by Puisaye concur in the counter-expedition they contemplated against Saint-Malo or Saint-Brieuc. While a conference was taking place upon this order, the castle of Coetlogon was attacked by the detachments Hoche had sent forth in pursuit of Tinténiac; the latter hastened thither, and fell struck dead by a ball in the forehead. His successor in the command had consented to go against Saint-Brieuc. On their part MM. de Lantivy and Jean-Jean, who had landed near Quimper, had found similar orders; the leaders were disagreed, and observing this conflict of orders and plans, their soldiers, already discontented, had dispersed. This is why not one of the divisions sent by Puisaye to make a diversion had arrived at the place appointed. The Paris agency with its schemes had likewise deprived Puisaye of the companies detained by these agents on the northern coast, of the two detachments they had prevented meeting at Band on the 14th, and lastly of the aid of all the leaders, to whom these agents had given orders not to make any movement.

Shut up in Quiberon, Puisaye had therefore no hope of leaving it and marching forward; all that was left for him was to re-embark before he was forced to do so by famine, and to attempt a more successful descent on some other part of the coast, namely, in Vendée. This was every thing that the greater part of the emigrants desired; the name of Charette induced them to look forward to Vendée for a great general at the head of a fine army. They were delighted, moreover, to see the counter-revolution effected by any other than Puisaye.

In the mean time, Hoche was examining this peninsula, and seeking how to make his way into it. At the entrance it was defended by fort Penhièvre, and on both sides by the English squadrons. To think of landing thither in boats was out of the question; to take the fort by means of a regular siege was equally impossible, for they could only get to it by the Palaise, which was incessantly swept by the fire of the gun-boats. The republicans, in fact, could not make their observations without being exposed to showers of grape shot. There was nothing but a surprise by night or famine that could give the peninsula to Hoche. One circumstance induced him to attempt a surprise, dangerous as it was. The prisoners, who had been reluctantly enlisted in the emigrant regiments could at most have been retained in their service by success; but their pressing necessity, and their want of patriotism, induced them to pass over to the side of a victorious enemy, who was going to treat them as deserters if he were to take them in arms. They repaired to Hoche's camp in great numbers during the night, saying that they had enlisted merely to get out of prison or to escape being sent thither; and they pointed out to him a way of gaining an entrance into the peninsula. On the left of fort Penhièvre there was a rock; by wading into the water up to the breast, a man might get round this rock, and then he would find a path which led to the summit of the fort. The deserters declared, on behalf of their comrades composing the garrison, that they would assist in throwing open the gates.

Hoche never hesitated in spite of the danger, such an attempt. He formed his plan upon the information he had obtained, and resolved to make himself master of the peninsula, and thus capture the whole expedition before it had time to re-embark. On the night of the 20th of July (2nd Thermidor) the sky was overcast, Puisaye and Vauban had set a watch to secure themselves against a nocturnal attack. "In such a night," said they to the officers, "make the enemy's sentinels fire their muskets at you." Every thing appeared quiet, and they retired to bed in full security.

The preparations were made in the republican camp. About midnight, Hoche put himself with his army in motion. The sky was very cloudy; and an extremely violent wind raised the waves, and drowned with their roar the noise of arms and of soldiers. Hoche formed his troops into columns on the Palaise; he next gave three hundred grenadiers to adjutant-general Menage, a young republican of heroic courage. He ordered him to file off on his right, to wade into the water with his grenadiers, to get round the rock on which the walls were built, to ascend by the path, and to endeavour to make his way into the fort. These arrangements made, they marched in the greatest silence; the night-watch, to whom had been given the red uniforms taken from the slain in the action of the 16th, having the pass-word, deceived the advanced sentinels. They approached without being discovered. Menage entered the water with his three hundred grenadiers, the wind drowning the noise they made in wading through it. Some fell and rose again, others were engulfed in the abyss. Thus they followed their intrepid leader from rock to rock, and managed to reach the path that led to the fort. Hoche had meanwhile arrived under the walls with his columns. But all at once the sentinels recognised one of the false watch; they perceived amid the darkness a tall moving shadow; they instantly fired; the alarm was given. The Toulonnese gunners ran to their pieces, and poured a shower of grape on Hoche's troops; a confusion took place, they were thrown into disorder, and were on the point of running away. But at this moment Menage got to the summit of the fortress; the soldiers in league with the assailants ran to the battlements, held the butt ends of their muskets to the republicans, and got them in. They then rushed all together upon the rest of the garrison, slaughtered all who made a resistance, and instantly hoisted the tricoloured flag. Hoche in the midst of the disorder into which the enemy's batteries had thrown his columns, did not flinch for a moment; he ran up to every officer, brought him back to his post, made the men return to their ranks, and rallied his army under this tremendous fire. It began to be not quite so dark. He perceived the republican flag flying on the top of the fort. "What!" said he to his men, "would you run away now that your comrades have hoisted their flag upon the enemy's wall!" He led them on to the advanced works, where part of the Chouans were encamped: they rushed upon the intrenchments, made their way into them at every point, and at length made themselves masters of the fort.

At this moment Vauban and Puisaye, roused by the firing, had hurried to the scene of the disaster; but it was too late. They found the Chouans running away pêle-mêle, the officers deserted by their soldiers, and the remnant of the garrison continuing true. Hoche did not stop at the taking of the fort: he rallied part of his columns, and pushed on into the peninsula, before the army of the expedition could re-embark. Puisaye, Vauban, and all the officers, retired towards the interior, where the regiment of d'Hervilly, the wrecks of the regiments of Dresnay, the royal marine, and the loyal emigrant regiments, and Sombreuil's legion, landed two days before, and eleven hundred strong yet remained. By taking a good position, and there were more than one in the peninsula, and occupying it with the three thousand regular troops which they still had, they might give the squadron time to collect the unfortunate emigrants. The fire of the gun-boats would have protected the embarkation; but disorder everywhere prevailed; the Chouans threw themselves into the sea with their families, to get on board some fishing-boats which lay near the shore, and to put off in them to the squadron, which the rough weather had caused to stand more out at sea. The troops, scattered in the peninsula, ran hither and thither, not knowing where to rally. D'Hervilly, capable of defending a position with vigour, and well acquainted with the localities, was mortally wounded; Sombreuil, who had succeeded him, was not acquainted with the ground, knew not where to support himself, or whither to retire, and, though brave, appeared on this occasion to have lost the necessary presence of mind. Puisaye, on coming to Sombreuil, informed him what position to occupy. Sombreuil inquired if he had sent word to the squadron to heave to; Puisaye replied that he had sent a skilful and zealous pilot; but the weather was rough, and the pilot did not arrive quick enough to satisfy the unfortunate men who were exposed to be driven into the sea. The republican columns were approaching. Sombreuil again urged the question, "Is the squadron informed?" he asked Puisaye. Puisaye then offered to fly on board himself, to hasten the approach of the commodore—a commission more proper for him to have given to another, as he should have been the last to withdraw from the danger. One reason decided him—the necessity of saving his correspondence, which would have compromised all Brittany if it had fallen into the hands of the republicans. He was no doubt as anxious to save that, as to save the army itself; but Puisaye might have got it sent on board without going in person. He put off, and got on board the Commodore at the same time as the pilot whom he had despatched. The distance, the darkness, the bad weather, had prevented the disaster from being observed on board the squadron. The brave admiral Warren, who during the expedition had seconded the emigrants with all his means, made all sail, and at length arrived with his ships within the range of his cannon, at the moment when Hoche, at the head of seven hundred grenadiers, was closely pressing Sombreuil's legion, and the latter was on the point of giving way. What a spectacle did this unhappy coast at that moment present! The roughness of the sea scarcely permitted any boats to go near the shore; a multitude of Chouans and fugitive soldiers plunged into the water to their necks to meet them, and drowned themselves in their efforts to get to them sooner; a thousand unfortunate emigrants, placed between the sea and the bayonets of the republicans, were reduced to the necessity of throwing themselves either into the waves or upon the enemy's steel, and suffered as much from the fire of the English squadron as the republicans themselves. Some boats had come in, but to a different point. On this side there was but a single brig, which kept up a tremendous fire, and which had checked for a moment the advance of the republicans. Some of the grenadiers, it is said, cried out to the emigrants, "Surrender; nothing shall be done to you." This saying passed from rank to rank. Sombreuil would have approached to parley with general Humbert, but the fire prevented him from advancing. An emigrant officer immediately swam off to cause the firing to cease. Hoche would not admit of a capitulation; he was too well aware of the laws against emigrants to dare to make any engagement, and he was incapable of promising what he was unable to perform. He has declared, in a letter published throughout all Europe, that he heard none of the promises attributed to general Humbert, and that he would not have authorised them. Some of his soldiers might have shouted "Surrender!" but he offered nothing, promised nothing. He advanced, and the emigrants having no other resource than to surrender or be killed, hoping that they might perhaps be treated like the Vendéens, they laid down their arms. No capitulation whatever, not even a verbal one, took place with Hoche. Vauban, who was present, admitted that no articles or agreement were made, and he even advised Sombreuil not to surrender on the vague hope suggested by the cries of a few private soldiers.

Many of the emigrants stabbed themselves with their swords; others threw themselves into the sea to get to the boats. Commodore Warren made all the efforts in his power to overcome the obstacles presented by the sea, for the purpose of saving as many as possible of those unfortunates. There were vast numbers of them, who on seeing the boats approaching, had gone into the water up to the neck; the enemy on the shore fired at their heads. Sometimes they scrambled into boats already full, and those who were in them, fearing lest they should be sunk, cut their hands with their swords.

But let us quit these scenes of horror, where dreadful misfortunes were visited on great imprudences. More than one cause had contributed to prevent the success of this expedition. In the first place, too great reliance was placed on Brittany. People really disposed to insurrection will break out, as did the Vendéens in 1793, leaders are sought for, implored, nay forced to put themselves at their head, but they do not wait to be organized, do not endure two years of oppression, and then rise when that oppression is past. However favourably its tendencies might have been demonstrated, a superintendent like Hoche would have prevented their manifestation. Puisaye was, therefore, exceedingly mistaken. Much might nevertheless have been done with the people of Brittany, and many men disposed to fight might have been found among them, if an expedition of any magnitude had made its way to Rennes, and had driven before it the army that kept the country in subjection. However, to do this, the leaders of the insurgents should have acted in unison with Puisaye, and Puisaye with the Paris agents; instructions the most contrary should not have been sent to the Chouan chiefs; some should not have received orders to remain stationary, and others should not have been despatched in directions opposite to those that Puisaye had pointed out; the emigrants should have understood better the nature of the war they were about to undertake; they should have felt less contempt for those peasants who devoted themselves to their cause; the English also should have harboured less distrust of Puisaye, and not have associated another leader with him; they should have given him at once all the means they intended he should have, and have attempted this expedition with their whole united force; above all, there ought to have been a great prince at the head of this expedition: it was not absolutely necessary that he should be great, but he ought to have been the first to set foot on the shore. On seeing him, all obstacles would have vanished. That dissension of the Vendean leaders among themselves, between the Vendean leaders and the Breton leaders, between the Breton leaders and the Paris agents, between the Chouans and the emigrants, and between Spain and England, that separation of all the elements of the enterprise would instantly have ceased. At seeing the prince, all the enthusiasm of the country would have been called into action. Everybody would have obeyed his orders and assisted in the enterprise. Hoche might then have been surrounded; and in spite of his talents and his activity, he would have been compelled to retreat before an influence all-powerful in those parts. There would, it is true, still have been behind him those valiant armies which had conquered Europe; but Austria might have occupied them on the Rhine, and prevented them from sending him any sufficient detachments; the government had no longer the vigour of the old committee, and the revolution would have run great risks. Displaced twenty years earlier, her benefits would not have had time to consolidate themselves; unparalleled efforts, immortal victories, torrents of blood, would all have proved fruitless to France; or if at any rate it had not been permitted that a handful of fugitives should subject a brave nation to their yoke, they would have endangered its regeneration; and as for themselves, they would not have lost their cause without defending it, and they would have done honour to their pretensions by their energy.

Every thing was imputed to Puisaye and England by the hot-headed spirits who composed the royalist party. Puisaye was, in their ideas, a traitor, who had sold himself to Pitt, for the purpose of renewing the scenes of Toulon. It was nevertheless certain that Puisaye had done all that lay in his power. It was absurd to suppose that England did not wish to succeed; her own precautions in regard to Puisaye, the selection she herself made of d'Hervilly for the purpose of preventing the emigrant army from being too much compromised; and lastly, the zeal with which commodore Warren strove to save the unfortunate survivors in the peninsula, prove that, notwithstanding her temporizing inclinations, she had not contemplated the hideous and base crime imputed to her. Justice is due to all, even to the implacable enemies of our revolution and of our country.

Commodore Warren went to put the miserable wreck of the expedition on shore in the isle of Houat, and there waited for fresh orders from London, as also for the arrival of count d'Artois, who was on board the Lori Moira, to know what he was to do. There was nought else but despair in that little island; the emigrants and the Chouans, in the greatest misery, and attacked by a contagious disease, abandoned themselves to recriminations, and bitterly accused Puisaye. Still greater was the desperation at Aurai and at Vannes, whither the thousand emigrants taken in arms had been conveyed. Hoche, after conquering them, had withdrawn himself from this melancholy spectacle, to follow up the pursuit of Tinténiac's band, called the red army. The fate of the prisoners no longer concerned him; what could he do for them! The laws existed; he could not annul them. He referred it to the committee of public welfare and to Tallien. Tallien set out immediately, and arrived in Paris on the day preceding the anniversary of the 9th Thermidor. On the morrow was to be held, according to the new fashion adopted, in the very presence of the assembly, a fête to commemorate the fall of Robespierre. All the representatives sat in costume; a numerous band played patriotic airs, vocal performers chanted the hymns of Chénier. Courtois read a report of the events of the 9th Thermidor. Tallien then read the report of the affair at Quiberon. They noticed his evident desire to procure for himself a double triumph; nevertheless they loudly applauded his services of that day twelvemonth, and those which he had so recently rendered. In point of fact, his presence had not been without its advantages to Hoche. On the same day there was a banquet at Tallien's, at which the principal Girondists met the Thermidorians. Louvet and Lanjuinais were present. Lanjuinais gave for a toast, "The 9th Thermidor, and the courageous deputies who overthrew tyranny." Tallien gave for a second, "The seventy-three, the twenty-two, the deputies, victims of terror;" Louvet added these words: "And their intimate connection with the men of the 9th Thermidor."

Indeed, there was every reason for their uniting and opposing by their joint efforts the multifarious enemies that had risen against the republic. Great was their joy, especially in considering the danger they might have incurred, if the expedition in the west could have acted in concert with that which the prince of Condé had prepared in the east.

It was necessary to decide upon the fate of the prisoners. Many solicitations were addressed to the committees; but in the present state of things to save them was impossible. The republicans asserted that the government intended to recall the emigrants, restore their property, and consequently restore royalty; the royalists, always presumptuous, maintained the same thing; they said that their friends governed, and they became more audacious the more they hoped. To have shown the least indulgence on this occasion would have been to justify the apprehensions of the one, and the fond hopes of the others. It would have been making the republicans desperate, and encouraging the royalists to the most daring attempts. The committee of public welfare ordered the laws to be put in force, and assuredly there were now no

Mountaineers among the committee; but it felt the impossibility of doing otherwise. A commission, which met at Vannes, was directed to distinguish the prisoners enlisted against their will from those that were essentially emigrants. The latter were shot. The soldiers allowed as many of them to escape as they could. Many brave men perished; but they had no right to be astonished at their fate, after they had carried war into their own country and been taken in arms. Had she been less threatened by foes of every description, and especially by their own accomplices, the republic might have pardoned them; under existing circumstances, she could not do so. M. de Sombreuil, though a brave officer, gave way at the moment of death to an impulse unworthy of his courageous bearing. He wrote a letter to commodore Warren, in which he accused Puisaye with all the vehemence of despair. He begged Hoche to send it to the commodore. Although this letter contained a false assertion, Hoche, complying with the requests of a dying man, sent it to the commodore; but replied in a letter contradicting Sombreuil's assertion. "I was," said he, "at the head of Humbert's seven hundred grenadiers, and I declare that no capitulation was ever made." All his contemporaries, to whom the character of the young general was known, have deemed him incapable of falsehood. Eye-witnesses, moreover, confirm his assertion. Sombreuil's letter did the emigrants much mischief as well as Puisaye, and it was judged so far from honourable to the memory of the writer, that it has been asserted that the republicans forged it, an assertion every way worthy of the pitiful stories invented by the emigrants.

While the royalist party had recently experienced so severe a check at Quiberon, another was being prepared for it in Spain. Monecy had once more entered Biscay, taken Bilbao and Vittoria, and was closely pressing Pampeluna. The favourite who governed the court, after having refused at first to entertain an overture for peace made by the French government, at the commencement of the campaign, because he had not been made the agent, decided on negotiating himself, and sent the chevalier d'Yriarte to Bâle. The peace was signed at Bâle with Barthélemy, the envoy of the republic, on the 24th Messidor (July 12), at the very moment of the disasters at Quiberon. The conditions were, the restitution of all conquests France had taken from Spain, and as an equivalent the cession of the Spanish part of Saint Domingo to ourselves. France made great concessions for a mere illusory advantage, for Saint Domingo no longer belonged to any body; but these concessions were dictated by the wisest policy. France could not want any thing the other side of the Pyrenees; she had no interest in weakening Spain; she ought, on the contrary, had it been possible, to have restored to that power the strength she had lost in a conflict so detrimental to the interests of the two nations.

The peace was hailed with the most lively joy by every one who wished well to France and the republic. There was now one more power detached from the coalition, a Bourbon who acknowledged the republic; and there were two disposable armies to send to the Alps, to the west, and to the Rhine. The royalists were in despair. The Paris agents in particular, were apprehensive lest their intrigues should be divulged; they dreaded a communication of their letters sent to Spain. England would then have seen all that they had said of her; and though that power was loudly blamed for the affair of Quiberon, yet she was now the only one that could afford money; it was necessary therefore to keep on good terms with her, with the intention of cheating her, if it were possible*.

Another not less important success was that gained by the armies of Jourdan and Pichegru. After many delays, it was at length settled that they should cross the Rhine. The French and the Austrian armies came up face to face with one another on the two banks of the river, from Bâle as far as Dusseldorf. The defensive position of the Austrians upon the Rhine was most judiciously chosen. The fortresses of Dusseldorf and Ehrenbreitstein covered their right; Mentz, Mannheim, and Philipsburg covered their centre and their left; the Neckar and the Main, rising not far from the Danube and running in nearly a parallel direction towards the Rhine, formed two important lines of communication with the hereditary states, brought abundance of supplies, and covered the two flanks of the army that intended to act concentrically towards Mentz. The plan to be followed upon this field of battle was the same for the Austrians as for the French, the one and the other (in the opinion of a great captain and a celebrated critic) should have been inclined to act concentrically between the Main and the Neckar. The French armies of Jourdan and Pichegru ought to have attempted to pass the Rhine towards Mentz, no great distance from one another, then to join in the valley of the Main, to separate Clerfaut from Wurmsier; and to ascend between the Neckar and the Main, striving to beat in their turn the two Austrian generals. In like manner, the two Austrian generals ought to have endeavoured to concentrate themselves, in order to debouch by Mentz upon the left bank and to fall upon Jourdan or Pichegru. If they had been anticipated, if the Rhine had been crossed at one point, they should have concentrated themselves between the Neckar and the Main, to have prevented the junction of the two French armies, and to have taken some favourable opportunity to fall upon one or the other. The Austrian generals had every opportunity for taking the initiative, for they were in possession of Mentz, and could debouch on the left bank whenever they pleased.

The French took the initiative. After considerable delays, the Dutch barks at last got up as high as Dusseldorf, and Jourdan prepared to cross the Rhine. On the 20th Fructidor (September 6), he crossed over at Eichelcamp, Dusseldorf, and Neuwied, by a very bold manœuvre; he advanced by the road from Dusseldorf to Frankfort, between the line of the Prussian neutrality and the Rhine, and arrived near the Lahn on the fourth complementary day* (September 20). At the same moment, Pichegru had orders to attempt the passage on the Upper Rhine, and to summon Mannheim to surrender. That flourishing city, threatened with a bombardment, surrendered, contrary to all expectation, on the fourth complementary day (September 20). From that moment the French had all the advantage. Pichegru therefore being established at Mannheim, had to draw his whole army thither, and to effect a junction with Jourdan in the valley of the Main. They would then be able to cut off the two Austrian generals, and to act concentrically between the Main and the Neckar. It was of extreme importance to draw Jourdan from his position between the line of neutrality and the Rhine, for his army not having the means of sufficient conveyance for its provisions, and not being able to treat the country as that of an enemy, his army would in all probability soon be in want of actual necessaries if he did not march in advance.

Thus at this moment every thing went well with the republic. Peace with Spain, the destruction of the expedition fitted out by England for the coast of Brittany, the passage of the Rhine, and the successful attacks in Germany. The republic possessed all these advantages at once. It was for her generals and her government to take advantage of so many propitious events.

CHAPTER XXXI.

INTRIGUES OF THE ROYALIST PARTY IN THE SECTIONS.—RETURN OF THE EMIGRANTS. PERSECUTION OF THE PATRIOT PARTY.—THE DIRECTORIAL CONSTITUTION, CALLED OF THE YEAR III., AND THE DECREES OF THE 5TH AND 13TH FRUCTIDOR.—THE CONSTITUTION AND DECREES ACCEPTED BY THE PRIMARY ASSEMBLIES OF FRANCE.—THE SECTIONS OF PARIS REBEL AGAINST THE DECREES OF FRUCTIDOR AND AGAINST THE CONVENTION. THE EVENTS OF 13 VENDÉMAIRE, AND DEFEAT OF THE INSURGENT SECTIONS.—THE NATIONAL CONVENTION CLOSED ITS SITTINGS.

BEATEN on the frontiers, and abandoned by the court of Spain, on whom it placed the greatest reliance, the royalist party was reduced to intrigue at home; and it must be confessed that at this moment, Paris offered a wide field for their intrigues. The work of the constitution was advancing; the time when the convention was to resign her powers, when France should meet to elect fresh representatives, when a new assembly should supply the place of that which had so long reigned, was more favourable than any other for secret counter-revolutionary designs.

The most active passions were fermenting in the sections of Paris. There were no royalists there, but the sections served the cause of royalty without intending it. They had made a point of opposing the Terrorists; they had animated themselves by the conflict; they also wanted to persecute, and they were embittered against the convention, who would not allow the persecution to be pushed to great lengths. They were always ready to remember that terror had issued from her body; they required at her hands a constitution and laws, and the termination of the long dictatorship she had exercised. Most of those who called for this cared nought whatever for the Bourbons. These men were the wealthy tiers-état of 1789; these were the merchants, shopkeepers, landowners, advocates, and writers, who wished at length for the establishment of the laws and the enjoyment of their rights; there were also the young men, who were sincerely republican, but blinded by their zeal against the revolutionary system; there were also many ambitious men, newspaper writers, or speakers in the sections, who, to ensure a place for themselves, wanted that the convention should retire before them: behind this mass the royalists concealed themselves. Among these were to be found some few emigrants, some few returned priests, some few creatures of the old court who had lost their places, and many time-serving and cowardly persons, who dreaded a troublous time of liberty. These last did not frequent the sections, but the former attended them regularly, and employed all possible means to agitate them. The instructions given by the royalist agents to their creatures was to adopt the language of the sectionists, to demand the same things, to insist like them on the punishment of the Terrorists, the completion of the constitution, the trial of the Mountaineer deputies, but yet to call for all these things with greater violence than necessary, so as to compromise the sections with the convention, and to provoke new commotions, for every commotion was a chance for them, and would at any rate raise a disgust against so tumultuous a republic.

Fortunately such proceedings were not practicable except at Paris, for that is always the most agitated city in France; that is the place where public concerns are discussed with most warmth, there it is that people have the desire and the pretension of influencing the government, and that is the place where opposition always emanates. Except at Lyons, Marseilles, and Toulon, where men were slaughtering one another, the rest of France took infinitely less share in these political agitations than the sections of Paris.

To all that they said, or caused to be said, in the sections, the intriguers in the service of royalism added pamphlets and articles in the newspapers. According to their usual mode, they uttered falsehoods, assumed an importance they did not possess, and wrote abroad, stating that they had seduced the principal leaders of the government. It was from the utterance of these falsehoods that they procured money, and that was how they had recently obtained some thousand pounds sterling from England. It is nevertheless certain that if they had not gained either Tallien or Hoche, as they alleged, they had at least gained over some convention folks, perhaps two or three. Rovère and Saladin were mentioned as two fiery revolutionists, who had now become violent reactionists. It is also believed that they had influenced by more delicate means some few of those deputies holding middle opinions, who possessed some inclination towards a representative monarchy, that is, towards a Bourbon professedly bound by laws after the English notion. To Pichegru had been offered a mansion, money, and cannon; to some few legislators or members of the committees, it may have been said, "France is too extensive to be a republic; she would be much happier with a king, responsible ministers, hereditary peers, and deputies." This idea, without being suggested, would naturally occur to more than one person, especially to those who were qualified to become deputies or hereditary peers. MM. Lanjuinais and Boissy d'Anglas, Henri Larivière and Lesage (of Eure and Loire), were then looked upon as royalists at heart.

We thus see that the means of the agents were not very powerful; but they were quite sufficient to disturb the public tranquillity, to unsettle opinions, and especially to recal to the memory of the French those Bourbons, the only enemies the republic still had, and whom its arms had not been able to conquer, because recollections are not to be destroyed with bayonets.

Among the seventy-three there was more than one monarchist; but in general they were republicans. The Girondists were all or nearly all of them the same. Nevertheless the counter-revolutionary journals praised them with great warmth, and had thus succeeded in rendering them suspected with the Thermidorians. To protect themselves against these eulogies, the seventy-three and the twenty-two protested their attachment to the republic; for at that time nobody durst speak with apathy of the republic. What a frightful contradiction would it have been, in fact, if people had not wished it well, to have sacrificed so much blood and treasure for its establishment, to have immolated thousands of Frenchmen either in civil or in foreign war! It was therefore a matter of expedience to wish the republic well, or at least to say so. However, notwithstanding these protestations, the Thermidorians were distrustful; they reckoned only upon M. Daunou, whose integrity and strict principles were well known, and on Louvet, whose ardent mind had continued to be republican. The latter, indeed, after losing so many illustrious friends, and running so many risks, did not comprehend that all this could be in vain; he had no idea that so many valuable lives had been sacrificed to bring about royalty; he had cordially joined the Thermidorians. The Thermidorians united themselves from day to day with the Mountaineers, with that mass of unshaken republicans, a very great number of whom they had sacrificed.

They desired, in the first place, that some course should be taken against the return of the emigrants, who continued to make their appearance in shoals, some with false passports and by fictitious names, others under the pretext of coming to solicit their erasure from the lists. Almost every one of them produced false certificates of residence, said that they had not been out of France, and had merely concealed themselves, or that they had been proceeded against only on account of the events of the 31st of May. Under the pretence of memorializing the committee of general safety, they filled Paris, and some of them contributed to the agitations of the sections. Among the most distinguished personages who had returned to Paris was Madame de Stael, who had recently made her appearance in France in company with her husband, the ambassador of Sweden. She had thrown open her withdrawing room, where she indulged her natural ability to display her brilliant talents. A republic was far from unacceptable to the firmness of her character, but she would not have been reconciled to it unless she had seen her proscribed friends take a shining part therein, and never more see those revolutionists who doubtless passed for energetic men, but who were gross men and deficient in intellect. Everybody was willing enough to receive at their hands the salvation of the republic, but at the same time desirous to repel them at once from taking any share in the debates or the government. Foreigners of distinction, all the ambassadors, the men of letters most celebrated for their wit, met at the house of Madame de Stael. It was no longer Madame Tallien's withdrawing room, but Madame de Stael's that now attracted everybody's regard, and this fact of itself demonstrated the change that French society had undergone during the last six months. It was said that Madame de Stael interceded for the emigrants; it was asserted that she wanted the recall of Narbonne, Jaucourt, and several others. Legendre denounced her from the tribune in form. Complaints were made in the newspapers of the influence which exclusive societies, nestling around the foreign ambassadors, wanted to exercise, and in short the suspension of the censures from the lists was demanded. The Thermidorians, moreover, caused it to be further decreed, that every emigrant, returned for the purpose of soliciting the erasure of his name from the lists, was bound to repair to his commune, and there await the decision of the committee of general safety*. They expected by this measure to rid the capital of a multitude of intriguers, who contributed to the general agitation.

The Thermidorians wished at the same time to put a stop to the persecutions against the patriots; they had, through the committee of general safety, liberated Pache, Bouchotte, and the notorious Héron, and many others. It must be admitted, that they might have made a better selection than this last for the purpose of doing justice to the patriots. The sections had, as we have seen, already presented petitions on the subject of these discharges; they now petitioned again. The committees replied, that the patriots who were in confinement ought to be brought at once to trial, and not be detained any longer if they were innocent. To propose their trial was, in fact, to propose their discharge, for their offences were generally those political offences indefinable in their very nature. With the exception of some members of the revolutionary committees, rendered notorious by atrocious excesses, the greater number could not legally be condemned. Several sections came to desire that a few days' longer sitting should be granted them, that they might collect evidence to justify the apprehension and the disarming of those whom they had confined; they stated that, at the first moment they had not been able either to inquire for proofs or to assign causes; but they declared their readiness to furnish them. No attention was paid to these propositions, which cloaked the desire to assemble together, and to obtain the further sittings; and the draught of a decree for bringing to trial the imprisoned patriots was demanded from the committees.

A violent dispute arose concerning this draught decree. Some were for sending the patriots before the departmental tribunals; others suspecting local influences, were opposed to this mode of trial, and proposed that a commission of twelve members should be chosen from among the convention, to be the triers of the imprisoned persons, to release those against whom the charges preferred were insufficient, and to send the others before the criminal tribunal. They alleged that this commission, disconnected with the animosities that agitated the departments, would do more substantial justice, and would not confound the patriots compromised by the ardour of their zeal with the guilty men who had participated in the cruelties of the decemviral tyranny. All the determined enemies of the patriots rose up against the idea of this commission, which was about to act just in the same way as the committee of general safety renewed after the 9th Thermidor had done, namely, to discharge them en masse. They asked how it was possible that a commission of twelve members could try twenty or twenty-five thousand cases. The only answer made to this was, that they would follow the example of the committee of general safety, who had tried eighty or one hundred thousand when the prisons were opened. But this was the very mode of trial that was found fault with. After a debate which lasted several days, intermingled with petitions, every succeeding one bolder than the previous, it was at length settled that the patriots should be tried by the tribunals of the departments, and the decree was sent back to the committees to qualify some of its secondary arrangements. It was found necessary also to consent to the continuation of the report concerning the deputies compromised in regard to their missions. The assembly decreed the arrest* of Lequinio, Lanot, Leflot, Dupin, Bô, Piorey, Maxien, Chaudon-Rousseau, Laplanche, and Fouché; proceedings were also commenced against Lebon. At this moment the convention had as many of its members in prison as in the time of terror. Thus the advocates of clemency had nothing to regret, and had returned evil for evil.

The constitution had been presented by the commission of eleven. It was discussed during the three months of Messidor, Thermidor, and Fructidor, year III., and was decreed article by article with very little alteration. Its authors were Lesage, Daunou, Boissy d'Anglas, Creuzé-Latouche, Berlier, Louvet, Larévellière-Lépeaux, Lanjuinais, Durand-Maillean, Baudin (of the Ardennes), and Thibaudeau. Sieyès did not desire to become a member of that commission; for in regard to his notions as to what a constitution ought to be, he was more dogmatic on that point than on any thing else. Constitutions were the sole topic of reflexions that had occupied his whole life. They were his peculiar study. He had one ready made in his head, and he was not a man to sacrifice it. He came, therefore, to propose it in his own name, and apart from the commission. The assembly, out of respect for his genius, were willing enough to hear him, but did not adopt his draught of a constitution. We shall see it brought forward on a subsequent occasion, and it will then be time to make the reader acquainted with that conception, an event in the history of the human understanding. That which was adopted kept pace with the progress the public mind had made. In 1791, men were yet such novices, and so good-natured withal, that they could not conceive the existence of an aristocratic body controlling the will of the national representation, and they had nevertheless admitted and retained with respect, nay, almost with affection, the royal power. On reflexion, however, they would have seen that an aristocratic body belongs to all countries, and that it is more particularly adapted to republics; that a great state may do very well without a king, but never without a senate. In 1795 they had just witnessed the disorders to which a single assembly is exposed, and they consented to the establishment of a legislative body divided into two assemblies; they were then less irritated against aristocracy than against royalty, because, in fact, they dreaded the latter still more. Accordingly they took greater care to protect themselves against it in the formation of an executive power. There was in the commission a monarchical party, consisting of Lesage, Lanjuinais, Durand-Maillane, and Boissy d'Anglas. This party proposed a president; it was refused. "Some day, perhaps," said Louvet, "they will appoint a Bourbon." Baudin (of the Ardennes) and Daunou proposed two consuls; others wanted three. The preference was given to five directors, deciding by a majority. There was not imparted to this executive power any one of the essential prerogatives of royalty, such as inviolability, the sanction of the laws, the judicial power, or the right of peace and war. It possessed the mere inviolability of the deputies, the promulgation and the execution of the laws, the conduct but not the voting of war, and the negotiation and not the ratification of treaties.

Such was the basis on which the directorial constitution was founded. The assembly in consequence decreed:

A council called the Five Hundred, composed of five hundred members, of at least thirty years of age, having solely the right of proposing laws, renewing itself as to one-third of its members every year;

A council called the Ancients, composed of two hundred and fifty members, of at least forty years of age, all either widowers or married, having the power to give the final assent (sanction) to laws, renewing itself also by one-third;

Lastly, An executive Directory, composed of five members, deciding by a majority, renewing itself annually by one-fifth, possessing responsible ministers, promulgating the laws and enforcing their execution, having the disposal of the land and naval forces, the foreign affairs, the authority of repelling the first hostilities, but not the power to make war without the consent of the legislative body, negotiating treaties and submitting them to the ratification of the legislative body, excepting secret articles, which it should have the authority to stipulate, provided they were not inconsistent with or repugnant to the open articles.

All citizens of the age of twenty-one years were to meet as of right in primary assembly on every first day of the month of Prairial and nominate electoral assemblies. These electoral assemblies were to meet every 20th Prairial, and nominate the two councils; and the two councils to nominate the directory. It was considered that the executive power, being nominated by the legislative power, would be more dependent upon it; it was thus settled by a reason deduced from circumstances. The republic being not as yet identified with the ordinary feelings of France, and being rather an opinion of men who had gained experience, or else persons compromised in the revolution, than a general sentiment, it was not considered expedient to entrust the formation of the executive power to the masses. It was considered therefore, that in the first years especially, the authors of the revolution, who would naturally predominate in the legislative body, would choose directors well fitted for the defence of their own production.

The judicial authority was committed to elective judges. Justices of the peace were instituted. A civil tribunal was established in each department, trying as a court of the first instance the causes of the department, and in appeal those of the contiguous departments. There was added a criminal court, composed of five judges and a jury.

There were to be no communal assemblies, but municipal and departmental administrations, composed of three, five, or more members, according to the population: they were to be formed by way of election. Experience caused the adoption of minor and also more important arrangements. Thus the legislative body itself designated its seat, and might transfer it to the commune it chose to select. No law could be discussed without three previous readings, unless it were considered to be an emergent measure, and acknowledged as such by the council of the ancients. This was a method of preventing those very sudden resolutions, so speedily rescinded, which the convention had so frequently taken. Lastly, every society calling itself popular, holding its sittings in public, with secretary, tribunes, and corresponding societies in connection with it, was prohibited. The press was entirely free; the emigrants were banished for ever from the territory of the republic; the national domains were irrevocably secured to the purchasers; all religions were declared tolerated, although not recognized or paid by the state.

Such was the constitution by which it was hoped to maintain France as a republic. One important question presented itself: the constituent assembly, from an ostentation of disinterestedness, had excluded itself from the new legislative body, who became its substitute; would the convention do the same? It must be admitted that such a determination would have been a great miscarriage. Among a fickle people, who, after living fourteen centuries under monarchy, had overthrown it in a moment of enthusiasm, the republic was not so identified with their habits that its establishment could be left to the mere course of things. The revolution could not be well defended except by its originators. The convention was chiefly composed of constituents and members of the legislative assembly: she comprehended the men who had abolished the ancient feudal constitution on the 14th of July and the 4th of August, 1789, who had overturned the throne on the 10th of August, who had on the 21st of January sacrificed the head of the Bourbon dynasty, and who had for three years been making unparalleled efforts against all Europe to maintain their institution; they alone were capable of effectually defending the revolution, now rendered durable in the directorial constitution. Thus, without ostentatiously priding themselves upon a vain disinterestedness, they decreed on the 5th Fructidor (August 22nd), that the new legislative body should be composed of two-thirds of the convention, and that no more than a new third should be elected. The question was to ascertain whether the convention should herself designate the two-thirds to be retained, or whether she would permit that duty to devolve upon the electoral assemblies. After a tremendous dispute, it was agreed on the 13th Fructidor (August 30th), that the electoral assemblies should undertake this selection. It was settled that the primary assemblies should meet on the 20th Fructidor (September 6), to accept the constitution as well as the two decrees of the 5th and the 13th Fructidor. Moreover, it was decreed, that after having given their votes upon the constitution and the decrees, the primary assemblies should again meet and should at once make, that is to say in the year III. (1795) the elections for the 1st Prairial in the following year. The convention by this announced her intention of resigning the dictatorship, and of putting the constitution into operation. She decreed also that the armies, although ordinarily deprived of the right of deliberating, should nevertheless assemble on the field of battle they should then occupy, for the purpose of voting the constitution. It was but proper, it was said, that those who had to defend the constitution should also be allowed to assent thereto. This was giving the armies an interest in the revolution by their very vote.

These resolutions had been hardly adopted before the enemies of the convention, so numerous and so diverse, discovered how deeply they were mortified by them. The greatest part of them cared but little about the constitution. Any constitution whatever would have suited them, provided it allowed a general renewal of all the members of the government. The royalists wished for this renewal, to produce disturbance, to bring together the greatest possible number of persons of their choice, and to make the republic herself subservient to the cause of royalty: they wished for this renewal, more especially in order to get rid of the conventionalists, so deeply interested in opposing counter-revolution, and to bring forward new men, inexperienced, not compromised, and more easy to be led. Many literary characters, writers, unknown persons eager to start upon the career of politics, not from a spirit of counter-revolution, but from personal ambition, were also desirous of this complete renewal, so as to have a greater number of places open for them to occupy. Both the one and the other dispersed themselves among the sections, and excited them against the decrees.

The convention, they said, wanted to keep herself for ever in power; she talked of the rights of the people, and yet postponed the exercise of them for an indefinite period; she arbitrarily settled their election, and would not permit them to prefer the men who had remained unspotted from crime; she wanted to retain by force a majority composed of men who had covered France with scaffolds. Thus, added they, the new legislature would not be freed from the terrorists; thus it was that France would not be perfectly assured in respect of her future state, and could not rest in the assurance of never witnessing the revival of a horrible system. These declamations had their effect upon the minds of the many: the entire of the trading community of the sections, who were content with the new institutions such as they were given to them, but who had an excessive dread of the return of terror; sincere but unreflecting men, who dreamt of a faultless republic, and who desired to place a new and spotless generation in power; young men enamoured of the same chimeras, the imaginations of many captivated with novelty, saw with the most lively regret the convention thus keep itself on foot for two or three years. The tribe of newspaper writers was in commotion. A great number of men who possessed some consideration in literature, and who had figured in the former assemblies, appeared in the tribunes of the sections. MM. Suard, Morellet, Lacroix junior, Fiévée, Vaublanc, Pastoret, Dupont de Nemours, Quatremère de Quincy, Delolot, the fiery convert Laharpe, general Miranda, who had escaped from the prisons in which he had been confined for his conduct at Neerwinden, the Spaniard Marchenna, withdrawn from the proscription of his friends the Girondists, and Lemaitre, the head of the royalist agency, distinguished themselves by pamphlets or by vehement speeches in the sections: the dissatisfaction was universal.

The plan to be pursued was quite simple; it was merely to accept the constitution, and reject the decrees. This was what was proposed to be done in Paris, and what all the sections in France were exhorted to do also. But the intriguers who agitated the sections, and who wished to urge opposition forward to insurrection, desired a more complicated plan. Their object was that the primary assemblies, after they had accepted the constitution, and rejected the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, should make themselves permanent; that they should declare the powers of the convention expired, and the electoral assemblies free to choose their deputies from wheresoever they pleased; lastly, that they should not consent to separate till after the installation of the new legislative body. The agents of Lemaitre acquainted the environs of Paris with this plan; they wrote to Normandy, where there was great intriguing in favour of the constitution of 1791, to Brittany, to the Gironde, and to every quarter with which they had correspondences. One of their letters was seized and made public from the tribune. The convention saw without alarm the preparations making against her, and awaited with calmness the decision of the primary assemblies of all France, certain that the majority would declare itself in her favour. Nevertheless, suspecting the intention of a new conflict, she ordered some troops to

in his head, and he was not a man to sacrifice it. He came, therefore, to propose it in his own name, and apart from the commission. The assembly, out of respect for his genius, were willing enough to hear him, but did not adopt his draught of a constitution. We shall see it brought forward on a subsequent occasion, and it will then be time to make the reader acquainted with that conception, an event in the history of the human understanding. Such was the constitution by which it was hoped to maintain France as a republic. One important question presented itself: the constituent assembly, from an ostentation of disinterestedness, had excluded itself from the new legislative body, who became its substitute; would the convention do the same? It must be admitted that such a determination would have been a great miscarriage. Among a field people, who, after living fourteen centuries under monarchy, had overthrown it in a moment of enthusiasm, the republic was not so identified with their habits that its establishment could be left to the mere course of things. The revolution could not be well defended except by its originators. The convention was chiefly composed of constituents and members of the legislative assembly: she comprehended the men who had abolished the ancient feudal constitution on the 14th of July and the 4th of August, 1789, who had overturned the throne on the 10th of August, who had on the 21st of January sacrificed the head of the Bourbon dynasty, and who had for three years been making unparalleled efforts against all Europe to maintain their institution; they alone were capable of effectually defending the revolution, now rendered durable in the directorial constitution. Thus, without ostentatiously priding themselves upon a vain disinterestedness, they decreed on the 5th Fructidor (August 22nd), that the new legislative body should be composed of two-thirds of the convention, and that no more than a new third should be elected. The question was to ascertain whether the convention should herself designate the two-thirds to be retained, or whether she would permit that duty to devolve upon the electoral assemblies. After a tremendous dispute, it was agreed on the 13th Fructidor (August 30th), that the electoral assemblies should undertake this selection. It was settled that the primary assemblies should meet on the 20th Fructidor (September 6), to accept the constitution as well as the two decrees of the 5th and the 13th Fructidor. Moreover, it was decreed, that after having given their votes upon the constitution and the decrees, the primary assemblies should again meet and should at once make, that is to say in the year III. (1795) the elections for the 1st Prairial in the following year. The convention by this announced her intention of resigning the dictatorship, and of putting the constitution into operation. She decreed also that the armies, although ordinarily deprived of the right of deliberating, should nevertheless assemble on the field of battle they should then occupy, for the purpose of voting the constitution. It was but proper, it was said, that those who had to defend the constitution should also be allowed to assent thereto. This was giving the armies an interest in the revolution by their very vote.

These resolutions had been hardly adopted before the enemies of the convention, so numerous and so diverse, discovered how deeply they were mortified by them. The greatest part of them cared but little about the constitution. Any constitution whatever would have suited them, provided it allowed a general renewal of all the members of the government. The royalists wished for this renewal, to produce disturbance, to bring together the greatest possible number of persons of their choice, and to make the republic herself subservient to the cause of royalty; they wished for this renewal, more especially in order to get rid of the conventionalists, so deeply interested in opposing counter-revolution, and to bring forward new men, inexperienced, not compromised, and more easy to be led. Many literary characters, writers, unknown persons eager to start upon the career of politics, not from a spirit of counter-revolution, but from personal ambition, were also desirous of this complete renewal, so as to have a greater number of places open for them to occupy. Both the one and the other dispersed themselves among the sections, and excited them against the decrees.

The convention, they said, wanted to keep herself for ever in power; she talked of the rights of the people, and yet postponed the exercise of them for an indefinite period; she arbitrarily settled their election, and would not permit them to prefer the men who had remained unspotted from crime; she wanted to retain by force a majority composed of men who had covered France with scaffolds. Thus, added they, the new legislature would not be freed from the terrorists; thus it was that France would not be perfectly assured in respect of her future state, and could not rest in the assurance of never witnessing the revival of a horrible system. These declamations had their effect upon the minds of the many: the entire of the trading community of the sections, who were content with the new institutions such as they were given to them, but who had an excessive dread of the return of terror; sincere but unreflecting men, who dreamt of a faultless republic, and who desired to place a new and spotless generation in power; young men enamoured of the same chimeras, the imaginations of many captivated with novelty, saw with the most lively regret the convention thus keep itself on foot for two or three years. The tribe of newspaper writers was in commotion. A great number of men who possessed some consideration in literature, and who had figured in the former assemblies, appeared in the tribunes of the sections. MM. Suard, Morellet, Lacretelle junior, Fievée, Vanblanc, Pastoret, Dupont de Nemours, Quatremère de Quincy, Delalot, the fiery convert Laharpe, general Miranda, who had escaped from the prisons in which he had been confined for his conduct at Neerwinden, the Spaniard Marchenna, withdrawn from the proscription of his friends the Girondists, and Lemaitre, the head of the royalist agency, distinguished themselves by pamphlets or by vehement speeches in the sections: the dissatisfaction was universal.

The plan to be pursued was quite simple; it was merely to accept the constitution, and reject the decrees. This was what was proposed to be done in Paris, and what all the sections in France were exhorted to do also. But the intriguers who agitated the sections, and who wished to urge opposition forward to insurrection, desired a more complicated plan. Their object was that the primary assemblies, after they had accepted the constitution, and rejected the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, should make themselves permanent; that they should declare the powers of the convention expired, and the electoral assemblies free to choose their deputies from wheresoever they pleased; lastly, that they should not consent to separate till after the installation of the new legislative body. The agents of Lemaitre acquainted the environs of Paris with this plan; they wrote to Normandy, where there was great intriguing in favour of the constitution of 1791, to Brittany, to the Gironde, and to every quarter with which they had correspondences. One of their letters was seized and made public from the tribune. The convention saw without alarm the preparations making against her, and awaited with calmness the decision of the primary assemblies of all France, certain that the majority would declare itself in her favour. Nevertheless, suspecting the intention of a new conflict, she ordered some troops to

in his head, and he was not a man to sacrifice it. He came, therefore, to propose it in his own name, and apart from the commission. The assembly, out of respect for his genius, were willing enough to hear him, but did not adopt his draught of a constitution. We shall see it brought forward on a subsequent occasion, and it will then be time to make the reader acquainted with that conception, an event in the history of the human understanding. That which was adopted kept pace with the progress the public mind had made. In 1791, men were yet such novices, and so good-natured withal, that they could not conceive the existence of an aristocratic body controlling the will of the national representation, and they had nevertheless admitted and retained with respect, nay, almost with affection, the royal power. On reflexion, however, they would have seen that an aristocratic body belongs to all countries, and that it is more particularly adapted to republics; that a great state may do very well without a king, but never without a senate. In 1795 they had just witnessed the disorders to which a single assembly is exposed, and they consented to the establishment of a legislative body divided into two assemblies; they were then less irritated against aristocracy than against royalty, because, in fact, they dreaded the latter still more. Accordingly they took greater care to protect themselves against it in the formation of an executive power. There was in the commission a monarchical party, consisting of Lesage, Lanjuinais, Durand-Maillane, and Boissy d'Anglas. This party proposed a president; it was refused. "Some day, perhaps," said Louvet, "they will appoint a Bourbon." Baudin (of the Ardennes) and Daunou proposed two consuls; others wanted three. The preference was given to five directors, deciding by a majority. There was not imparted to this executive power any one of the essential prerogatives of royalty, such as inviolability, the sanction of the laws, the judicial power, or the right of peace and war. It possessed the mere inviolability of the deputies, the promulgation and the execution of the laws, the conduct but not the voting of war, and the negotiation and not the ratification of treaties.

Such was the basis on which the directorial constitution was founded. The assembly in consequence decreed:

A council called the Five Hundred, composed of five hundred members, of at least thirty years of age, having solely the right of proposing laws, renewing itself as to one-third of its members every year;

A council called the Ancients, composed of two hundred and fifty members, of at least forty years of age, all either widowers or married, having the power to give the final assent (sancion) to laws, renewing itself also by one-third;

Lastly, An executive Directory, composed of five members, deciding by a majority, renewing itself annually by one-fifth, possessing responsible ministers, promulgating the laws and enforcing their execution, having the disposal of the land and naval forces, the foreign affairs, the authority of repelling the first hostilities, but not the power to make war without the consent of the legislative body, negotiating treaties and submitting them to the ratification of the legislative body, excepting secret articles, which it should have the authority to stipulate, provided they were not inconsistent with or repugnant to the open articles.

All citizens of the age of twenty-one years were to meet as of right in primary assembly on every first day of the month of Prairial and nominate electoral assemblies. These electoral assemblies were to meet every 20th Prairial, and nominate the two councils; and the two councils to nominate the directory. It was considered that the executive power, being nominated by the legislative power, would be more dependent upon it; it was thus settled by a reason deduced from circumstances. The republic being not as yet identified with the ordinary feelings of France, and being rather an opinion of men who had gained experience, or else persons compromised in the revolution, than a general sentiment, it was not considered expedient to entrust the formation of the executive power to the masses. It was considered therefore, that in the first years especially, the authors of the revolution, who would naturally predominate in the legislative body, would choose directors well fitted for the defence of their own production.

The judicial authority was committed to elective judges. Justices of the peace were instituted. A civil tribunal was established in each department, trying as a court of the first instance the causes of the department, and in appeal those of the contiguous departments. There was added a criminal court, composed of five judges and a jury.

There were to be no communal assemblies, but municipal and departmental administrations, composed of three, five, or more members, according to the population; they were to be formed by way of election. Experience caused the adoption of minor and also more important arrangements. Thus the legislative body itself designated its seat, and might transfer it to the commune it chose to select. No law could be discussed without three previous readings, unless it were considered to be an emergent measure, and acknowledged as such by the council of the ancients. This was a method of preventing those very sudden resolutions, so speedily rescinded, which the convention had so frequently taken. Lastly, every society calling itself popular, holding its sittings in public, with secretary, tribunes, and corresponding societies in connection with it, was prohibited. The press was entirely free; the emigrants were banished for ever from the territory of the republic; the national domains were irrevocably secured to the purchasers; all religions were declared tolerated, although not recognized or paid by the state.

Such was the constitution by which it was hoped to maintain France as a republic. One important question presented itself: the constituent assembly, from an ostentation of disinterestedness, had excluded itself from the new legislative body, who became its substitute; would the convention do the same? One of their letters was seized and made public from the tribune. The convention saw without alarm the preparations making against her, and awaited with calmness the decision of the primary assemblies of all France, certain that the majority would declare itself in her favour. Nevertheless, suspecting the intention of a new conflict, she ordered some troops to

The section of Lepelletier, formerly Saint-Thomas, could not fail to distinguish itself on this occasion: this section came with those of the Mail, the Butte-des-Moulins, the Champs-Élysées, and the Theatre-Français (the Odéon), to address petitions to the assembly. They all concurred in asking whether the Parisians had done any thing to cause a forfeiture of her regard, or whether she had her misgivings concerning them to induce them to call in the military; they complained of the alleged violence committed against their election, and made use of these insolent expressions: "Make yourself worthy of our choice, and do not control it." The convention replied in a firm manner to all these addresses, and merely said that she awaited with respect the manifestation of the national will, that she would submit thereto so soon as it should be known, and that she would also compel every one else to submit themselves to the same authority.

What the people most desired was, to establish a central point for communicating with all the sections, so as to impart to them one common impulsive movement, and thus to organize the insurrection. They had sufficient precedents before their eyes to know that this was the first thing to be considered. The section of Lepelletier constituted itself the centre; it had a right to this honour, for it had always been the most ardent. This section commenced by publishing an act of indemnity, as ill-judged as it was worthless. The powers of the constituent body, it said, ceased their action when the sovereign people were present; the primary assemblies represented the sovereign people; the primary assemblies had a right to express any opinion whatever concerning the constitution and the decrees; they were under the safeguard of each other; and they owed to one another the reciprocal guarantee of their independence. Nobody could deny this, saving one qualification which it was necessary to add to these maxims; namely, that the constituent body retained its powers till the decision of the majority was known. Moreover, these idle expressions, which really had nothing to do with the subject, were but a means for arriving at some other conclusion. The section of Lepelletier proposed to the forty-eight sections of Paris to nominate each of them a commissioner, to express the sentiments of the citizens of the capital upon the constitution and the decrees. Here commenced the infraction of the laws; for the primary assemblies were forbidden to communicate with, and to send commissioners or addresses to one another. The convention quashed the resolution, and declared that it should consider its execution as an attempt upon the public safety.

The sections being not yet sufficiently emboldened gave way, and set about collecting the votes on the constitution and the decrees. They began by expelling, without any legal form, the patriots who came to vote as one of their body. In some, they were merely put outside the hall-door; in others, it was notified to them by placards that they had better stay at home, for if they made their appearance at the section, they would be ignominiously expelled. The individuals thus deprived of the exercise of their rights were very numerous; they thronged to the convention to appeal against the violence that was done them. The convention disapproved of the conduct of the sections, but refused to interfere, that she might not appear to canvass for votes, and that the very abuse might prove the freedom of the deliberation. The patriots, driven from their sections, had sought refuge in the galleries of the convention; they occupied them in great numbers, and daily solicited the committees to restore their arms, declaring that they were ready to use them in defence of the republic.

All the sections of Paris, excepting the Quinze-Vingts, accepted the constitution and rejected the decrees. It was by no means the same in the rest of France. The opposition, as it always happens, was less violent in the provinces than in the capital. The royalists, the intriguers, and the ambitious men who had an interest in pressing for the renewal of the legislative body and the government, possessed no numerical strength save at Paris; accordingly, in the provinces, the assemblies were orderly, although perfectly free; they adopted the constitution almost unanimously, and the decrees by a great majority. As for the armies, they received the constitution with enthusiasm in Brittany and La Vendée, at the Alps, and on the Rhine. They were filled with men devoted to the revolution, and attached to her by the very sacrifices which they had made on her account. The inveterate hatred that was manifested in Paris against the revolutionary government was wholly unknown in the armies. The requisitionists of 1793, of whom they were chiefly composed, cherished the glorious memory of that famous committee, who had maintained and subsisted them so far better than the new government. Separated from private life, accustomed to defy hardships and death, supported by glory and the bubble reputation, they still possessed that enthusiasm which in the interior of France had begun to disperse; they were proud of calling themselves the soldiers of a republic whom they had defended against all the kings of Europe, and who was, in some measure, their production. The army of the Sambre and Meuse, commanded by Jourdan, shared the noble sentiments of its brave chief. It was this army who had been conqueror at Watignies, and raised the blockade of Maubeuge; this was the army who had conquered at Fleurus, and given Belgium to France; in short, it was this army who, by the victories of the Ourthe and the Roer, had just given to France the line of the Rhine. This army who deserved so well of the republic, was also the most attached to her. This army, after recently crossing the Rhine, halted on the field of battle, and sixty thousand men were seen accepting at once the new republican constitution.

These tidings arriving in due course at Paris, rejoined the convention, and deeply mortified the sectionists. Every day they came to present addresses, wherein they declared the vote of their assembly, and announced with insulting joy that the constitution was accepted, and the decrees were rejected. The patriots, closely packed in the galleries, groaned; but presently the reports sent by the departments were read, almost all announced the acceptance of the constitution and of the decrees. The patriots then launched forth into most vociferrous applause, and by their peals of gladness netted the petitioners of the sections seated at the bar. The latter end of Fructidor was spent in scenes of this nature. At length, on the first Vendémiaire, year IV. (September 23, 1795,) the general result of the votes was proclaimed.

The constitution was accepted by the almost unanimous assent of the votes, and the decrees by an immense majority. Some thousands of votes, however, had been given against the decrees, and here and there some few had ventured to demand a king: this was of itself a sufficient proof that the utmost freedom had prevailed in the primary assemblies. On the same day, the convention solemnly declared that the constitution and the decrees were laws of the state. This declaration was followed by prolonged cheering. The convention next decreed that the primary assemblies who had not yet named their electors should finish their nomination before the 10th Vendémiaire (October 2); that the electoral assemblies should meet on the 20th, and conclude their operations at latest by the 29th (October 21); and lastly, that the new legislative body should meet on the 15th Brumaire (November 6.)

The sectionists were thunder-struck at this intelligence. They had hopes up to the last moment that France would give a vote similar to that of Paris, and that they should be delivered from what they called the two thirds; but the last decree deprived them entirely of hope. Affecting to believe that there had not been a correct casting up of the votes, they sent commissioners to the committee of decrees to verify the returns. This insolent application was not unfavourably received. The committee consented to show them the returns, and to allow them to cast up the votes; they found them correct. After they had no longer this unlucky objection of a mistake in casting up, or a wilful error, they had nothing left for it but insurrection. But this was a violent determination, and could not readily be resolved upon. The ambitious parties who wanted the removal of the men of the revolution, that they might take their place in the republican government; the young men, who were anxious to display their courage, and who most of them had served in the army; and lastly, the royalists, who had no other resource than an attack by main force, could cheerfully expose themselves to the chance of a battle; but that mass of peaceable individuals, drawn in to figure in the sections from fear of the terrorists rather than from political courage, felt considerable difficulty in making up their minds. In the first place, the insurrection was not in accordance with their principles. How, in fact, could the enemies of anarchy attack the established and recognized authority? The parties, it is true, did not trouble themselves much as to inconsistencies: but how could tradesmen, who had never been out of their shops or their counting-houses, dare to attack troops of the line, provided with cannon? However, the intriguing royalists and the ambitious thrust themselves into the sections, talked of public benefit and honour, said that there was no safety in being governed any longer by conventionalists, that they should be always exposed to terrorism; that, besides, it was disgraceful to give in, and to suffer themselves to be trampled upon. They appealed to their self-conceit. The young men who had come back from the armies blustered a great deal, hurried the timid along, and prevented them from openly expressing their apprehensions; and every preparation was made for a decisive stroke. Groups of young men paraded the streets, shouting, Down with the two thirds! When the soldiers of the convention attempted to disperse them, and to prevent them from uttering seditious cries, they replied with a volley of musketry. There were different riots, and considerable firing even in the middle of the Palais Royal.

Lemaitre and his colleagues, perceiving the success of their plans, had brought several Chouan chiefs and a certain number of emigrants to Paris; they kept them concealed, and were only waiting for the first signal to make them appear. They had succeeded in exciting commotions at Orleans, Chartres, Dreux, Verneuil, and Nonancourt. At Chartres, a representative, Letellier, being unable to quell a riot, had blown out his brains. Although these disturbances had been repressed, any advantage obtained in Paris might induce a general movement. Nothing was omitted that had such a tendency, and very shortly the success of the conspirators appeared complete.

The plan of the insurrection had not been yet determined upon; but the honest tradesmen of Paris suffered themselves by degrees to be led away by the young men and the intriguers. Proceeding from bravado to bravado, they soon found themselves inextricably involved. The section of Lepelletier was always the most agitated. The first thing to be done, before consulting as to any attempt, was, as we have observed, to establish a central management. They had long been considering how this could be done. It was thought that the assembly of the electors, chosen by all the primary assemblies of Paris, might become the central authority; but, according to the late decree, this assembly was not to meet before the 20th, and they had no inclination to wait so long. The section of Lepelletier then devised a resolution, based on a very extraordinary reason. The constitution, it said, interposed no greater an interval than twenty days between the meeting of the primary assemblies and that of the electoral assemblies. The primary assemblies had met on this one occasion on the 20th Fructidor, the electoral assemblies therefore ought to meet on the 10th Vendémiaire. Now the convention had fixed this meeting for the 20th; but that was evidently done for the purpose of still longer postponing the carrying of the constitution into effect, and the distribution of power among the new third. Consequently, and in order to protect the rights of the citizens, the section of Lepelletier passed a resolution that the electors already nominated should meet forthwith; the section communicated this resolution to the other sections, in order to obtain their approval. It was approved by several of them. The meeting was fixed for the 11th, at the Théâtre-Français (the Odéon).

On the 11th Vendémiaire (October 3), a party of the electors met in the theatre, under the protection of some battalions of the national guard. A multitude of inquisitive persons collected in the Place de l'Odéon, and soon formed a considerable concourse. The committees of general safety and public welfare, and the three representatives, who, since the 4th Prairial, had retained the direction of the armed force, always met together upon important occasions. They hastened to the convention to give information respecting this first step, which evidently denoted some insurrectional design. The convention had met to hold a funeral solemnity in the hall of session in honour of the unfortunate Girondists. A motion was made to postpone the ceremony; Tallien opposed it; he said that it would be unworthy of the assembly to permit an interruption, and that the assembly ought to attend to its accustomed duties amidst all dangers. A decree was issued purporting to be an order for the dispersion of any meeting of electors formed illegally, or before the lawful time, or for a purpose foreign to its electoral functions. To encourage those who might feel disposed to withdraw, it was added to the decree, that all those who had been drawn into illegal proceedings, and who should return immediately to their duty, should be saved from prosecution. Instantly some police officers, escorted by no more than six dragoons, were despatched to the Place de L'Odéon to proclaim the decree. The committees were anxious to avoid as much as possible strong measures. The crowd had increased at the Odéon, particularly towards night. The interior of the theatre was badly lighted: a multitude of sectionists filled the boxes; those who took an active part in the incidents were walking about on the stage in an agitated manner. They durst neither discuss or settle a single thing. On learning the arrival of the officers ordered to read the decree, all ran out to the Place de L'Odéon. The mob already surrounded them; it rushed upon them, extinguished the torches they bore, and compelled the dragoons to run away. They then went back into the theatre, congratulating themselves on this advantage; they made speeches; they took an oath to defend themselves against tyranny, but no measure was taken in support of the decisive step they had just then taken. The night advanced, many of those who were attracted by curiosity and the sectionists withdrew: the theatre got gradually thinner, and ended by being entirely abandoned on the approach of the armed force that soon came up. In point of fact, the committees had ordered general Menou, appointed since the 4th Prairial commander-in-chief of the army of the interior, to cause a column from the camp of Sablons to advance. This column came up with two pieces of cannon, and found not a soul either on the place or in the theatre of the Odéon.

This scene, though without result, had nevertheless produced a great sensation. The sectionists had been trying their strength, and had mustered some courage, as is always the case after a first extravagance. The convention and her partisans had beheld with dismay the occurrences of that day, and more ready to give credit to their adversaries for designs, than their adversaries were to form them, they had no longer any doubt of the insurrection. The patriots, dissatisfied with the convention, who had treated them so roughly, but who in the plenitude of their ardour felt that they ought to sacrifice their resentments to their cause, that very same night ran in crowds to the committees to offer their services and to apply for arms. Some had been let out of the prisons only on the preceding day, others had just been excluded from the primary assemblies: all of them had the strongest reason for their zeal. To these were joined a great number of officers struck out of the army list by Aubry, the reactionist. The Thermidorians constantly predominating in the committees, and entirely reconciled with the Mountain, did not hesitate to accept the offers of the patriots. Their opinion was supported by more than one Girondist. Louvet, at one of the meetings that had taken place at the house of a common friend of the Girondist and the Thermidorians, had already proposed to arm the faubourgs again, and even to let loose the Jacobins once more; but yet to imprison them again, should such a course become necessary. They no longer hesitated to deliver arms to all the citizens who applied for them; and they gave them for their officers those who were at the moment in Paris unattached; the old and brave general Berruyer was appointed to command them. This arming took place on the same morning of the 12th. The news of this spread immediately through all the quarters of Paris. This was an excellent pretext for the agitators of the sections, whose object was to compromise the peaceful citizens of Paris. The convention meant, they said, to renew the reign of terror; she had just been arming the terrorists again; she was about to let them loose upon quiet peaceable folk; property and person were no longer safe; they must have resort to arms to defend themselves. In fact, the sections of Lepelletier, the Butte-des-Moulins, the Contrat-Social, the Theatre-Français, the Luxembourg, the Rue Poissonnière, Brutus, and the Temple, declared themselves in rebellion, beat the generals in their quarters, and enjoined all the citizens of the national guard to join their battalions and to maintain the public safety, threatened by the terrorists. The section of Lepelletier made its sittings permanent, and became the centre of all the counter-revolutionary intrigues. The drums and the speech-makers of the sections dispersed themselves throughout Paris with singular audacity, and gave the signal for a general rising. The citizens, thus excited by the reports that were circulated, repaired in arms to their sections, ready to comply with all the suggestions of an imprudent youth and perfidious faction.

The convention immediately declared her sittings permanent, and enjoined her committees to watch over the public safety and provide for the execution of her decrees. She repealed the law that enjoined the disarming of the patriots, and thus legalized the measures adopted by her committees; but at the same time she issued a proclamation to tranquillize the inhabitants of Paris, and to give them confidence in her intentions, and in the patriotism of the men to whom she had just restored their arms.

The committees, seeing that the section of Lepelletier was becoming the focus of all intrigues, and that it would probably soon be the headquarters of the rebels, determined that this section should be surrounded and disarmed that very day. Menou again received orders to leave Sablons with a regiment of troops and cannon. This general Menou, a good officer, a kind-hearted and moderate citizen, had experienced a very troubled and laborious life during the revolution. Ordered to fight in La Vendée, he had been made the butt of all the annoyances of the Ronsin party. Taken to Paris, and threatened with a trial, nothing but the events of the 9th Thermidor saved his life. Appointed general of the army of the interior the 4th Prairial, and ordered to march to the faubourgs, he had then had to fight men who were his natural enemies, who were moreover condemned by public opinion, who in fact, by their energy troubled themselves too little about sacrificing the lives of others for any one to be very scrupulous about sacrificing theirs; but on this occasion it was the flower of the capital, it was the youth of the best families, it was in short the class that dictates public opinion, that he had to fire upon with grape shot, if it would persist in its imprudent course. He was therefore in a cruel perplexity, as the weak man almost always is, who knows not either to resign his place, or make up his mind to execute his orders. He set his columns in motion very late; he let the sections proclaim whatever they liked during the whole day of the 12th; he then began secretly to parley with some of their leaders instead of doing his duty; he even declared to the three representatives to whom the direction of the armed force was confided, that he would not have the battalion of the patriots under his command. The representatives replied that this battalion was under the exclusive command of general Berruyer. They urged him to put himself in motion, without yet reporting his delay and want of firmness to the two committees. They observed, moreover, the like repugnance in more than one officer, and among others in the two generals of brigade, Despierrre and Debar, who pretending illness, were not at their posts. At length, towards night, Menou advanced, with Laporte, the representative, upon the section of Lepelletier. It was sitting at the convent of the Filles-Saint-Thomas, which has since given place to the handsome edifice of the exchange. Menou repaired thither by the Rue Vivienne. He packed his infantry, his cavalry, and his artillery, all together in that street, and placed himself in a position, where he could have hardly fought at all, encompassed by the multitude of the sectionists, who closed all the outlets, and who filled the windows of the houses. Menou drew his cannon before the door of the convent, and entered with Laporte and a battalion into the very hall of the section. The members of the section, instead of forming a deliberative assembly, were armed and ranged in line, having their president at their head; this was M. Delalot. The general and the representative summoned them to surrender their arms; which they refused to do. The president Delalot, observing the hesitation with which this summons was made, replied thereto with warmth, addressed Menou's soldiers with some neatness and great presence of mind, and declared that before they should deprive the section of their arms they must proceed to the last extremities. To fight in so narrow a space, or to retire for the purpose of battering the hall with cannon, was a most painful alternative. However, had Menou spoken with firmness and pointed his guns, it is doubtful whether the resolution of the sectionists would have held out so long. Menou and Laporte would rather have had a capitulation; they promised to withdraw the troops of the convention, on condition that the section would immediately disperse. The section either promised, or pretended to promise; a party from the battalion filed off as if for the purpose of retiring. Menou, on his part, went away with his troops, and suddenly withdrew his columns, who had great difficulty to pass through the crowd that choked the neighbouring wards. While he had the weakness to retreat before the firmness of the section of Lepelletier, the latter had returned to the place of its meetings, and, proud of its resistance, was still further confirmed in its rebellion. A report instantly gained ground that the decrees were not executed, that the insurrection remained victorious, that the troops were returning without asserting the supremacy of the convention. A multitude of the witnesses of this scene hastened to the tribune of the assembly, whose sittings were then permanent, and gave intelligence to the deputies, when on all sides was heard, We are betrayed! we are betrayed! call general Menou to the bar! The committees were directed to attend and explain how matters really were.

At this moment, the committees, informed of what had just taken place, were in the greatest agitation. They were for arresting Menou and trying him immediately. That, however, would not have helped the matter; what was wanted was to make up for what he had omitted to do; but forty members, discussing what was best to be done, were not the likeliest persons to be all of them of the same opinion, and to act with the necessary vigour and precision. Neither were the three representatives commissioned to manage and conduct the armed force a sufficiently energetic authority. They considered as to the appointment of a chief, as on all decisive occasions; and at that moment, which was associated in their minds with all the dangers of Thermidor, the assembly turned its attention to the deputy Barras, who, as general of brigade, had been invested with the command of that famous day, and had acquitted himself with all the energy that could be desired. The deputy Barras was of a tall stature, and strong voice, was incapable of long speeches, but was excellent in the ready application of a few energetic and vehement expressions, conveying the idea of a resolute and devoted man. He was appointed general of the army of the interior, and they gave him as adjuncts the three representatives who had before his appointment been commissioned with the management and direction of the armed force. A single circumstance rendered this selection a most fortunate one. Barras had about him an officer very capable of taking a command, and he was not subject to that narrowness of mind which would throw into the shade a man more able than himself. All the deputies sent on mission to the army of Italy were acquainted with the young officer of artillery who had determined the reduction of Toulon, and had conquered Saorgo, and the lines of the Roya. This young officer, now become a general of brigade, had been discharged by Aubry, and he was in Paris without employment, and reduced almost to indigence. He had been introduced to Madame Tallien, who had received him with her wonted kindness, and even used her interest in his behalf. His person was attenuated, and by no means tall, and his cheeks were hollow and livid; but his fine features, his fixed and piercing eyes, and his firm and original language, attracted notice. Often did he speak of a decisive theatre of war, where the republic would obtain victories and peace: that was Italy. He was constantly harping on this. Then it was, when the lines of the Apennines were lost under Kellermann, that the committee sent for him to ask his opinion. From that time he was employed in writing dispatches, and remained attached to the official management of the military operations. Barras thought of him in the night of the 12th Vendémiaire; he called for him to be second in command, and this was accorded. The two selections submitted the same night to the convention were instantly approved of. Barras confided the charge of the military arrangements to the young general, who immediately took them all upon himself, and set about giving orders with extreme activity.

The generale had continued to beat in all the quarters of Paris. Emissaries had gone about on all sides, bragging of the defence and the success of the section of Lepelletier, magnifying its dangers, persuading every body that these dangers were common to all the sections and affected their honour, and stirring them up to make themselves equal with the grenadiers of the quarter of Saint-Thomas. There had been a vast concourse from all parts, and a central and military committee had at length formed itself in the section of Lepelletier, under the presidency of the newspaper editor, Richer-Seiroy. The plan of an insurrection was settled, the battalions were formed, all irresolute persons were drawn in beyond receding, and the entire bourgeoisie of Paris, misled by a false point of honour, was about to play a part but little suited to its habits and its interests.

It was now too late to think of marching upon the section of Lepelletier, in order to strangle the insurrection in its birth. The convention had about five thousand troops of the line; had all the sections displayed the same zeal, they could have assembled forty thousand men, well armed and in good order; and it was not with five thousand men that the convention could cope with forty thousand, in the streets of a great capital. The utmost that could be expected, was to defend the convention, and to convert it into a camp well intrenched. This was what general Bonaparte intended. The sections were without cannon; they had given them all up since the 4th Prairial, and the most ardent of the present day had been the first to afford this example, to ensure the disarming of the faubourg Saint-Antoine. This was a great advantage for the convention. The entire park of artillery was at the camp of Sablons. Bonaparte immediately ordered Murat, a cavalry officer, to go and secure it at the head of three hundred horse. That officer arrived at the very time when a battalion of the section of Lepelletier was on its road to seize the park; he got thither before that battalion, put horses to the guns, and brought them to the Tuileries. Bonaparte next turned his attention to the defence of all the avenues. He had five thousand soldiers of the line, a troop of patriots, who, since the preceding day amounted to about fifteen hundred, some gendarmes of the tribunaux disarmed in Prairial and again armed on the present occasion, and lastly the police legion with some invalids, making altogether near eight thousand men. He distributed his artillery and his troops in the streets Cul de Sac, Dauphine, L'Echelle, Rohan, Saint-Nicaise, on the Pont Neuf, Pont Royal, Pont Louis XVI., and in the Places Louis XV. and Vendome, in short, at all the points where the convention was exposed. He placed his regiment of cavalry and part of his infantry in reserve at the Carrousel, and in the garden of the Tuileries. He ordered all the provisions in Paris to be brought to the Tuileries, and a dépôt of ammunition and a temporary hospital for the wounded to be established there; he dispatched a detachment to secure the dépôt of Meudon, and to occupy the heights of that place, so as to secure a retreat thither with the convention in case of defeat; he blocked up the road to Saint-Germain, to prevent cannon from being brought to the insurgents; and conveyed chests of arms to the faubourg Saint-Antoine, to arm the section of the Quinze-Vingts, who had been the only one to vote for the decrees, and whose zeal Fréron had been sent to awaken. These arrangements were completed on the morning of the 13th. Orders were given to the republican troops to await the aggressive attack, and by no means to provoke it.

During this interval, the committee of insurrection established in the section of Lepelletier had likewise made its own arrangements. The section had outlawed the committees of government, and created a kind of tribunal for trying those who should deny the sovereignty of the sections. Several generals had come to offer their services. A Vendean, known by the name of count de Maulévrier, and a young emigrant, called Lafond, had issued from their hiding places to conduct the movement. Generals Duhoux and Damican, who had commanded the republican armies in La Vendée, were associated with them. Damican was a restless spirit, more capable of being a club orator than of commanding an army; he had been a friend of Hoche, who was frequently calling him to account for his inconsistencies. Being out of employ, he was in Paris, extremely dissatisfied with the government, and ready to enter upon the most mischievous designs; he was appointed commander-in-chief of the sections. A fight being resolved upon, and all the citizens being involved in spite of themselves, a sort of plan was formed. The sections of the faubourg Saint-Germain, under the command of count de Maulévrier, were to start from the Odéon, for the purpose of attacking the Tuileries by the bridges; the section of the right bank were to make the attack by the Rue Saint-Honoré, and by all the cross streets communicating between the Rue Saint-Honoré to the Tuileries. A detachment under the command of young Lafond was to secure the Pont-Neuf, so as to put the two divisions of the sectionist army in communication with each other. The young men who had served in the armies, and were most capable of standing fire, were placed at the head of the columns. Out of the forty thousand men of the national guard, twenty or twenty-seven thousand at most were present under arms. There was a much safer manœuvre than that of presenting themselves in deep columns to the fire of the batteries; this was to barricade the streets, and thus to confine the assembly and its troops to the Tuileries, to occupy the houses in the immediate neighbourhood, and from them keep up a destructive fire, to kill one by one the defenders of the convention, and thus soon reduce them by famine and musket balls. But the sectionists never looked to any thing else than a sudden and off-hand attack, and thought that by a single charge they should get to the palace and make it open the gates.

Early the same morning, the Poissonnière section stopped the artillery horses and the arms on their way to the section of the Quinze-Vingts; the section of Mont Blanc carried off the provisions intended for the Tuileries; and a detachment of the section of Lepelletier made itself master of the treasury. Young Lafond, at the head of the several companies, bore off in the direction of the Pont Neuf, while other battalions were coming by the Rue Dauphine. General Cartaux was directed to protect this bridge with four hundred men and four pieces of cannon. As he was by no means willing to come to an engagement, he withdrew to the quay of the Louvre. The battalions of the sections were coming in from all sides, to draw up within a few paces of the posts of the convention, and near enough to converse with the sentinels.

The troops of the convention would have had a great advantage in taking the initiative, and by making a brisk attack they would probably have thrown the assailants into disorder; but the generals had been recommended to wait for an aggressive attack. In consequence, notwithstanding the acts of hostility already committed, notwithstanding the capture of the artillery horses, notwithstanding the seizure of the provisions intended for the convention, as also of the arms sent to the Quinze-Vingts, and notwithstanding the death of an orderly hussar, killed in the Rue Saint-Honoré, they still kept to their instructions of not being the first to begin the attack.

The morning had been spent in preparations on the part of the sections, and in suspense on the part of the conventional army, when Danican, before he began the combat, thought it right to send a flag of truce to the committees to offer them terms. Barras and Bonaparte were visiting the posts, when the messenger was brought to them blindfolded, as if in a fortress. They caused him to be taken before the committees. The messenger expressed himself in a threatening tone, and offered peace on condition of disarming the patriots, and repealing the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor. Such terms could not be accepted, and besides, none whatever could be listened to. Nevertheless, the committees, although they had made up their minds not to answer, resolved to appoint twenty-four deputies to go and fraternize with the sections, an expedient that had frequently succeeded, for discourse has considerable influence when one is ready to come to blows, and every one readily concurs in an arrangement that spares the effusion of blood. In the mean time Danican, not receiving any answer, gave orders for the attack. A firing was heard, Bonaparte directed eight hundred muskets and cartouch boxes to be brought into one of the halls of the convention, for the purpose of arming the representatives themselves, who were to serve, in case of emergency, as a corps of reserve. This precaution made every one sensible of the whole extent of the danger. Each deputy hastened to take his place, and according to custom in time of peril, the assembly waited in the most profound silence the result of this combat, the first regular battle that she had yet fought with the rebellious factions.

It was now half-past four o'clock; Bonaparte, accompanied by Barras, mounted a horse in the court of the Tuileries, and hastened to the post of the cul-de-sac Dauphine, facing the church of Saint-Roch. The sectionist battalions filled the Rue Saint-Honoré, and were now close to the entrance of the cul-de-sac. One of their best battalions had posted itself on the steps of the church of Saint-Roch, and there it was placed in an advantageous manner for firing upon the gunners of the convention. Bonaparte, who was capable of appreciating the advantage of the first blow, immediately directed his artillery to advance, and ordered a first discharge. The sectionists replied by a very sharp fire of musketry; but Bonaparte, showering down grape-shot upon them, obliged them to fall back upon the steps of Saint-Roch; he then immediately debouched in the Rue Saint-Honoré, and let loose upon the church itself a band of patriots who were fighting at his side with the greatest valour, and who had cruel wrongs to revenge. The sectionists, after a stout defence, were dislodged. Bonaparte, then turning his guns right and left, made them sweep the whole length of the Rue Saint-Honoré. The assailants instantly fled on all sides, and retired in the greatest disorder. Bonaparte then committed to an officer the duty of keeping up the firing and making the defeat certain; he next went up to the Carrousel, and hastened to the other posts. Every where he caused grape-shot to be fired, and every where he witnessed these unfortunate sectionists, imprudently exposed in deep columns to the effect of the artillery, take to flight. The sectionists, though they had very brave men at the head of their columns, fled with the utmost precipitation towards the head-quarters of the Filles-Saint-Thomas. Danican and the officers then discovered the blunder they had committed in marching upon the guns, instead of barricading the streets and planting themselves in the houses adjoining the Tuileries. Still they were not discouraged, and they resolved upon a fresh attack. They conceived the idea of joining with the columns coming from the faubourg Saint-Germain to make a general attack upon the bridges. Accordingly, they rallied a column of from six to eight thousand men, directed them towards the Pont Neuf, where Lafond was posted with his regiment, and fell in with the battalions coming from the Rue Dauphine, under the command of the count de Maulevrier. All advanced together in close column from the Pont Neuf to the Pont Royal along the Quai Voltaire. Bonaparte, present wherever danger required him, lost no time in getting to these places. He placed several batteries on the quay of the Tuileries, which is parallel with the Quai Voltaire, and advanced the cannon placed at the head of the Pont Royal, and caused them to be pointed in such a manner as to enfilade the quay by which the assailants were coming. Having taken these precautions, he suffered the sectionists to approach; then all at once he gave orders to fire. A shower of grape from the bridge met the sectionists in front, another from the quay of the Tuileries took them obliquely, and carried terror and destruction into their ranks. Young Lafond, in the height of his bravery, rallied around him the steadiest of his men, and again marched upon the bridge in order to take the guns. An increased fire drove back his column. He endeavoured in vain to bring it up a third time; it fled, and was dispersed under the fire of a well-directed artillery.

At six o'clock, the battle that had begun at half-past four was won. Then Bonaparte, who had displayed a merciless energy in the action, and had fired upon the population of the capital, just as he would have done upon Austrian battalions, gave orders to charge the guns with powder, to still further drive the insurgents from before him. Some few sectionists had intrenched themselves in the Place Vendôme, in the church of Saint-Roch, and in the Palais Royal; he made his troops débouché by all the avenues of the Rue Saint-Honoré, and detached a corps which proceeding from the Place Louis XV., crossed through the Rue Royale and along by the boulevards. He thus swept the Place Vendôme, cleared the church of Saint-Roch, invested the Palais Royal, and blockaded it to avoid a battle in the night.

Next morning a few musket shots were quite sufficient to cause the evacuation of the Palais Royal and the section of Lepelletier, where the rebels had designed to entrench themselves. Bonaparte caused some barricades formed near the Barrière des Sergens to be removed, and a detachment bringing cannon from Saint-Germain to the sectionists to be stopped. Tranquillity was completely restored on the 14th. The dead were immediately carried away, in order to remove all traces of this combat. There had been on one side and the other from three to four hundred killed and wounded.

This victory gave great joy to all the sincere friends of the republic, who could not help recognizing in this movement the influence of royalism. This victory restored to the jeopardized convention, that is, to the revolution and its originators, the authority they needed for the settlement of the new institutions. Nevertheless, the general feeling was, that the advantages of this victory should not be too severely pressed. Every one was ready enough to accuse the convention of one thing, and that was, that it had fought only in behalf of terrorism, and with the intention of re-establishing it. It was of great consequence that the imputation of a desire to shed blood should be done away with. In other respects the sectionists on their part proved themselves very inept conspirators, and that they were far from possessing the energy of the patriots; they had lost no time in returning to their homes, satisfied at having got off so cheap, and proud of having defied for a moment those guns which had so often broken the lines of Brunswick and Coburg. Provided they were allowed to extol their courage among themselves, they were no longer dangerous. Consequently the convention contented herself with discharging the staff of the national guard, disbanding the companies of grenadiers and light infantry, which were far better disciplined, and contained almost all the young men with double queues, putting the national guard for the future under the direction of the general commanding the army of the interior, ordering the sections of Lepelletier and the Théâtre François to be disarmed, and with issuing three commissions for trying the leaders of the rebellion, who, however, had almost all of them disappeared.

The companies of grenadiers and light infantry suffered themselves to be disbanded; the two sections of Lepelletier and Théâtre François delivered up their arms without resistance: all, in short, submitted. The committees, adopting these views of forbearance, either connived at the escape of the guilty, or allowed them to remain in Paris, where they could scarcely keep themselves concealed. The commissioners pronounced no sentences, except for contumacy. No more than one of the rebel leaders was apprehended, and this was young Lafond. He had excited some interest by his courage: there was a wish to save him, but he persisted in declaring himself an emigrant and in avowing his rebellion, so that it was impossible to pardon him. The forbearance exhibited was so great, that one of the members of the commission formed in the section of Lepelletier, M. de Castellane, meeting at night a patrol, who cried, "Who goes there?" replied, "Castellane, condemned for contumacy!" The consequences of the 13th Vendémiaire were therefore not sanguinary, and the capital in no degree shocked by them. The guilty kept themselves quiet, or walked about unmolested, and the withdrawing-rooms were exclusively occupied with the accounts of exploits which they ventured to avow. Without punishing those who had attacked her, the convention contented herself with rewarding those who had defended her; she declared that they had deserved well of their country; she voted them gratuities; and gave a brilliant reception to Barras and Bonaparte. Barras, already celebrated since the 9th Thermidor, became much more so by the conflicts of Vendémiaire; to him was attributed the salvation of the convention. However, he was not behindhand in allowing his young lieutenant a due share of the honour of the day. "It is General Bonaparte," said he, "whose prompt and skilful arrangements have saved all here." These words were applauded. Barras was confirmed in the command of the army in the interior, and Bonaparte made second in command.

The intriguing royalists felt themselves sadly out of their reckoning in witnessing the issue of the insurrection of the 13th. They lost no time in writing to Verona, that they had been deceived by every body; that money had been wanting; that where gold was necessary, they scarcely had old rags; that the monarchist deputies, those who had given them promises, had forfeited them, and played an infamous game; that it was a Jacobinical ruse, in whom no confidence should be placed; that unfortunately those who wished to serve the cause were not sufficiently compromised and involved; that the royalists of Paris, with green collars, black collars, and double queues, who ostentatiously displayed their bravadoes in the pit of the theatres, ran away at the first shot, and hid themselves under the beds of the women who kept them.

their leader, had just been apprehended together with the different instigators of the seizure of Lepelletier. There had been seized at his house a vast number of papers; the royalists were in apprehension that these papers would betray the secret of the plot, and above all, lest he should speak himself. Nevertheless, they were discouraged; their creatures continued to act along with the sectionists. The kind of impunity which the latter enjoyed had emboldened them. Inasmuch as the convention, although victorious, did not venture to strike a blow at them, she thereby recognized that public opinion was in their favour; she consequently was not morally convinced of the justice of her cause, since she hesitated. Although vanquished, they were more proud, and possessed greater moral elevation than herself; and they again made their appearance in the electoral assemblies, to promote elections in conformity with their aspirations. The assemblies were to constitute themselves on the 20th Vendémiaire, and to continue until the 30th; the new legislative body was to meet on the 5th Brumaire. At Paris the royalist agents procured the election of Saladin the conventionalist, whom they had already gained. In some of the departments they provoked quarrels, and some of the electoral assemblies were seen splitting and dividing themselves into two distinct parties.

These underhand contrivances, this recovered assurance, contributed greatly to exasperate the patriots, who had witnessed in the events of the 13th the verification of all their prognostics; they were proud both of having guessed rightly, and of having overcome by their courage the danger they had so correctly foreseen. They desired that the victory might not prove useless to themselves, that it should induce acts of severity against their adversaries, and indemnity for their friends confined in the prisons. They presented petitions, in which they prayed for the release of the detained patriots, the dismissal of the officers appointed by Aubry, the restoration to their official rank of those who had been dismissed, the trial of the imprisoned deputies, and their reinstatement in the electoral lists, if they were innocent. The Mountain, supported by the galleries, crowded with patriots, highly approved of these demands, and energetically claimed their adoption. Tallien, who had connected himself with the Mountain, and who was the civil chief of the ruling party, in the same way as Barras was its military chief,—Tallien strove to keep the Mountain within bounds; he caused the last demand relative to the reinstatement of the imprisoned deputies in the lists to be withdrawn, as contrary to the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor. Those decrees, in fact, declared the deputies who were then suspended from their functions ineligible. Nevertheless, the Mountain was not easier to govern than the sectionists; and the last days of that assembly, which had but one decade more to sit, seemed as if they could not elapse without a storm.

The intelligence from the frontiers also contributed to increase the agitation, by exciting the misgivings of the patriots and the inextinguishable hopes of the royalists. We have observed that Jourdan had crossed the Rhine at Dusseldorf, and advanced upon the Sieg; that Pichegru had entered

Manheim, and had rapidly despatched a force beyond the Rhine. Events so unexpected, who had not suggested any grand idea to that effect, who was so highly extolled, and herein he demonstrated either his perfidy or his incapacity. In ordinary reasoning his omissions should be imputed to his incapacity; for even with the desire to betray, no one ever rejects the opportunity of obtaining great victories; they always serve to enhance his price. Nevertheless, highly credible contemporaries have considered that Pichegru's false manoeuvres should be ascribed to treason: he is, therefore, the only general known in history who ever voluntarily caused himself to be defeated. It was not simply a regiment that he should have pushed on beyond Manheim, but his whole army, so as to have taken possession of Heidelberg, which is the most important point where the roads running from the Upper Rhine into the valleys of the Neckar and the Main cross one another. This would have been gaining the point by which Wurmser could have joined Clerfait; this would have been completely cutting off those two generals from each other; this would have been securing the point by which it was practicable to effect a junction with Jourdan, and to form with him a mass that would have successfully overwhelmed Clerfait and Wurmser. Clerfait, aware of the danger, quitted the banks of the Maine, and made the best of his way to Heidelberg; but his lieutenant, Kwasdanovich, assisted by Wurmser, had contrived to dislodge from Heidelberg the division that Pichegru had left there. Pichegru was shut up in Manheim; and Clerfait, relieved from all fear for his communications with Wurmser, had immediately marched upon Jourdan. The latter, cooped up between the Rhine and the line of neutrality, could not live there as in an enemy's country, and having no organized service for drawing his resources from the Netherlands, found himself, when he could neither march forward or join Pichegru, in one of the most critical positions possible. Moreover, Clerfait, disregarding the neutrality, had placed himself in such a manner as to turn his left, and to throw him back upon the Rhine. Jourdan, therefore, could not keep his ground there; it was therefore resolved by the representatives, with the assent of all the generals, that he should fall back on Mentz, and blockade it on the right bank. But this position would not be more advantageous than the preceding; it would leave him in the same want of necessities; it would expose him to the attacks of Clerfait in a disadvantageous situation, and would expose him to the chance of missing his road towards Dusseldorf; it was consequently decided that he should beat a retreat, for the purpose of regaining the Lower Rhine, which he did in good order, and without being annoyed by Clerfait, who, contemplating a grand design, returned to the Maine, so as to bring himself near to Mentz.

To this intelligence of the retrograde march of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, were added alarming reports in respect of the army of Italy. Schérer had arrived there with two fine divisions of the eastern Pyrenees, now rendered available by the peace with Spain; it was nevertheless said that this general did not feel sure of his position, and that he demanded more assistance than could be see his ingluance and supplies, which if he orders to fire, threatened to make a retrograde movement. Lastly, there was a report of a second English expedition, which was to bring count

D'Artois with a body of marines.

These news, which certainly contained nothing that could cause apprehensions so far as the existence of the republic was concerned, who being still mistress of the course of the Rhine, who had two more armies to send, the one to Italy, the other to La Vendée, and who recently had been enabled by the affair of Quiberon to fully appreciate the talents of Hoche, and not to fear the expeditions of the emigrants; these intelligences, nevertheless, did not a little contribute to rouse the royalists, terrified by Vendémiaire, and to exaspe-rate the patriots, by no means satisfied with the use that had been made of the victory. The discovery of the correspondence of Lemaitre, in particular, produced the most vexatious effects.
Every one discovered in it the whole of that plot which had been so long suspected; they were in possession of the fact that a secret agency had been established in Paris in communication with Verona, La Vendée, and every province in France, exciting counter-revolutionary movements there, and having correspondences with several members of the convention and the committees.
The very boasting of these paltry agents, who flattered themselves with having at one time gained over generals, at another time deputies, and who said they had connexions with monarchists and Thermidorians, contributed to excite still stronger suspicions, and to make them hover over the heads of the deputies of the right side.

The names of Rovère and Saladin had been already mentioned, and against them satisfactory evidence had been obtained. The latter had published a pamphlet against the decrees of the 5th and the 13th Fructidor, and had just been rewarded for it by the suffrages of the Parisian electors.
Lesage (of Eure and Loire), La Rivière, Boissyd'Anglas, and Lanjuinais, were also pointed out as secret accomplices of the royalist agency. Their silence on the 11th, 12th, and 13th Vendémiaire had greatly compromised them. The counter-revolutionary journals, by the affected terms in which they lauded these men, had aided in compromising them still more. These same papers, which so highly extolled the seventy-three, loaded the Thermidorians with abuse. It was scarcely possible that a rupture should not ensue. The seventy-three and the Thermidorians still continued to meet at the house of a mutual friend, but ill-temper and mistrust prevailed among them. Towards the latter end of the session, there was a conversation at this meeting concerning the recent elections, of the intrigues of royalism to influence them, and of the silence of Boissy, Lanjuinais, La Rivière, and Le-sage, during the scenes of Vendémiaire. Legendre, with his usual petulance, censured the silence of four deputies who were present. The latter strove to justify themselves. Lanjuinais dropped the very strange expression of Massacre of the 13th Vendémiaire, and thus demonstrated either extraordinary confusion of ideas, or sentiments any thing but republican. At this expression, Tallien flew into a violent passion, and would have gone away, saying that he could stay no longer with royalists, and that he would go and denounce convention. The others surrounded him to the

him, and endeavoured to palliate the ex-Lanjuinais. The party nevertheless bro-up on bad terms with each other.

Meanwhile the agitation went on increas-Paris. Mutual distrusts every where gained ground, and suspicions of royalism attached upon every one.
Tallien moved that the convention should form herself into a secret committee, and he formally denounced Lesage, La Rivière, Boissy-d'Anglas, and Lanjuinais. His proofs were not sufficient; they rested only upon mere matters of inducement, more or less probable, and the accusation was not supported. Louvet, although attached to the Thermidorians, did not support the charge against the four deputies, who were his friends; but he accused Rovère and Saladin, and painted their conduct in strong colours. He described their changes from the most outrageous terrorism to the most outrageous royalism, and caused a decree to be passed for their arrest. The convention likewise arrested L'Honnond, involved with Lemaitre, and Aubry, the author of the military reaction.

The adversaries of Tallien, by way of reprisal, called for the publication of a letter from the pre-tender to the duke of Harcourt, in which, speaking of what reached him from Paris, he said, I cannot bring myself to think that Tallien is a royalist of the right sort. It should be recollected, that the Paris agents flattered themselves that they had gained over Tal-lien and Hoche. Their habitual boasting, and their calumnies with respect to Hoche, were sufficient to justify Tallien. This letter produced but little effect, for Tallien, since the affair of Quiberon, and since his conduct in Vendémiaire, so far from passing for a royalist, was considered as a sanguinary terrorist. Thus, men who ought to have assisted heart and hand in protecting by their joint efforts a revolution which was their own work, mistrusted each other, and suffered themselves to be compromised, if not gained over by royalism. Thanks to the aspersions of the royalists, the last days of this illustrious assembly ended, as they had begun, in trouble and agitation.

Tallien lastly moved the appointment of a commission of five members, commissioned to propose efficacious measures for preserving the revolution during the transition from one government to another. The convention nominated Tallien, Dubois-Crancé, Florent Guyot, Roux (of La Marne), and Pons (of Verdun). The object of this commission was to anticipate the manoeuvres of the royalists in the elections, and to impart confidence to the republicans in regard to the formation of the new government. The Mountain, in its usual fervour, conceiving that this commission was about to realize all its aspirations, for a moment believed and spread the report, that the assembly was going to annul all the elections, and temporarily suspend the putting the constitution in force. The Mountain had in fact persuaded itself that the time had not arrived for leaving the republic to herself, that the royalists were not sufficiently weakened, and that there was a necessity for continuing the revolutionary government for some time longer, in order to completely reduce them. The counter-revolutionists affected to circulate the same reports. The deputy, Thihaudeau, who thus far had not gone along either with the Mountain or with the Thermidorians, or with the Monarchists, but who had nevertheless shown himself a sincere republican, and on whom thirty-two departments had just fixed their choice, because in electing him, they had the advantage of not declaring for any party, the deputy, Thibaudeau, could not be expected to distrust the state of public opinion so much as the Thermidorians. He thought that Tallien and his party calumniated the nation, in wanting to adopt so many precautions against the nation; he even supposed that Tallien harboured personal designs, and that he meant to place himself at the head of the Mountain, and to confer a dictatorship on himself under the semblance of preserving the republic from the royalists. He denounced in a virulent and bitter style this supposed design of dictatorship, and uttered an unexpected retort upon Tallien, at which the republicans were much surprised, because they could not comprehend its motive. This sally even compromised Thibaudeau in the opinion of the most mistrustful, and caused intentions that he never entertained to be ascribed to him. Although he reminded the assembly that he was a regicide, it was well known from the intercepted letters * that the death of Louis XVI. might be redeemed by important services rendered to his heirs, so that even this title of regicide no longer appeared to be a perfect guarantee for his conduct. Thus, notwithstanding he was a staunch republican, this sally against Tallien injured him in the estimation of the patriots, and gained him extraordinary praises from the royalists. They called him Barre-de-fer.†

The convention passed to the order of the day, and awaited the report of Tallien in the name of the commission of five. The result of the labours of this commission was the draught of a decree comprehending the following measures:—

The exclusion of all emigrants and relatives of emigrants from all functions, civil, municipal, legislative, judicial, and military, till the general peace; permission for all those who were not inclined to live under the laws of the republic to quit France and take their property with them; the dismissal of all officers who had not served during the revolutionary system, that is since the 10th of August, and who had been replaced since the 15th Germinal, that is since the operations of Aubry.

These arrangements were adopted. The convention then decreed in a solemn manner the union of Belgium with France, and its division into departments. At length, on the 4th Brumaire, at the moment of breaking up, she determined to finish her long and stormy career by a signal act of clemency. She decreed that the punishment of death should be abolished in the French republic, to commence from the time of the general peace; she changed the name of the Place de la Révolution into the Place de la Concorde; and lastly, she declared an amnesty for all acts connected with the revolution, excepting the revolt of the 13th Vendémiaire. This was the setting at liberty men of all parties, Lemaître excepted, who was the only one of the conspirators of Vendémiaire against whom sufficient evidence had been obtained. The sentence of transportation pronounced against Billaud-Varennes, Collet d'Herbois, and Barrère, which had been revoked for the purpose of trying them anew, that is, to cause them to be condemned to death, was confirmed. Barrère, who alone had not yet been put on board, was to be sent off. All the prisons were to be thrown open. At half-past two o'clock on the 4th Brumaire, year IV. (October 26th, 1795), the president of the convention uttered these words: "The National Convention declares that her mission is accomplished, and that her session is closed." Shouts, a thousand times repeated, of Vive la République! accompanied these closing words.

Thus terminated the long and memorable session of the national convention. The constituent assembly had the ancient feudal organization to destroy, and to lay the foundation of a new establishment; the legislative assembly had the testing of that establishment, in the face of the king who was allowed to remain as part of the convention. After a trial of some months, she discovered and declared the incompatibility of the king with the new institutions, and his identification with Europe as leagued against the assembly; she suspended the king and the constitution, and then resigned. The convention, therefore, found a dethroned king, an annulled constitution, war declared with Europe, and their sole resources consisting in an administration entirely destroyed, a paper money of no value, old thinned regiments worn out and empty. Thus it was not liberty that she had to proclaim in the presence of an enfeebled and despoiled throne, it was liberty she had to defend against all Europe; and this task was quite another affair. Without being for a moment intimidated, she proclaimed the republic in the face of the hostile armies; she then sacrificed the king, to cut herself off from all retreat; she next took all the powers into her own hands, and constituted herself a dictatorship. When voices were raised in her presence who spoke of humanity at a time when she desired to hear nought spoken of but energy, she suppressed them. Soon it happened that this dictatorship she had assumed over France for the public good, twelve of her members arrogated to themselves for the same reason and for the same purpose. From the Alps to the sea, from the Pyrenees to the Rhine, these twelve dictators seized upon all, both men and things, and commenced the greatest and the most awful struggle with the nations of Europe that history has ever recorded. In order that they might remain supreme directors of this immense work, they sacrificed all parties by turns; and in accordance with the feelings of our nature, their qualifications were abused. These qualifications were strength and energy; their abuse was cruelty. They spilt torrents of blood, so much so, that conquest having rendered them no longer useful, and becoming hateful by the abuse of strength, they fell. The convention then resumed the dictatorship, and began by degrees to relax the springs of that terrible administration. Secure in her conquests, she listened to humanity, and indulged her spirit of regeneration. For one year she inquired and sought for all that was good and great; but the parties crushed under a merciless power, revived under a kindly authority. Two factions, in which were blended, under an infinite variety of shades, the friends and the foes of the revolution, attacked it by turns. She vanquished the former in Germinal and Prairial, the others in Vendémiaire, and up to the last day showed her heroism amidst perils. Lastly, she framed a republican constitution, and after a struggle of three years with Europe, with the factions, and with herself, mutilated and bleeding, she resigned, and consigned France to the directory.

The remembrance of the revolution is coupled with awful associations; but in her defence there is but one fact to be stated, a single fact only, and all reproaches must sink before this great truth: she saved us from foreign invasion! The preceding assemblies had bequeathed to her France in peril; she bequeathed to the directory and the empire France saved. If in 1793 the emigrants had returned to France, there would have been left no vestige of the works of the constituent assembly, and of the beneficial effects of the revolution. Instead of those admirable civil institutions, those magnificent exploits, which distinguished the constituent assembly, the convention, the directory, the consulate, and the empire, we should have had the base and sanguinary anarchy which we behold at this day the other side the Pyrenees. In repelling the invasion of the kings leagued against our republic, the convention has ensured to the revolution an uninterrupted action of thirty years on the soil of France, and has given her works time to become firm and settled, and to acquire that strength which enables them to defy the impotent wrath of the enemies of the human race.

To the men who proudly style themselves the patriots of 1789 the convention will always be able to say: "You have courted the battle, it is I who have maintained it and brought it to a termination."

THE 5th Brumaire, year IV. (October 27, 1795), was the day appointed for putting in force the directorial constitution. On that day, the two-thirds of the convention retained in the legislative body were to be joined by the third recently elected by the electoral assemblies, to divide themselves into two councils, to constitute themselves, and then to proceed to the nomination of the five directors entrusted with the executive power. During this preliminary interval, devoted to the organization of the legislative body and the directory, the former committees of government were to remain in office, and be the depositaries of all the powers. The members of the convention, despatched either to the armies or to the departments, were to continue their mission until the installation of the directory should be notified to them.

A great agitation pervaded the public mind. The moderate patriots as well as the enthusiastic patriots evinced the same irritation against the party that had attacked the convention on the 13th Vendémiaire; they were full of apprehensions; they encouraged one another to stand by each other more closely than ever, to defend themselves against royalism; they loudly said that no other men than such as were irrevocably engaged in the cause of the revolution should be called to the directory, and to fill public situations; they had great misgivings as to the deputies of the new third, and anxiously made inquiries respecting their names, their previous conduct, and their known or presumed opinions.

The sectionists, exposed to grape-shot on the 13th Vendémiaire, but treated with the utmost forbearance after the victory, had again grown insolent. Proud of having for a moment stood the fire, they seemed to imagine that the convention, in sparing them, had been influenced by their strength, and had tacitly acknowledged the justice of their cause. They showed themselves every where, boasted of their great deeds, constantly repeating in private assemblies the like imperfections against the great assembly that had just relinquished power, and affected to count much upon the deputies of the new third.

These deputies, who were to take their seats amidst the veterans of the revolution, and to represent there the new opinion that had formed itself in France after a long series of storms, were far from justifying all the distrust of the republicans and all the hopes of the counter-revolutionists. Among them were to be numbered some members of the old assemblies, as Vaublanc, Pastoret, Dumas, Dupont (of Nemours), and the honest and learned Tronchet, who had rendered such great services to our legislation. Next were seen many new men, not those extraordinary men who shine at the first appearance of revolutions, but some of them possessing those substantial qualifications which, in the career of politics, as in that of the arts, supply the absence of genius; for instance, lawyers and men of office, such as Portalis, Simeon, Barbe-Marbois, and Tronçon-Ducoudray. In general these newly elected, with the exception of some notorious counter-revolutionists, belonged to that class of moderate men, who having taken no part whatever in events, and consequently having had no opportunity either to do wrong or to deceive themselves, alleged that they had a strong attachment for the revolution, but at the same time, made a distinction between her and what they termed her crimes. In the due course of things, they ought to be well enough inclined to censure the past; but they were already somewhat reconciled with the convention and the republic by their election; for every one willingly allows an order of things wherein he has found a place. Besides all this, strangers to Paris and to politics, timid as yet upon this new stage, they conversed with and visited the most distinguished members of the national convention.

Such was the tendency of public opinion on the 5th Brumaire, year IV. The re-elected members of the convention coalesced, and strove to influence the nominations that were yet to be made, so as to remain masters of the government. By virtue of the celebrated decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, the number of the new conventionalists in the new legislative body was to be five hundred. If this number should not be filled up by the re-elections, the members present on the 5th Brumaire were to form themselves into an electoral body for the purpose of completing it. A draught list was drawn up at the committee of public welfare, and in this list were entered the names of many decided Mountaineers. This list was not entirely approved of. However, none but known patriots were placed in it. On the 5th, all the deputies present met together in single assembly, and constituted themselves an electoral body. In the first place, they completed the two-thirds of conventionalists who were to sit in the legislative body; then they prepared a list of all the deputies married, and aged more than forty years; and from this list they took by lot two hundred and fifty to compose the council of the ancients.

On the following day, the council of the five hundred assembled at the Ride, in the old hall of the constituent assembly, chose Duunou for president, and Rewbell, Chénier, Cambacérès, and Thihaudeau for secretaries. The council of the ancients met in the former hall of the convention, called Larévollière-Lépeaux to the chair, and Baudin, Lanjuinais, Breard, and Charles Lacroix, to the clerks' table (bureau). These selections were suitable, and demonstrated that in both councils the majority belonged to the republican cause. The councils declared that they were constituted, notified this to each other by messages, provisionally confirmed the powers of the deputies, and deferred their verification until after the government had been settled.

The most important of all the elections yet remained to be made,—namely, that of the five magistrates to be invested with the executive power. On this choice depended at once the fate of the republic, and the fortune of individuals. The five directors, in fact, having the nomination of all the public functionaries, could form the government just as they chose, and admit men attached to or hostile to the republic. They would, moreover, have a control over the prospects of individuals; they could either admit them, or exclude them from the career of public office, and reward or discourage men of capacity faithful to the cause of the revolution. The influence which they must necessarily exercise, would therefore be immense. In like manner, all were deeply concerned in the selection that was about to be made.

The conventionalists met to settle among themselves this selection. All agreed that they ought to choose regicides, in order to seat themselves more firmly in power. Public opinion after being for some time unsettled, at last declared in favour of Barras, Rewbell, Sieyès, Larévollière-Lépeaux, and Letourneur. Barras had rendered important services in Thermidor, Prairial, and Vendémiaire; he had been, in some measure, the legislator-general, opposed to all the factions; the last battle, of the 13th Vendémiaire, had in particular given him great consequence, although the military arrangements of that day belonged to young Bonaparte. Rewbell, who had been shut up in Mentz during the siege, and frequently called into the committees since the 9th Thermidor, had adopted the opinion of the Thermidorians, shown talent and diligence in business, together with a certain decision of character. Sieyès was regarded as the first speculative genius of the time. Larévollière-Lépeaux had voluntarily associated himself with the Girondists on the day of their proscription, had returned to his colleagues on the 9th Thermidor, and had opposed with all his might the two factions that had alternately attacked the convention. A mild and humane patriot, he was the only Girondist whom the Mountain did not suspect, and the only patriot whose virtues the counter-revolutionists durst not deny. He had but one disadvantage, in the opinion of certain persons; namely, the deformity of his person; it was said the directorial mantle would not set well upon him. Lastly, Letourneur, known for a patriot, and esteemed for his character, had formerly been an officer of engineers, and had latterly succeeded to Carnot in the committee of public welfare, but was far from possessing his talents. Some of the conventionalists would have wished to place among the five directors some one of the generals who had most distinguished themselves at the head of the armies, as Kléber, Moreau, Pichegru, or Hoche; but they were afraid to give too much influence to the military men, and would not invite any one of them to the supreme power. To render the election certain, the conventionalists agreed among themselves to resort to an expedient which, without being illegal, had very much the appearance of a juggle. According to the constitution, the council of the five hundred was to present a list of ten candidates for each directorship to the council of the ancients. The latter, out of ten candidates was to elect one. Therefore, for the five directors it was necessary to offer fifty candidates. The conventionalists, who had the majority in the five hundred, agreed to place Barras, Rewbell, Sieyès, Larévollière-Lépeaux, and Letourneur at the head of the list, and then to add thereto forty-five unknown names, upon which it would be impossible to fix. In this manner there was a compulsory preference for the five candidates whom the conventionalists were desirous of calling to the directory.

This plan was strictly followed; there was only wanting one name out of the forty-five, Cambacérès was added, who had rendered himself agreeable to the new third and all the moderatists. When the list was presented to the ancients, they appeared to be extremely dissatisfied at this manner of forcing their choice. Dupont of Nemours, who had already figured in the preceding assemblies, and who was a declared adversary, if not of the republic, at least of the convention. Dupont (of Nemours) called for an adjournment. "The forty-five persons who compose this list," said he, "are doubtless not unworthy of your choice, for otherwise it would appear that some one has desired to compel your selection of five personages. No doubt these names which are quite new to you belong to men of modest merit, and who are also worthy of representing a great republic; but it requires time to become acquainted with them. Their very modesty, which has kept them concealed, compels us to make inquiries, so that we may appreciate their merit, and authorizes us to demand an adjournment." The ancients, although dissatisfied with this procedure, shared the sentiments of the majority of the five hundred, and confirmed the choice of the five who had been forced upon them. Out of two hundred and eighteen voters, Larévillière-Lépeaux obtained two hundred and sixteen votes, such was the unanimity of esteem for that worthy man. Letourneur obtained one hundred and eighty-nine; Rewbell one hundred and seventy-six; Sieyès one hundred and fifty-six; and Barras one hundred and twenty-nine. This last, who was more of a party man than the others, it was to be expected should excite greater differences of opinion and collect fewer votes.

These five elections caused the greatest satisfaction to the revolutionists, who thus saw themselves assured of the government. They had yet to know whether the five directors would accept the nomination. There was no doubt respecting three of them, but there were two who were known to have no very great taste for power. Larévillière-Lépeaux, a simple, retiring man, but little qualified for the management of affairs and men, sought and found no pleasure but in the Jardin des Plantes with the brothers Thouin. It was doubtful whether he would make up his mind to accept the functions of director. Sieyès, with a mighty mind, capable of conceiving every thing, a matter of business as well as a principle, was nevertheless unfitted by disposition for the duties of government. Perhaps also full of spleen against a republic which was not constituted to his pleasure, he might appear not very much disposed to accept the direction of it. As to Larévillière-Lépeaux, the highest consideration was set upon his single-heartedness; they told him that his association with the magistrates who were to rule the republic was advantageous and indispensable. He assented. In fact, among these five individuals, men of business or action, it was highly necessary that one should be of pure and unquestionable disinterestedness; and this was obtained by the acceptance of Larévillière-Lépeaux. As for Sieyès, his repugnance was not to be overcome; he refused, affirming that he considered himself unfit to govern.

Some one was wanted to fill his place. There was a man who possessed immense reputation in Europe, this was Carnot. His military services, although substantial, were magnified; to him were attributed all our victories; and though he had been a member of the great committee of public welfare, the colleague of Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, it was known that he had opposed them with great energy. In him was to be observed the union of a great military genius with a stoic character. His reputation and that of Sieyès were the two greatest of the time. Nothing better could be done in order to obtain respect for the directory than to supply the place of one of these two reputations by the other. Carnot was accordingly put upon the new list along with the men who rendered his nomination compulsory. Cambacérès was also added to the list, which contained only eight unknown persons. The ancients, however, had no hesitation in preferring Carnot; he obtained one hundred and seventeen votes out of two hundred and thirteen, and became one of the five directors.

Thus Barras, Rewbell, Larévillière-Lépeaux, Letourneur, and Carnot, became the five magistrates intrusted with the government of the republic. Among these five persons there was not a man of genius, or even any man of exceeding reputation, excepting Carnot. But what was to be done at the termination of a sanguinary revolution, which in a few years had devoured several generations of men of genius, and of every description? In the assemblies there was not left a single orator of note; in diplomacy there remained not one celebrated negotiator. Barthélemy alone, by his treaties with Prussia and Spain, had attracted some kind of consideration, but he inspired the patriots with no confidence. The armies had already produced great generals, and still greater were qualifying themselves; but as yet no decided superiority had been manifested; and besides, people had their misgivings of the military. Therefore, as we have just now observed, there were but two men of great reputation, Sieyès and Carnot. In the impracticability of having the one, they got the other. Barras possessed activity, Rowbell and Letourneur were industrious men of business; Larévillière-Lépeaux was a man of discretion and probity. It would have been difficult at the moment to have composed the supreme magistracy in any other way.

The state of things when these five magistrates assumed their power was deplorable; and it required great courage and virtue in some, and great ambition in others, to accept the task that was imposed upon them. It was the day after a battle, in which it had been found necessary to call in one faction to oppose another. The patriots who had so recently spilt their blood were exorbitant in their demands; the sectionists had not ceased to be daring. In short, the affair of the 13th Vendémiaire had not been one of those victories followed by terror, which, in subjecting the government entirely to the yoke of the victorious faction, at least rescue it from the vanquished faction. The patriots had again started up; the sectionists had not submitted themselves. Paris was full of intriguers of all parties, agitated by the immoderate expectations of the many, and abandoned to the most frightful misery.

At this time as in Prairial, there was a scarcity of the necessities of life in every one of the great communes; the paper money engendered confusion in business, and left the government without resources. The convention, not willing to assent to the disposal of the national domains for thrice their value in 1790 in paper, the sales had been suspended; the paper, which could only come back by means of the sales, had remained in circulation, and its depreciation had made alarming progress. In vain had a sliding-scale been invented for diminishing the loss of those who received the assignats; that scale reduced them no more than one-fifth, whereas they had not even the one hundred and fiftieth of their original denomination. The state, receiving nothing but paper for the assessed taxes, was ruined as well as private individuals. It levied, it is true, one-half of the land-tax in kind, and this furnished some provision for the consumption of the armies; but oftentimes the means of conveying it to them failed, and those provisions rotted in the stores. To add to its expenditure, the state was obliged, as already stated, to feed Paris. It provided a ration for a specific sum in assignats, which scarcely covered the hundredth part of the cost. This expedient, however, was the only practicable one for supplying at least with bread the annuitants and the public functionaries, who were paid in assignats; but this pressing exigency had raised the expenditure to an enormous amount. Having nothing but paper to meet it, the state had made an unlimited issue of assignats, and had increased the issue in a few months from twelve thousand millions to twenty-nine thousand. By former receipts and those remaining in the treasury, the actual amount in circulation amounted to nineteen thousand million, which went beyond the highest figures ever known in finances. That the issues should not be further multiplied, the commission of five, instituted during the last days of the convention for devising extraordinary means of police and finance, had induced the assembly to decree in principle an extraordinary war-tax of twenty times the land-tax, and ten times the tax on trade licenses, which might produce about six or seven thousand million in paper. But this tax was only enacted in principle; and in the mean time, inscriptions of annuities (rentes) were given to the contractors, which they received at a ruinous rate. Five francs annuity was received for ten francs capital. Besides all this, they tried a voluntary loan at three per cent, which was ruinous in its system, and had but few subscribers.

In this dreadful distress, the public placemen, being unable to live upon their salaries, gave in their resignation; the soldiers left the armies, which had lost one-third of their effective force, and returned to the towns, where the inefficiency of the government allowed them to remain unmolested. Thus to maintain five armies, and supply an immense capital, by the simple power of issuing valueless assignats; to recruit those armies; to remodel the entire government in the midst of the two hostile factions,—such was the task of the five magistrates who had just been called to the supreme administration of the republic.

The instinctive feeling of order is so great in human associations, that they themselves consent to its establishment, and wonderfully assist those who undertake the duty of reforming them: it would be impossible to reform them, if themselves did not concur therein; but one ought not the less to acknowledge the courage and the efforts of those who venture upon such undertakings. The five directors, on repairing to the Luxembourg, found not a single article of furniture there. The porter lent them a rickety table, a sheet of letter-paper, and an inkstand, for the purpose of writing the first message, which was to notify to the two councils that the directory was formed. In the treasury there was not a single sou in money. They printed over night the assignats necessary for the service of the following day, and they were issued quite wet from the press of the republic. The greatest uncertainty respecting the supply of provisions prevailed; and for several days there had been nothing but a few ounces of bread or rice to distribute among the people.

The first demand made was a call for funds. According to the new constitution, it was requisite that every expense should be preceded by a demand for the ways and means, with an allowance for each ministry. The two councils allowed the demand, and then the treasury, which had been rendered independent of the directory, took account of sums granted by the decree of the two councils. The directory demanded at first three thousand million in assignats, which was allowed, and which would have to be exchanged immediately for money. Was it the duty of the treasury or of the directory to negotiate for the money? That was the first difficulty. The treasury, in contracting by itself, would overstep the limits of a simple superintendence. That difficulty was got rid of by conferring upon the treasury the power of negotiating with the paper. The three thousand million could produce at most twenty or twenty-five million of crowns. Thus the utmost that could be effected was to satisfy the necessities of the present time. They set themselves to work without loss of time upon a scheme of finance, and the directory intimated to the two councils that the scheme would be laid before them in the course of a few days. In the mean time Paris, which was utterly destitute, had to be fed. There was no longer any methodized system of requisitions; the directory demanded the faculty of requiring, by way of summons, in the departments contiguous to that of the Seine, the quantity of two hundred and fifty thousand quintals of corn, on account of the land-tax payable in kind. The next thing the directory did was to call for a vast number of laws for the repression of all kinds of disorders, and especially of desertion, which was daily diminishing the strength of the armies. At the same time, it set about selecting the persons who were to compose the administration. Merlin (of Douai) was called to the ministry of justice; Aubert-Dubayet was removed from the army of the coasts of Cherbourg, in order that he should receive the portfolio of war; Charles Lacroix was placed at the head of foreign affairs; Faypoult, over the finances; and Benezec, an enlightened official over the interior. The directory then looked about carefully among the multitude of applicants by whom it was besieged, for the men best qualified to fill public offices. It could hardly be expected but that in this extreme haste it made some very injudicious appointments. The directory retained, in particular, a great number of patriots, who had rendered themselves too notorious to be either impartial or discreet. The 13th Vendémiaire had rendered them necessary, and caused the alarm which they had inspired to be forgotten. The entire government, directors, ministers, and agents of all sorts, was thus formed from an utter abhorrence of the 13th Vendémiaire, and the party which had brought about that conflict. The conventional deputies themselves were not yet recalled from their missions; and to do this the directory had only to forbear sending them a notification of its installation; it thus intended to allow them time to finish their work. Fréron, sent to the south, to repress the counter-revolutionary disturbances in that quarter, was consequently enabled to continue his circuit through those unhappy districts. The five directors laboured without intermission, and displayed, in these first moments, the same zeal that had been seen exhibited by the members of the great committee of public welfare, in the ever memorable days of September and October, 1793.

Unfortunately, the difficulties of this task were aggravated by defeats. The retreat which the army of the Sambre and Meuse had been forced to make gave rise to the most alarming rumours. Owing to the most ill-arranged of all plans, and the treason of Pichegru, the projected invasion of Germany had not altogether succeeded, as we have already seen. The intention was to cross the Rhine at two points, and to occupy the right bank with two armies. Jourdan, who had gone from Dusseldorf after having crossed the river without accident, had found himself upon the Lahn, cooped up between the Prussian line and the Rhine, and destitute of every thing, in a neutral country, where he could not live by forced supplies. This distress, however, could not have lasted longer than a few days, if he could have advanced into the enemy's country and joined Pichegru, who had found by the occupation of Mannheim so easy and so unexpected a passage over the Rhine. Jourdan would have repaired by this junction the faulty conception of the plan of campaign prescribed to him; but Pichegru, who was still discussing the conditions of his defection with the agents of the prince of Condé, had stationed but an inefficient division beyond the Rhine. He had pertinaciously made up his mind against crossing the river with the bulk of his army, and left Jourdan alone à flèche in the midst of Germany. This position could not be of long duration. All who had the least notion of war trembled for Jourdan. Hoche, who, while commanding in Brittany, interested himself in the operations of the other armies, communicated his ideas accordingly to all his correspondents. Jourdan was therefore compelled to retreat, and to recross the Rhine; and in so doing he acted very judiciously, and deserved esteem for the manner in which he conducted his retreat.

The enemies of the republic were rejoiced at this retrograde movement, and spread the most alarming reports. Their malicious predictions came to pass at the very moment when the directory was installed. The fault of the plan adopted by the committee of public welfare consisted in dividing its forces, and thus leaving to the enemy who occupied Mentz the advantage of a central position, suggesting to him the idea of collecting his troops, and bringing the entire mass of his army to bear against one or other of our two armies. This situation suggested a felicitous idea to general Clerfaut, exemplifying greater genius than he had previously displayed, but which he did not likewise demonstrate by the execution of what had been thus suggested by circumstances. A division of nearly thirty thousand French blockaded Mentz. Clerfaut, master of that fortress, could debouch from it, and overwhelm the blockading division, before Jourdan and Pichegru had time to come up. In point of fact, he seized the favourable moment with great address. Jourdan had scarcely retired upon the Lower Rhine by Dusseldorf and Neuwied, than Clerfaut, leaving a detachment to observe his motions, proceeded to Mentz, and there concentrated his forces, so as to debouch suddenly upon the blockading division. That division, under the command of general Schaal, extended itself in a semicircle around Mentz, and formed a line of nearly four leagues. Though great care had been taken to fortify it, still its extent did not permit it to be closed in a complete manner. Clerfaut, who had made his observations upon it, had discovered more than one point easily accessible. The extremity of the semicircular line, which was to support itself on the upper course of the Rhine, left an extensive level between the latter intrenchments and the river. It was upon this point that Clerfaut resolved to bring his principal force to bear. On the 7th Brumaire (October 29) he debouched by Mentz with an imposing force, but yet not considerable enough to render the operation decisive. Military men have in fact censured him for having left on the right bank a body which, had it been directed against the left bank, would have inevitably brought destruction upon a part of the French army. Clerfaut despatched along the meadow which occupied the space between the line of blockade and the Rhine, a column which advanced with the musket in hand. At the same time, a flotilla of gun-boats went up the river to support the movement of this column. He made the rest of his army march upon the front of the lines, and gave orders for a prompt and vigorous attack. The French division, finding itself at once attacked in front, turned by a corps filing along the river, and cannonaded by a flotilla, whose balls reached its rear, took fright, and fled in confusion. The division of Saint-Cyr, which was stationed next behind the latter, then found itself unprotected, and likely to be closely attacked. Fortunately, the firmness and judgment of its general extricated it from danger. He shifted from front to rear, and executed his retreat in good order, warning the other divisions to do the same. From that moment, the whole semicircle was abandoned; Saint-Cyr's division made its retreating movement to the army of the Upper Rhine; the divisions of Mengaud and Renaud, which occupied the other part of the line, finding themselves cut off, fell back upon the army of the Sambre and Meuse, a division of which, very fortunately, commanded by Marceau, advanced without accident into the Hunds-Ruck. The retreat of these two latter divisions was managed with great difficulty, and would have been impracticable, had Clerfait, comprehending the whole importance of his admirable manœuvre, acted with stronger masses, and with sufficient rapidity. He might, according to the opinion of military men, after having broke through the French line, have rapidly turned the divisions which were descending towards the Lower Rhine, surrounded them, and cooped them up in the elbow which the Rhine makes from Mentz to Ringen.

Clerfait's manœuvre was not the less admirable, and it was considered as the first of the kind performed by the allies. While he was carrying the lines of Mentz, Wurmsr by a simultaneous attack upon Pieshegru, had taken from him the bridge of the Neckar, and had subsequently driven him within the walls of Mannheim. Thus the two French armies, again driven beyond the Rhine, retaining, it is true, Mannheim, Neuwied, and Dusseldorf, but cut off from one another by Clerfait, who had driven away the blockaders of Mentz, might run great risks before a bold and enterprising general. The latter event had shaken them considerably; the fugitives had run back into the interior; and an absolute destitution added to the disheartening effects of the defeat. Fortunately, Clerfait was in no hurry to proceed, and took much longer time than was necessary for concentrating all his forces.

This unhappy intelligence arriving at Paris between the 11th and 12th Brumaire, at the very moment of the installation of the directory, in a great degree contributed to augment the difficulties of the new republican organization. Other events, less dangerous in reality, though quite as serious in appearance, were taking place in the west. A fresh descent of emigrants threatened the republic. After the disastrous descent at Quiberon, which, as we have seen, would never have been attempted, if a portion of the forces had not been furnished by the English government, the remains of the expedition had been taken on board the English fleet, and then landed on the little island of Ouat. Thither the unfortunate families of the Morbihan who had hastened to meet the expedition, and the remnant of the emigrant regiments, had been conveyed. An epidemic disease and violent dissensions prevailed on that small rock. After some time, Puisaye, who had been recalled by all the Chouans who had broken the pacification, and who imputed to the English, and not to their former chief, the miscarriage at Quiberon, had returned to Brittany, where he had made every preparation for a renewal of hostilities. During the Quiberon expedition, the leaders of La Vendée had not stirred, because the expedition had no immediate reference to them, and because they were prohibited by the Paris agents from assisting Puisaye; and lastly, because they were waiting for a successful movement before they durst again commit themselves. Charette alone had engaged in an altercation with the republican authorities concerning various disorders committed in his district, and certain military preparations which he was blamed for making, and he had almost come to an open rupture with them. He had just received, by way of Paris, fresh marks of distinction from Verona, and the appointment of commander-in-chief of the Catholic districts, the great object of his desire. This new dignity, while it cooled the zeal of his rivals, had singularly excited his own. He was looking for a new expedition to be sent to his coasts; and commodore Warren having offered him the stores remaining from the Quiberon expedition, he had no longer hesitated; he had made a general attack on the beach, driven back the republican posts, and got some cartridges and muskets. The English had at the same time landed on the coast of the Morbihan the unfortunate families they had dragged in their train, and who were dying from famine and privation in the Isle of Ouat. Thus the pacification was broken, and war again begun.

For a long time, the three republican generals, Aubert-Dubayet, Hoche, and Canclaux, who commanded the three armies known as the armies of Cherbourg, Brest, and the west, had considered the pacification as broken not only in Brittany, but also in Lower Vendée. They had all three met at Nantes, but could not determine upon any thing. They nevertheless put themselves in preparation to hasten individually to the first point that should be threatened. A new landing was talked of; it was said, as was perfectly true, that the Quiberon division was only the first, and that another was to come. Being informed of the new perils to which the coast was exposed, the French government appointed Hoche to the command of the army of the west. The conqueror of Weissenburg and Quiberon, was, in fact, the man on whom at this present juncture the entire national confidence should be reposed. He immediately repaired to Nantes to supersede Canclaux. The three armies appointed to repress the insurgent provinces had been successively reinforced by some detachments arrived from the north, and by several of the divisions which the peace with Spain rendered available. Hoche got leave to draw fresh detachments from the two armies of Brest and Cherbourg, to strengthen that of La Vendée, so that he brought it up to forty-four thousand men. He stationed strongly intrenched posts on the Nantes Sèvre, which runs between the two Vendées, and separates Stofflet's country from that of Charette. His object in this was to cut these two leaders off from one another, and to prevent their combining their operations. Charette had entirely thrown off the mask, and proclaimed war anew. Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Scépeaux, jealous of seeing Charette appointed generalissimo, intimidated also by the preparations of Hoche, and uncertain as to the arrival of the English, did not move from their place. At last, the English squadron made its appearance, at first in the bay of Quiberon, and afterwards in the bay of Isle-Dieu, in front of Lower Vendée. The squadron carried two thousand English infantry, five hundred horse in good order, small companies of emigrant regiments, a great number of officers, arms, ammunition, provisions, clothing for a considerable army, funds in metallic currency, and lastly the long looked-for prince. A still greater force was to follow, provided the expedition opened successfully, and assuming that the prince testified his sincere desire of putting himself at the head of the royalist party. No sooner was the expedition observed from the coast, than all the royalist chiefs sent emissaries to the prince, to assure him of their devoted attachment, to claim the honour of his confiding himself to them, and to settle how their efforts should be made available. Charette, master of the shore, was best situated for assisting at the landing; and his reputation, as well as the wishes of all the emigrants, attracted the expedition towards his quarter. He also despatched agents to determine upon a plan of future operations.

Hoche was, meanwhile, making his preparations with his wonted activity and resolution. He formed the plan of despatching three columns from Châlans, Clisson, and Saint-Hermine, three points situated at the extremities of the country, and carrying Belleville, the head-quarters of Charette. These three columns, twenty or twenty-two thousand strong, ought from their numbers to have overawed the country, destroyed Charette's principal establishment, and thrown him by a brisk and vigorous attack into such disorder, that he should not have been able to protect the landing of the emigrant prince. Hoche accordingly caused these three columns to be sent off, and joined them at Belleville, without meeting with any accident. Charette, whose principal force he hoped to meet with and to fight, was not at Belleville; he had collected nine to ten thousand men, and was on his way in the direction of Lugo, so as to remove the theatre of the war towards the south of the country, and to call the attention of the republicans from the coast. His plan was well conceived, but it failed from the energy opposed to him. While Hoche was entering Belleville with his three columns, Charette was before the post of Saint-Cyr, which protected the road from Lugo to Sables. This post he attacked with all his forces; two hundred republicans intrenched in a church made an heroic resistance, and gave the Lugo division who heard the cannonade time to hasten to their relief. Charette, taken in flank, was completely beaten, and compelled to disperse with his troops, in order to regain the interior of the Marais.

Hoche, not finding the enemy before him, and discovering the real intent of his movement, brought back his column to the points whence they had started, and began to form an intrenched camp at Soullans near the coast, for the purpose of rushing down upon the first army that should attempt to land. During this interval, the emigrant prince, surrounded by a numerous council and the envoys of all the Breton and Vendean chiefs, continued to consult upon the means of effecting a landing; and allowed Hoche time to dispose of his means of defence. The English sail keeping within sight of the coast, were continually exciting the alarms of the republicans and the hopes of the royalists.

Thus, from the earliest days of the installation of the directory, a defeat before Mentz, and a threatened invasion in La Vendée, were subjects of alarm of which the enemies of the government most traitorously availed themselves to render its settlement more arduous. The government explained or contradicted part of the reports that were circulated concerning the situation of the two frontiers, and gave full information respecting the events that had recently taken place. There was no suppressing the defeat sustained before the lines of Mentz; but the government stated in answer to the speeches of the alarmists, that Dusseldorf and Neuwied were still ours, and had been always in our power; that consequently the army of the Sambre and Mentz possessed two têtes de pont, and the army of the Rhine one, for debouching, whenever it should be advisable, beyond the Rhine; that our situation and that of the Austrians were in fact the same, since, if they were enabled by Mentz to carry on operations upon both banks, so were we by Dusseldorf, Neuwied, and Mannheim. This reasoning was just; but it remained to be seen whether the Austrians, following up their success, would not soon take Neuwied and Mannheim from us, and establish themselves on the left bank between the Vosges and the Moselle. As for La Vendée, the government communicated the vigorous course taken by Hoche, which satisfied reasonable folks, but which could not prevent enthusiastic patriots from conceiving apprehensions, and the counter-revolutionists from diffusing them.

Amidst these dangers, the directory increased its efforts for reorganizing the government, the administration, and particularly the finance department. Three thousand million assignats had been granted it, as we have observed, and had produced at the utmost some twenty millions in crowns. The voluntary loan at three per cent, opened in the latter days of the convention, had just been suspended: for in exchange for a paper capital the state engaged to pay a money annuity, and made a ruinous bargain. The extraordinary war-tax proposed by the commission of five had not yet been carried into execution, and excited complaints, as a last revolutionary act of the convention with respect to the tax-payers. The public offices were about being closed. Individual placements, compensated according to the sliding scale, raised such bitter complaints, that the compensations had to be suspended. The post-masters, being paid in assignats, announced their intended resignation, for the insufficient indemnity afforded by the government would not cover their losses. The post-office was soon to close, that is to say, all communications, even in writing, were about to cease in every part of the kingdom. The scheme of the finances, promised in a few days, must therefore be immediately presented. This was the first thing to be looked to, and the first duty of the directory. The scheme was at last communicated to the commission of the finances.

The mass of the assignats in circulation might be computed at about twenty thousand million. Even reckoning the assignats at the one hundredth part of their value, and not at the one hundred and fiftieth, they would not be actually worth more than two hundred million: it is certain that they would not pass for more in the currency, and that those who held them could not get them taken at a higher rate. It might have been possible to have suddenly recurred to their effective value, not to take assignats for more than they were really worth, or admit them unless at the course of exchange, either in dealings between individuals, or in payment of the taxes, or in payment for the national property. If this had been the case, then that prodigious and frightful mass of paper, that enormous debt, would have disappeared. There were remaining nearly seven thousand million crowns of national property, inclusive of the national property in Belgium and the national forests; therefore there were ample means for calling in those twenty thousand millions reduced to two hundred millions, and for providing against fresh expenses. But this great and bold determination could hardly be adopted; it was rejected both by scrupulous minds, who considered it as a bankruptcy, and by the patriots, who said that people desired the destruction of the assignats.

Both of them seemed to know but little on the subject. This bankruptcy, assuming it were so, was inevitable, and so it ultimately turned out. The only question was how to confine the evil, that is, the confusion, and to establish a system with respect to securities, a mere act of justice that the state owes to every one. At first sight, indeed, it would be a bankruptcy to take at the present time for one franc an assignat which had been issued in 1790 for one hundred francs, and which then contained the promise of the worth of one hundred francs in land. Upon this principle, the twenty thousand million in paper must have been taken for twenty thousand million crowns, and paid in full; but the national property would scarcely have paid a third of that sum. Even assuming that the sum could have been paid in full, the question must be asked, how much the state had received in issuing these twenty thousand million. Four or five thousand million perhaps. They had not been taken for more when received from the hands of the state, and it had already repaid by the sales an equal value in national property. It therefore would have been a cruel injustice with regard to the state, that is to say, towards all tax-payers, to consider the assignats according to their original value. No one therefore could consent to take them but at a reduced value; in fact, this was now beginning to be effected by the introduction of the sliding scale.

Doubtless if there were still persons holders of the first assignats, and who had kept them without once exchanging them, these latter would be exposed to an enormous loss; for having taken them nearly at par, they would have to experience the entire reduction. But this was a fiction in every respect illusory. Nobody had kept assignats by them, for there is no hoarding paper; every one had been in a hurry to pass them away as soon as possible, and every one had borne his proportion of the loss. Every body had borne his share of the loss in this assumed bankruptcy, and from that moment it was no longer a bankruptcy. The bankruptcy of a state consists in making some individuals, namely the creditors, bear the debt which it is not desirable should be borne by all the tax-payers: now if every body had more or less borne his share of the depreciation of the assignats, no one could be said to have become bankrupt. Lastly, a still stronger reason could be given than any of the others. If the assignat had fallen only while in some hands, and had lost its value so far as some individuals were concerned, it had nevertheless passed into the hands of the speculators in paper, and it would have been this class rather than that of the real sufferers who would have reaped the benefit of a most absurd restoration of value. Else would Calonne, in a pamphlet written in London, have observed very sensibly that it was a self-deception to suppose that France was overwhelmed with the burden of the assignats, and that this paper money afforded the means of her becoming bankrupt without declaring herself so. He ought, in order to express himself with more propriety, to have said, that by this means the loss by the bankruptcy was universally distributed, which is the same as saying there was no bankruptcy at all.

It was therefore reasonable and just to return to the substantiality of the thing, and to take the assignat for no more than it was absolutely worth. The patriots said that this was effecting the destruction of the assignat that had saved the revolution, and looked upon this idea as a conception issuing from the brain of the royalists. Those who pretended to reason with more enlightened views and a knowledge of what they were talking about, argued that they were going to make paper currency full all at once, and that the currency could no longer be carried on, for want of the paper which would have been destroyed, and for want of the metallic currency which was either hoarded up or had gone away to foreigners. The event furnished an answer to those who supported this mode of reasoning; but a simple calculation ought to have put them immediately in the way of coming to a more correct conclusion. In reality, the twenty thousand million of assignats represented less than two hundred million; now, according to all calculations, the circulation could not formerly be carried on with less than two thousand million, gold or silver. If therefore at the present time the assignats did not form more than two hundred million in the circulation, how did they manage for the rest in business? It is very evident that the metals must have a considerable currency, and in fact they did have a currency, but it was in the provinces and in the country, far from the eyes of the government. Besides the metals, like all commodities, are always attracted whither their presence is needed; and by repudiating paper, they would have returned, as in point of fact they did return when paper died a natural death.

It was therefore a double illusion, and one that had taken deep root in the public mind, to consider the reduction of the assignat to its real value as a bankruptcy, and as a sudden destruction of the means of circulation. It had only one inconvenience, but it was not for this that it was censured, as we shall presently see. The commission of the finances, bound by the ideas which then prevailed, could only partially adopt the real principles of the matter. After conferring with the directory, it resolved upon the following scheme.

During the intervening period, and until, according to the new plan, the sale of the national property and the collection of the taxes should bring back not fictitious but real sums, it would be necessary still to use assignats. It was proposed to extend the issue to thirty thousand million, but that was to be the extreme limit. On the 30th Nivôse, the plate was to be solemnly broken up. Thus the mind of the public was set at ease respecting the quantity of the new issues. There was set apart to meet the thirty thousand million issued, one thousand million crowns' value of the national property. By consequence the assignat, which in currency was not actually worth more than the one hundred and fiftieth part of its denomination and much less, would be fixed at one-thirtieth, which was a very great advantage given to the holder of paper. Another thousand million crowns' value of national property was further set apart for rewarding the soldiers of the republic, a recompense that had long since been promised them. Therefore there remained five out of the seven undisposed of. In these five were included the national forests, the moveable property of the emigrants and of the crown, the royal residences, and the possessions of the Belgian clergy. There were then five thousand million of crowns still disposable. But the difficulty consisted in disposing of that amount. The assignat had in fact been the means of putting it in circulation before the property was sold. But the assignat being abolished, since there could be no more than ten thousand million added to the existing twenty, a sum which at most represented one hundred million of crowns, how was the value of the property to be realized beforehand, and be made available for the expenses of the war? This was the only objection to be made against fixing the value of the paper and its suppression. A species of debentures (cédules hypothécaires) were invented, a measure that had been hinted at in the preceding year. According to this old plan, the government was to borrow and to give to the lenders debentures in the nature of a special pledge upon particular estates. In order to raise this loan, recourse was to be had to financial companies, who were to take these notes on their own hands. In short, instead of a paper at a forced currency, secured as general mortgage on the national property, and which was daily fluctuating in value, by means of the debentures a voluntary paper currency was created specially chargeable as an incumbrance upon some one estate or house, and which could not undergo any other change in value than that of the very object it represented. This was not, correctly speaking, a paper money; it was not liable to fall, because it was not forcibly put into circulation; but, on the other hand, a difficulty might be experienced in disposing of it. In short, the same difficulty as at the outset of the revolution still presented itself in putting the value of the property into circulation, the question was, whether it would be better to force the circulation of that value, or to leave it voluntary. The former expedient being completely exhausted, it was but natural that the other experiment should be tried.

It was therefore settled, that after bringing up the paper up to thirty thousand million, after having appointed one thousand million crowns' worth of property, and after having set apart one thousand million crowns' worth of property for the soldiers of the country, debentures should be made out for a sum proportionate to the public necessities, and that the financial companies were to contract for these notes. The national forests were not to be thus debentured (cédulées); they were to be preserved for the state. They formed nearly two out of the five thousand million remaining disposable. Some negotiation was to be opened with the companies as to letting them for a certain number of years.

The consequence of this scheme, founded upon the reduction of the assignats to their real value, was to admit them no longer but at the course of exchange in all business transactions. Until they could be called in by the sale of the thousand million appropriated to them, they were no longer to be taken by individuals or by the state, but at their current value. Thus all confusion in business would be avoided, and all fraudulent payments would become impracticable. The state was about to receive from the assessed taxes the actual value, which would cover at least the ordinary expenses, and would no longer have to pay with the national property anything else than the extraordinary expenses of the war. The assignat was to be received at par only in the arrears of the taxes, arrears which were considerable, and amounted to thirteen thousand million. Thus the tax-payers, who were in arrear, were furnished with an easy method of discharging themselves, on condition that they should do so forthwith; and the sum of thirty thousand million payable in national property at one-thirtieth, was diminished by so much.

This scheme, adopted by the five hundred, after a long discussion in secret committee, was immediately carried to the ancients. While the ancients were discussing it, new questions were submitted to the five hundred, as to the mode of summoning back to their colours the soldiers who had deserted into the interior; how the judges should be appointed, and as to the nomination of municipal officers, and functionaries of all kinds, whom the electoral assemblies, agitated by the passions of Vendémiaire, had neither time or inclination to nominate. Thus did the directory labour without intermission, and produce fresh subjects for the attention of the two councils.

The scheme of finance referred to the ancients rested on sound principles; it presented resources, for France yet possessed vast resources; unfortunately it did not surmount the real difficulty, for it did not sufficiently reduce those resources into means available at the present time. It is very evident, that with taxes amply sufficient for her annual expenditure when the paper should cease to render the receipts illusory, with seven thousand million for paying off the assignats, and providing for the extraordinary expenses of the war, it is evident enough that France possessed resources. The difficulty consisted in basing a scheme upon sound principles, and in adopting it to the future, to provide particularly for the present.

Now the ancients were not of opinion that the assignats should be so speedily discarded. The faculty of creating a further ten thousand million was capable of producing at most a resource of one hundred million crowns, and this was but little, while waiting for the receipts which the new plan was to procure. Besides, should they find companies treat for the letting of the forests for twenty or thirty years? Should they find any to take the debentures, that is the free assignats? In this uncertainty that existed as to rendering the national property available by the new means, ought they to abandon the former method of expending them, namely, by forced assignats? The council of the ancients, who most rigidly investigated the resolutions of the five hundred, and who had already rejected more than one, put its veto upon the financial scheme, and refused to allow it.

This rejection occasioned considerable anxiety in the public mind, and there was a relapse into the greatest irresolution. The counter-revolutionists, delighted to witness this conflict of notions, alleged that the difficulties of the situation were insuperable, and that the republic would perish for want of finances. The most enlightened men, who are not always the most resolute, feared the same thing. The patriots, irritated to the highest degree on perceiving that an idea had been entertained of abolishing the assignats, cried out that there existed an intention to destroy the last revolutionary device that had saved France; they wanted to know why, without fumbling so long about it, the government did not restore the credit of the assignats by the means of 1793, the maximum, requisitions, and death. There was a violence and an excitement exhibited, that called to mind the most unquiet periods. To crown our misfortunes, affairs on the Rhine had grown worse; Clerfaut, without making the most of his victory, as a great captain would have done, had nevertheless derived from it new advantages. Having obtained La Tour's division, he had marched against Pichegru, attacked him on the Pfim, and on the canal of Frankendal, and had gradually driven him back to Landau. Jourdan had advanced upon the Nahe, through a difficult country, and was animated by the noblest zeal in carrying on the war in the midst of rocky mountains, in order to extricate the army of the Rhine; but his efforts could do no more than cool the ardour of the enemy, without repairing our losses.

In this state of distress, the directory sent a most urgent despatch to the council of five hundred, and proposed one of those extraordinary resolutions usually adopted on the decisive emergencies of the revolution. This was a forced loan of six hundred million in real value, either in money or in assignats at the current value, distributed among the wealthiest classes. This was making way for a new series of arbitrary acts, like Cambon's forced loan from the rich; but as this new loan was immediately wanted, so that it might call in all the assignats in circulation, and to furnish still further a surplus of three or four hundred million in money, and as it was at length necessary to resort to prompt and energetic resources, it was adopted.

It was settled that the assignats should be received at the rate of one hundred for one: a two hundred million loan would therefore suffice to absorb twenty thousand million of paper. Every assignat that was presented in payment was to be burnt. It was hoped that the paper, being thus almost entirely withdrawn, would rise; and that, were it indispensable, the government could issue more, and avail itself of this resource. There would thus remain to be received out of the six hundred million, four hundred million in money, which would defray the necessities for the first two months, for the expenditure of this year (year IV, 1795, 1796,) was estimated at one thousand five hundred million.

Certain opponents of the directory, who, without troubling themselves very much about the state of the country, and only cared to thwart the new government at any rate, raised the most alarming objections. This loan, said they, was running away with all the money in France; she even had not enough to pay it! as if the state, in taking four hundred million in metal, would not bring them back into the circulation, by purchasing corn, cloth, leather, iron, &c. All that the state was going to burn was paper. The question was, whether France could immediately give four hundred million in articles of consumption and merchandize, and burn two hundred million in paper which was ostentatiously called twenty thousand million. She certainly could. The only inconvenience was in the mode of collection, which might be vexatious, and thereby be rendered less productive; but no one knew how to effect this! To limit the assignats to thirty thousand million, that is to say, not to provide more than one hundred real millions beforehand, then to destroy the plate, and then to let the state depend upon the alienation of the revenue of the forests, and the disposal of the debentures, that is to say, on the issue of a volunteer paper, would have appeared too venturesome a course. In the uncertainty as to what could be done with a free will, the councils thought it best to compel the French to pay more than usual.

By means of the forced loan, it was said a part at least of the paper would be got in; it would be got in with a certain quantity of money; then again there would still be the plate, which would have acquired more value by the absorption of the greater part of the assignats. At all events, other ways and means were not to be discarded solely on this account; it was settled that a part of the national property should be debentured, a lengthy operation, for it was necessary to mention every item of property in the debentures, and then to make a bargain with the financial companies. A decree was passed for putting up to sale the houses situated in towns, of lands under three hundred arpents, and lastly, of the possessions of the Belgian clergy. The late royal residences, Fontainebleau, Versailles, and Compiègne excepted, were also to be disposed of. The moveable property of the emigrants was also to be sold forthwith. All these sales were to be made by auction.

The government durst not yet decree the reduction of assignats to the course of exchange, which would have put an end to the greatest mischief of all, that of ruining all those who received them, private individuals as well as the state. It was apprehended that they would by this simple measure be all at once destroyed; however, it was arranged that in the forced loan they should be received at one hundred for one; that in the payment of arrears of taxes they should be received at their full value, in order to encourage the payment of those arrears, which were to bring in thirteen thousand million; that the repayment of the principal should be still suspended; but that the annuities and interest of all kinds should be paid at the rate of ten for one, which again would be very burdensome upon those who received their income at that rate. The payment of the land-tax and rents of farms was retained upon the old footing, that is to say, half in kind and half in assignats. The customs were to be paid half in assignats and half in money. This exception was made in respect of the customs, because there was plenty of money on the frontiers. There was likewise an exception in regard to Belgium. The assignats had not made their way thither; it was decided that the forced loan, and the taxes, should there be taken in money.

It was therefore not without some misgivings that the government returned to money, and durst not boldly cut the knot, as is always done in such cases. Thus the forced loan, the sale of national property, the arrears, by getting in considerable quantities of paper, enabled the government to issue more. Moreover, they might fairly reckon upon some receipts in money.

Next to the regulations of finance, the two most important determinations related to desertion, and to the mode of nominating the public officials who had not yet been elected. The one had in view the reformation of the armies, the other to perfect the organization of the communes and tribunals.

Desertion on foreign service, a crime extremely rare, was to be punished with death. A warm discussion took place relative to the penalty to be inflicted on seducing soldiers from their allegiance. Notwithstanding the opposition, it was made punishable precisely as for desertion to the enemy. All furloughs granted to young men of the requisition were to expire in ten days. The prosecution of the young men who had abandoned their colours, which had been entrusted to the municipalities, was lenient and ineffective; this was transferred to the gendarmerie. Desertion on home service was made punishable by imprisonment for the first offence, and with hard labour for the second. The great requisition of August, 1793, the only measure of recruiting that had been adopted, produced men enough to fill the armies; it had sufficed for the last three years to keep them on a respectable footing, and might yet have been sufficient for that purpose, with the aid of a new law to ensure its being carried into execution. The new arrangements were combated by the opposition, which tended naturally to diminish the action of the government, but they were adopted by the majority of the two councils.

A great number of the electoral assemblies, in a state of disturbance by reason of the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, had let the time run by, and had not completed the nomination of the individuals who were to compose the local administrations and the tribunals. Such of them as were situated in the provinces of the west had not been able to do so, on account of the civil war. Others had neglected it altogether. The conventionalist majority, to ensure an assimilation of the government, together with an assimilation entirely revolutionary, wished that the directory should have the nominations. It is natural that the government should inherit all those rights that the citizens relinquish, that is, that the action of the government should supply the deficiency of individuals. Thus, in those cases where the assemblies had suffered the constitutional term to elapse, where they had not desired to exercise their rights, it was natural that the directory should be called upon to nominate. The convocation of new assemblies would be repugnant to the constitution, which prohibited such a course; it would be encouraging rebellion against the laws; in short, it would be the commencement of fresh disturbances. Moreover, there were relative analogies in the constitution by which the question would be determined in favour of the directory. Thus the directory was empowered to make the nominations in the colonies, and to reappoint to the places of the public officials who had died or resigned in the interval between one election and another. The opposition did not fail to attack this line of conduct. Dumolard in the council of the five hundred, Portalis, Dupont (of Nemours), and Tronçon-Ducoudray, in the council of the ancients, argued that this was to confer a royal prerogative on the directory. This minority, which had a secret bias in favour of monarchy, rather than the republic, here changed sides with the republican majority, and maintained democratic ideas to an extreme of absurdity. In other respects, an animated and solemn discussion was not disturbed by any violent language. The directory had the nominations, on the sole condition of making its selection from among those who had already been honoured with the suffrages of the people. Principles led to this demonstration; but policy would recommend still further. The directory avoided making new elections at the present moment, and a greater uniformity was imparted to the entire administration, the tribunals, and the government.

The directory had, therefore, the means of procuring funds, of recruiting the army, and of completing the organization of the administration and of justice. The directory possessed a majority in the two councils. A temporary opposition sprang up, it is true, in the five hundred and in the ancients, some few voices of the new third cavilled at its prerogatives; but this opposition was calm and decorous; it seemed to respect the extraordinary situation and the arduous labour of the directory. Without doubt it also respected in this government, elected by the conventionalists and upheld by them, the still all-powerful and highly-irritated revolution. The five directors had each borne their portion of the general task. Barras took the conduct of the public offices, and Carnot the direction of the armies; Rewbell the foreign department; Letourneur and Laréveillère-Lépeaux the home department. They nevertheless deliberated in common on all important measures. For a long time their furniture was of the meanest description; but at length they had obtained from the Garde Meuble such things as were necessary for fitting up the Luxembourg, and they began to represent the French republic in a respectable manner. Their ante-chambers were full of applicants, from whom it was not always easy to make a selection. The directory, consistent with its origin and its nature, always selected men of the most decided character. Having taken warning from the insurrection of the 13th Vendémiaire, it had provided itself with a considerable and imposing force to protect Paris and the seat of the government from a fresh coup-de-main. Young Bonaparte, who had figured on the 13th Vendémiaire, had been appointed to the command of this army, called the army of the interior. He had entirely reorganized and stationed it at the camp of Grenelle. He had collected into a single regiment, under the title of the "police legion," a party of those patriots who had offered their services on the 13th Vendémiaire. These patriots, for the greatest part, belonged to the old gendarmerie, disbanded after the 9th Thermidor, which was itself formed of none other than old soldiers of the French guards. Bonaparte next organized the constitutional guard of the directory, and that of the councils. This imposing and well-directed force was capable of overawing everybody, and keeping the parties within due bounds.

Steady in its course, the directory declared itself still more decidedly on a great number of measures of detail. It still abstained from notifying its installation to the conventional deputies on mission in the departments. It enjoined all the managers of theatres not to suffer any other air to be sung than the Marseillaise. The Reveil du Peuple was prohibited. This measure was deemed puerile: it would certainly have been more dignified to prohibit all songs whatever; but it was desirable to enliven the republican enthusiasm, unfortunately getting lukewarm. The directory caused some royalist journals, which had continued to write with the same violence as in Vendémiaire, to be prosecuted. Although the liberty of the press was unfettered, the law of the convention against writers who should advocate the restoration of royalty, still afforded the means of suppression in very bad cases. Richer-Serizy was prosecuted; depositions were taken against Lemaître and Brottier, whose correspondence with Verona, London, and La Vendée evidenced their being royalist agents, and demonstrated the operation of their influence in the disturbances of Vendémiaire. Lemaître was condemned to death as the principal agent; Brottier was acquitted. It was ascertained that two secretaries of the committee of public welfare had handed them over some important papers. The three deputies, Saladin, Lhomond, and Rovère, put under arrest on account of the 13th Vendémiaire, but after their re-election had been declared by the electoral assembly of Paris, were reinstated by the two councils, on the ground that they were already deputies at the time they had been proceeded against, and that the forms prescribed by the constitution in regard to deputies, had not been observed. Cormatin, and the Chouans seized with him, as violators of the pacification, were also brought to trial. Cormatin was transported for having secretly continued to foment civil war; the others were acquitted, to the great displeasure of the patriots, who complained bitterly of the indulgence of the tribunals.

The conduct of the directory with respect to the minister of the court of Florence proved still more strongly the republican rigour of its sentiments. It had been at length arranged with Austria to deliver up to her the daughter of Louis XVI. sole relief of the family that had been confined in the Temple, on condition that the deputies betrayed to Austria by Dumouriez should be given up to the French advanced posts. The princess set out from the Temple on the 28th Frimaire (December the 19th). The minister of the interior went himself to fetch her, and conduct her with the greatest respect to his hotel, whence she set out accompanied by persons of her own selection. An ample provision was made for her journey, and she was thus conveyed towards the frontiers. The royalists were not behindhand to make verses and remarks upon the unfortunate prisoner, at length restored to liberty. Count Carlette, that minister of Florence who had been sent to Paris on account of his known attachment to France and the revolution, applied to the directory for permission to see the princess, in his quality of minister of an allied court. That minister had become suspected, no doubt wrongfully, on account of his violent affectation of republicanism. One can hardly conceive how the minister of an absolute prince, and above all, of an Austrian prince, could entertain such an affectation. The only reply the directory gave him was an order to quit Paris immediately; but it declared at the same time, that this measure had reference to nothing but a personal objection to the envoy, and not to the court of Florence, with whom the French republic continued on terms of friendship.

It was now six weeks at most since the directory was instituted, and already it began to settle itself; the parties were reconciling themselves to the idea of an established government, and having no notion of overturning it, settled among themselves how they should oppose it within the limits marked out by the constitution. The patriots, not renouncing their favourite idea of a club, had assembled at the Pantheon; they sat there already to the amount of more than four thousand, and formed an assembly very much like that of the old Jacobins. Obedient, however, to the letter of the constitution, they had avoided what had been prohibited in respect of these meetings of citizens, namely, the organization of a political assembly. Thus they had no secretary; they had not provided themselves with certificates; the persons present were not divided into spectators and members; there existed neither correspondence or affiliation with other societies of the same nature. With these exceptions, the club possessed all the characteristics of the old parent society, and its passions, grown older, were only the more stubborn on that account.

The sectionists had formed themselves into societies more in accordance with their tastes and manners. At this time, as under the convention, they counted in their ranks some concealed royalists, but they were few in number; the greater part of them were enemies, from fear or complaisance, of the terrorists and the conventionalists whom they affected to confound, and whom they were vexed to find again almost all of them in the new government. They had formed themselves into societies where they read the newspapers, and where they conversed upon political affairs with the politeness and in the style of the withdrawing-rooms, and where reading and conversation was followed by dancing and music. The winter set in, and these gentry indulged in pleasure as an act of opposition to the revolutionary system, a system nobody thought of reviving, for the Saint-Justs, Robespierres, and Couthons were no longer there to bring us back by terror to a state of things that could not be endured.

Both parties had their respective journals. The patriots had Le Tribun du Peuple, L'Ami du Peuple, L'Eclair, Le Peuple, L'Orateur Pebléen, and Le Journal des Hommes Libres; these newspapers were thoroughly Jacobin. La Quotidienne, L'Eclair, Le Veridique, Le Postillon, Le Messager, and La Feuille du Jour, passed for royalist papers. The patriots, in their club and their journals, although the government certainly was strongly attached to the revolution, showed themselves highly irritated. Certain it is they were out of temper not so much with the government as with the events themselves. The reverses on the Rhine, the new movements in La Vendée, the alarming financial crisis, afforded them sufficient ground, as they conceived, for reverting to their favourite ideas. If the armies were beaten, if the assignats fell, it was because the government was indulgent, because it knew not how to recur to great revolutionary expedients. The new financial system, in particular, which discovered a desire to abolish the assignats, and which afforded a glimpse of their speedy abolition, had greatly alienated the patriots.

Their adversaries needed no other cause of complaint than this very irritation. Terror, according to them, was about to be revived. Its advocates were incorrigible; the directory would have enough to do if it did all they desired; they were never satisfied; they were again in agitation; they had reopened the old den of the Jacobins, and there they were constantly preparing every species of atrocity.

Such were the operations of the government, the progress of public opinion, and the state of parties, in Frimaire, year IV. (November and December, 1795.)

The military operations, continued in spite of the season, began to promise more propitious results, and to afford the new administration some compensation for its arduous efforts. The zeal with which Jourdan had advanced into the Hunsrück across a frightful country, and without any of the necessities which could have assuaged the sufferings of his army, had somewhat restored our affairs on the Rhine. The Austrian generals, whose troops were as much worn out as ours, finding themselves exposed to a series of obstinately contested battles in the midst of winter, proposed an armistice, during which the imperial and the French armies should retain the positions they then occupied. The armistice was accepted, upon the condition of determining the same, ten days before the resumption of hostilities. The line which separated the two armies, following the Rhine from Dusseldorf to above Neuwied, left the river there, formed a semicircle from Bingen to Mannheim in passing along the base of the Vosges, rejoined the Rhine above Mannheim, and did not leave it all the way up to Bâle. Thus we had lost all that semicircle on the left bank. This was, after all, a loss which a simple well-conceived manœuvre might repair. The principal misfortune consisted in having lost for the moment the ascendancy of conquest. The armies, exhausted with fatigue, entered into cantonments, and all the necessary preparations began to be made for putting them in the following spring in a state to open a decisive campaign.

On the frontiers of Italy, the season had not yet wholly excluded military operations. The army of the eastern Pyrenees had been transferred to the Alps. Much time had been occupied in marching from Perpignan to Nice, and the want of provisions and shoes had rendered the march still slower. At length, towards the month of November, Angereau came with a fine division, which had already distinguished itself in the plains of Catalonia. Kellermann, as we have seen, had been compelled to draw back his right wing, and to relinquish the immediate communication with Genoa. He had his left on the high Alps, and his centre at the pass of the Tende. His right was placed behind the line called the line of Borghetto, one of the three which Bonaparte had reconnoitred and marked out in the preceding year, in case of a retreat. Devins, quite proud of his petty success, was staying in the Riviera of Genoa, and making a great show of his plans, without executing one of them. The brave Kellermann was impatiently awaiting the reinforcements from Spain, to resume the offensive and to recover his communication with Genoa. His desire was to terminate the campaign by a brilliant action, which should restore the Riviera to the French, afford them access to the Apennines and to Italy, and detach the king of Sardinia from the allied powers. Our ambassador in Switzerland, Barthélemy, was constantly repeating that a victory towards the maritime Alps would immediately ensure us peace with Piedmont, and the absolute cession of the line of the Alps. The French government agreed with Kellermann upon the necessity of making an attack, but not as to the plan to be adopted, and appointed Schérer to succeed him. Schérer who had gained some credit by his success at the battle of the Ourthe and in Catalonia, came up in the middle of Brumaire, and resolved to attempt a decisive action.

Every body knows that the chain of the Alps, when it takes the name of Apennines, runs very close to the Mediterranean from Albenga to Genoa, and leaves between the sea and the crest of the mountains only narrow and rapid slopes, scarcely three leagues in extent. On the opposite side, that is, towards the plains of the Po, the slopes decline gently over an extent of twenty leagues. The French army, placed on these inclined surfaces towards the sea, was encamped between the mountains and the sea. The Piedmontese army, under Colli, stationed in the intrenched camp below Ceva, on the other side of the Alps, guarded the entrance to Piedmont against the left of the French army. The Austrian army partly on the crest of the Apennines at Rocca-Barbauna, partly on the maritime slope in the basin of Loano, communicated thus with Colli by its right, occupied by its centre the crest of the mountains, and intercepted the line of coast by its left, so as to cut off our communications with Genoa. The observation of this state of things suggested an original thought. The entire force should be brought to bear upon the right and centre of the Austrian army, drive it from the crest of the Apennines, and carry the upper heights. It would thus be cut off from Colli, and the French marching rapidly along these crests, would enclose the left of the Austrian army in the basin of Loano between the mountains and the sea. Masséna, one of the generals of division, had first conceived this plan, and it was he who had proposed it to Kellermann. It occurred also to Schérer, and he determined upon carrying it into execution.

Devins, after making some attempts, during August and September, on our line of Borghetto, had given up all idea of making an attack for that year. He was ill, and had procured Wallis to succeed him. The officers thought of nothing else than indulging themselves in the winter at Genoa and its environs. Schérer, after having procured for his army some provisions and twenty-four thousand pairs of shoes, of which it was in absolute want, fixed his movement for the 2nd Frimaire (November the 23rd). He went with thirty-six thousand men to attack forty-five thousand; but the excellent selection of the point of attack compensated for the inequality of force. He directed Augereau to drive the left of the enemy into the basin of Loano; he ordered Masséna to fall upon their centre at Rocca-Barbenue, and to make himself master of the summit of the Apennines; lastly, Serrurier was to keep Colli in check who formed the right on the opposite slope. Augereau, while pushing the Austrian right into the basin of Loano, had no quick movement to execute; Masséna, on the contrary, was to file rapidly along the crests, and turn the basin of Loano, in order to enclose therein the left of the Austrian army; and Serrurier was to mislead Colli by feint attacks.

On the morning of the 2nd Frimaire (November 23rd, 1795) the French cannon awoke the Austrians, who little expected a battle. The officers hastened from Loano and from Finale to put themselves at the head of their astonished troops. Augereau made his attack with vigour, but without precipitation. He was stopped by the brave Roccaovina. This general, stationed on a small eminence in the middle of the basin of Loano, defended it with obstinacy, and suffered himself to be surrounded by Augereau's division, still refusing to surrender. When completely surrounded, he rushed headlong upon the line that held him in, and rejoined the Austrian army, making his way through a French brigade.

Schérer, repressing the ardour of Augereau, obliged him to use his musketry before Loano, that he might not push the Austrians too speedily on their line of retreat. Meanwhile Masséna, to whom the brilliant part of the plan was committed, guined with that vigour and boldness which distinguished him on all occasions, the crests of the Apennines, surprised d'Argenteau, who commanded the right of the Austrians, threw him in extreme disorder, drove him from all positions, and encamped in the evening on the heights of Mologno, which formed the circuit of the basin of Loano, and closed it from behind Serrurier by firm and well-conceived attacks, had kept Colli and the whole right of the enemy in check.

In the evening of the 2nd, the troops encamped, during extremely bad weather, on the positions they had occupied. On the morning of the 3rd, Schérer continued his operations; Serrurier, having been reinforced, began to attack Colli more seriously, in order to cut him off entirely from his allies; Masséna continued to occupy all the crests and outlets of the Apennines; Augereau, no longer restraining himself, vigorously pushed the Austrians, whose rear had been intercepted. From that moment they commenced their retreat, in very bad weather, and by miserable roads. Their right and centre fled in disorder on the other side of the Apennines; their left, shut up between the mountains and the sea, retired with difficulty along the shore by the road of La Corniche. A storm of wind and snow prevented so active a pursuit as might otherwise have taken place; nevertheless, five thousand prisoners, several thousand killed, forty pieces of cannon, and vast stores, were the fruit of this battle, one of the most disastrous the allies had experienced from the commencement of

Piedmont was in consternation at the intelligence; Italy gave itself for lost, and was only tranquillized by considering that the season was too far advanced for the French to follow up their operations. The extent of the stores did much towards assuaging the hardships and the privations of the army. A victory so important as this was much wanted to revive hope, and to confirm the new government. This victory was made public, and hailed with delight by all true patriots.

At the same moment, affairs took a no less favourable turn in the provinces of the west. Hoche, having increased the army which kept guard over the Vendées to forty-four thousand men, having placed intrenched posts on the Nantes Sèvre, so as to cut off Stofflet from Charette, having dispersed the first body of men got together by the latter chief, also watching by means of a camp at Souffans the whole coast of the Marais, was in a condition to oppose a landing. The English squadron, at anchor off the Isle-Dieu, was on the contrary in a very melancholy position. The island on which the expedition had so injudiciously landed, presented nothing but a surface without any shelter, without resources, and less than three quarters of a league in extent. The shore of the island offered no safe anchorage. The ships were there exposed to all the fury of the wind upon a rocky bottom, which cut their cables, and placed them every night in the greatest danger. The opposite coast, on which it was proposed to land, was one vast beach, without any depth of water, where the waves were always breaking, and where boats, taken aback by the breakers, could not reach the shore without running the risk of foundering. Every day increased the dangers of the English squadron and the resources of Hoche. It was now six weeks that the French prince had been at the Isle-Dieu. All the envoys of the Chouans and the Vendéans surrounded him; and mingling with his staff, offered their suggestions all at once, and strove to obtain their adoption. Every one of them was desirous of having the prince in his own power; but they all agreed that he ought to land as soon as possible, no matter to what point the preference was given.

It must be confessed that owing to this stay of six weeks at Isle-Dieu, in sight of the coast, to make a descent had become no easy matter. Neither a landing or the crossing a river ought ever to be subjected to delay or hesitation, for it is these that put the enemy on his guard, and point out to him the intended spot. The determination to land on the coast being once taken, and all the leaders acquainted therewith, the descent should have been effected suddenly, and that upon a point which would have allowed a communication to exist with the English squadron, and on which point the Vendéans and the Chouans could have brought a considerable force to bear. Certainly, if the descent had been made on the coast without threatening it so long, forty thousand royalists of Brittany and La Vendée might have been collected before Hoche could have had time to put his regiments in motion. When we recollect what happened at Quiberon, the facility with which the landing was effected, and the time that it took to assemble the republican troops, we can easily understand how easily the present descent could have been effected, had it not been preceded by a long cruise off the coast. While, in the preceding expedition, the name of Puisaye neutralized all the leaders, the name of the prince in this latter expedition would have rallied them all, and would have roused twenty departments. It is true that the new invaders would afterwards have had severe battles to fight, that they would have had to run the same risks that Stofflet and Charette had encountered for the last three years, that they would have been obliged to disperse perhaps before the enemy, to run away like guerilla troops, to hide themselves in the woods, to reappear, hide again, and, lastly, to run the risk of being taken and shot. Such is the price to be paid for thrones. There was nothing derogatory in playing the Chouan (chouanner) in the forests of Brittany, or in the marshes and moors of La Vendée. A prince issuing from those retreats to ascend the throne of his ancestors, would not have been less glorious than Gustavus Vasa, emerging from the mines of Dalecarlia. Moreover, it is probable that the presence of the prince would have excited such zeal in the royalist countries, that a numerous army, continually at his side, would have permitted him to attempt enterprises of importance. It is probable that none of those about him would have had sufficient genius to conquer the young plebeian who commanded the republican army; but at least they might have made a stand before he did conquer them. A defeat is not frequently without its consolations. Francis I. found many consolatory circumstances in the defeat he suffered at Pavia.

Assuming that a landing could have been effected at the instant the squadron arrived, it was no longer practicable after waiting six weeks at the Isle-Dieu. The English seamen declared that it would soon be impossible to keep at sea, and that some determination must be come to; the whole coast of Charette's country was covered with troops; there was no possibility of landing unless beyond the Loire, near the mouth of the Vilaine, or in the country of Scépeaux, or in Brittany, where Puisaye was. But the emigrants and the prince would not land any where but where Charette was, for he was the only person on whom they relied. Now the thing was impracticable on Charette's coast. The prince, according to the assertion of M. de Vauban, solicited the English ministry to recall him. The ministry at first refused, not desiring that the cost of its expedition should have been uselessly incurred. However, it left the prince at liberty to pursue whatever course he thought proper.

From that moment every preparation was made for departure. Long and useless instructions for the royalist chiefs were drawn up. They were told that superior orders prevented for a moment the effecting a descent; that MM. Charette, Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Scépeaux were to settle among themselves to collect a force of twenty-five or thirty thousand men beyond the Loire, which, joined with the Bretons, might form a picked regiment of forty or fifty thousand men, sufficient to protect the landing of the prince; that the point where the descent was to take place should be pointed out so soon as these preliminary measures should have been taken; and that all the resources of the English monarchy would be called into action to second the efforts of the royalist countries. To these instructions were added a few thousand pounds sterling for each chief, some muskets, and a small quantity of powder. These things were landed at night on the coast of Brittany. The provisions with which the English had loaded their squadron were spoiled and thrown into the sea. They were obliged also to cast overboard the five hundred horses belonging to the English cavalry and artillery, for they were almost all diseased from being so long at sea.

The English squadron set sail on the 15th November (Brumaire 26th), and its departure left the royalists in consternation. They were told that it was the English who had obliged the princes to go back; they were indignant, and again gave vent to their utter abhorrence of English perfidy. Charette was the most enraged, and he had some reason to be so, for he was the most compromised. Charette had taken up arms again in the hope of a great expedition, in the hope of immense means, which would counterbalance the inequality of force between him and the republicans; this hope being fallacious, he saw nothing before him but certain and speedy destruction. The threat of a descent had drawn down upon him all the forces of the republicans; and this time he was obliged to give up every hope of reconciling matters; all that he could expect was to be shot without mercy, and without even having any right to complain of an enemy who had already so generously pardoned him on a former occasion.

He resolved to sell his life as dearly as he could, and to employ his last moments in struggling against despair. He fought several actions, in order to get upon the rear of Hoche, break through the line of the Nantes Sèvre, throw himself into Stofflet's country, and compel this colleague to resume his hostilities. He was unsuccessful, and was brought back into the Marais by Hoche's columns. Sapinaud, whom he had prevailed upon to resume hostilities, surprised the town of Montaignu, and desired to make his way as far as Châtillon; but he was stopped before that place, beaten, and obliged to disperse his men. The line of the Sèvre could not be carried. Stofflet, in the rear of that fortified line, was obliged to keep quiet, and besides, he was not disposed to resume hostilities. He beheld with secret pleasure the destruction of a rival who had been loaded with titles, and who had wished to deliver him up to the republicans. Scépeaux, between the Loire and the Vilaine, durst not yet stir. Brittany was disorganized by internal dissension. The division of Morbihan, commanded by George Cadoudal, had revolted against Puisaye at the instigation of the emigrants who surrounded the French prince, and who had retained their old resentment against Puisaye. They wanted to deprive him of the command of Brittany, but it was the division of Morbihan alone that would not acknowledge the authority of the generalissimo.

Such was the state of things when Hoche commenced the great work of pacification. This young general, a skilful politician and soldier, clearly perceived that he must no longer endeayour to conquer an enemy with whom it was impossible to grapple, and who was not to be reached by the mere force of arms. He had already despatched several moveable columns in pursuit of Charette; but heavily-armed soldiers, obliged to carry every thing about them, and who did not know the country, could not equal the speed of peasants carrying nothing but their musket, who were always certain of finding provisions wherever they went, who well knew the smallest ravines and the dreariest moors. Consequently he immediately ordered all pursuit to cease, and digested a scheme which, being followed up with firmness and perseverance, could hardly fail in restoring peace to those desolated countries.

The Vendean was at once peasant and soldier. Amidst the horrors of civil war, he had never ceased to cultivate his fields and to attend to his cattle. His musket was at his side, concealed in the ground, or under straw. At the first signal of his leaders, he hastened to them, attacked the republicans, then stole away through the woods, returned to his fields, and again concealed his gun; and the republicans found but an unarmed peasant, in whom they could not by any means recognize an enemy soldier. Thus it was that the Vendéans fought, subsisted, and continued to be almost inaccessible. While they at all times had the means of annoying and of increasing their numbers, the republican armies, whom a ruined administration could no longer support, were in want of every thing, and found themselves in a state of the most awful destitution.

The Vendéans could not be affected by the war, except by devastating the country; an experiment that had been tried during the time of terror, but which had only excited a bitter hatred, without putting an end to the civil war.

Hoche conceived an ingenious mode of reducing the country without laying it waste, by depriving it of its arms, and taking part of its produce for the supply of the republican army. In the first place, he was determined in fixing some intrenched camps, some of which, situated on the Sèvre, cut off Charette from Stofflet, while others protected Nantes, the coast, and Sables. He then formed a circular line, supported by the Sèvre and the Loire, so as to progressively coop in the whole country. This line was composed of very strong posts, communicating with each other by patrols, in such a manner as to leave no free space by which an enemy who was at all numerous could pass. These posts were directed to occupy every township and village, and to disarm the inhabitants. To accomplish this, they were to seize the cattle, which usually grazed in common, and the corn preserved in the barns; they were also to arrest the principal inhabitants, and by no means to restore the cattle and the corn, or release the persons taken as hostages, till the peasants should have voluntarily surrendered their arms. Now as the Vendéans were more attached to their cattle and their corn than to the Bourbons and Charette, it was certain enough that they would surrender their arms. In order not to be deceived by the peasants, who might give up a few bad firelocks and keep the others, the officers charged with the disarming were to make them produce the registers of enrolment kept in every parish, and to call for as many muskets as there were persons enrolled. In default of these registers, they were enjoined to make an estimate of the population, and to require a number of muskets equal to one-fourth of the male portion. After having received the arms, they were faithfully to restore the cattle and the corn, with the exception of a part to be levied in advance by the name of a tax, and to be collected in storehouses formed on the rear of that line. Hoche had directed that the inhabitants should be treated with the utmost mildness, and that the most scrupulous punctuality should be observed in restoring their cattle, their corn, and especially their hostages. He had particularly recommended to the officers to have personal intercourse with them, to treat them well, to send them even sometimes to his head quarters, and to make them presents of corn or other things. He had also enjoined the greatest respect to be paid to the clergymen. The Vendéans, said he, have but one unaffected feeling, that is, attachment to their priests. Those latter require nought else than protection and tranquillity; let us ensure both to them; let us even add some kindnesses, and the affections of the country will be our return.

That line, which he called the disarming line, was to encircle Lower Vendée, to advance by degrees, and at length to inclose it entirely. As it advanced, it left behind it the country disarmed, reduced, nay, even reconciled with the republic. It did more; protection was afforded against a return of the insurgent leaders, who usually visited submission to the republic and the surrender of arms by laying waste the country. Two moveable columns preceded this line, to give battle to those leaders and to seize them if possible; and shortly by hemming them in closer and closer, it must inevitably coop them up and secure them. The utmost attention was enjoined to all commandants of posts, so as to keep them constantly in communication by means of patrols, and to prevent the armed bands from breaking through the line, and again transferring the war to the rear. But in spite of all their care, it might so happen that Charette and some of his coadjutors would elude the vigilance of the posts, and pass the disarming line; yet even in this case, which was practicable, they could only pass with a few persons, and they would then find themselves in countries that were disarmed, restored to tranquillity and security, pacified by kind treatment, and intimidated besides by that small-meshed drag-net of troops which encompassed the country. The possibility of a revolt in the rear had been provided against. Hoche had given orders that one of the moveable columns should immediately go back and transfer themselves to the insurgent commune, and that to punish it for not having surrendered all its arms, and for having again made use of them, its cattle and corn should be taken away and the principal inhabitants seized. The effect of these corrections was certain; and as they were administered with justice, they would not excite hatred, but rather a salutary fear.

Hoche's plan was immediately carried into execution in the months of Brumaire and Frimaire (November and December). The disarming line passing through Saint-Gilles, Légé, Montaigu, and Chantonnay, formed a semicircle, the right extremity of which was supported by the sea and the left by the river Lay, its object being to gradually confine Charette to morasses from whence there was no escape. This was a plan the success of which would particularly depend upon the manner of its execution. Hoche issued his instructions to his officers in a sensible and intelligent manner, and was extremely active in personally attending to all the details. This was not merely a war, it was rather a great military operation, which demanded as much prudence as vigour. The inhabitants soon began to surrender their arms, and to become reconciled with the republican troops. Hoche afforded relief to the indigent from the storehouses of the army; he personally visited the inhabitants detained as hostages, caused them to be kept a few days, and sent them away satisfied. To some he gave cockades, to others police caps, sometimes even corn to such as had none for sowing their fields. He was in correspondence with the clergy, who placed great confidence in him, and acquainted him with all the secrets of the country. He thus began to acquire a great moral influence, a real power, with which he must necessarily terminate such a war. In the mean time, the storehouses formed on the rear of the disarming line were gradually filling with corn; great herds of cattle were collected; and the army began to live in abundance through this simple expedient of levying a tax and mulcts in kind.

Charette had concealed himself in the woods, with a hundred or one hundred and fifty men as desperate as himself. Sapinaud, who at his instigation had again resumed hostilities, begged to lay down his arms this second time, on the mere condition that his life should be spared. Stofflet, cooped up in Anjou with his minister Bernier, received there all the officers who had forsaken Charette and Sapinaud, and did his best to enrich himself with their spoils. He kept at his quarters at Lavoir a sort of court, composed of emigrants and officers. He enlisted men and levied contributions, upon pretext of organizing the local militia. Hoche watched him very attentively, hemmed him in closer and closer by intrenched camps, and threatened him with a speedy disarming, on the first occasion of displeasure. An expedition that Hoche despatched into the Loroux, a district which had a sort of independent existence, not acknowledging obedience either to the republic or any leader, struck terror into Stofflet. Hoche sent this expedition to bring away the wine and the corn, both very abundant in the Loroux, and with which the city of Nantes was completely unprovided. Stofflet was alarmed, and solicited an interview with Hoche. He wanted to make protestation of his adherence to the treaty, to intercede for Sapinaud and the Chouans, and make himself in some measure the mediator of a new pacification, and thus secure himself by a prolongation of his influence. He wished also to discover Hoche's intentions in regard to himself. Hoche told him plainly of what it was the republic had to complain; and intimated that if he afforded shelter to the brigands, if he continued to levy men and money, if he wanted to be any thing more than the temporary chief of the police of Anjou, and to play the part of prince, he would carry him off immediately, and then disarm his province. Stoff-let promised the utmost obedience, and retired full of apprehensions respecting the future.

Hoche had at that time far greater difficulties to encounter. He had attached to his army a portion of the two armies of Brest and Cherbourg. The imminent danger of a descent on the coast had procured him these reinforcements, which had increased the number of the troops collected in La Vendée to forty-four thousand men. The generals commanding the armies of Brest and Cherbourg were calling for the troops which they had lent, and the directory seemed to countenance their claims. Hoche wrote that the operation which he had commenced, was one of the utmost importance; that if the troops which he had spread like a close drag-net around the Marais were taken from him, the submission of Charette's district, and the destruction of that leader, which would be soon accomplished, would be indefinitely delayed; that it would be better to finish what was so far advanced, before going away elsewhere; that he would then lose no time in returning the troops he had borrowed, and would even send his own to the general commanding in Brittany, so as to apply to that country those measures, the good effects of which had been already experienced in La Vendée. The government, struck with the reasons of Hoche, and reposing the utmost confidence in him, called him to Paris, with the intention of approving all his plans, and giving him the command of the three armies of La Vendée, Brest, and Cherbourg. He was summoned thither at the end of Frimaire, to consult with the directory upon those operations which were to put an end to this the most calamitous warfare of all.

Thus terminated the campaign of 1795. The reduction of Luxembourg, the passage of the Rhine, the victories in the Pyrenees, followed by the peace with Spain, and the destruction of the emigrant army at Quiberon, distinguished the beginning and the middle of this year. The end was not so prosperous. The return of the armies across the Rhine, the loss of the lines of Mentz, and a portion of ground at the base of the Vosges, momentarily obscured the brilliancy of our triumphs. But the victory of Loano, opening to us an entrance into Italy, reasserted the superiority of our arms; and the operations of Hoche in the west commenced the real pacification of La Vendée, which had been so often and so vainly predicted.

The league of the allied powers confined to England, Austria, and a few princes of Germany and Italy, had reached the limit of its operations, and but for its recent victories on the Rhine would have sought for peace. These gained Clerfaut an immense reputation; and it seemed to be the opinion that the next campaign would open in the heart of our provinces on the Rhine.

Pitt, who required supplies, summoned parliament again for autumn, in order to call for fresh impositions. The people of London were quite as anxious as ever for peace. A society called the corresponding society had met in the open air, and had voted the boldest and most threatening addresses against the war system, and urging parliamentary reform. When the king went to open the parliament, his carriage was pelted with stones, the glasses were broken, and it was even believed that he had been shot at from an air-

gun. Pitt, passing through London streets on horseback, was recognized by the populace, pursued to his own house, and covered with mud. Fox and Sheridan, more eloquent than they had ever been, called him severely to account. Holland conquered, the Netherlands incorporated with the French republic, their conquest rendered in some measure absolute by the reduction of Luxembourg, enormous sums spent on La Vendée, and unfortunate Frenchmen exposed to be shot without any sufficiently adequate motive, were grave accusations against the judgment and policy of the ministry. The expedition to Quiberon, in particular, excited universal indignation. Pitt attempted to excuse himself by saying that no English blood had been spilt. "True," replied Sheridan, with an energy which it is difficult to transfer to another language; "true, English blood has not been spilt, but English honour has oozed from every pore." Pitt, quite as unimpassioned as ever, styled all the events of the year misfortunes, for which those who run the risks of war should always be prepared; but he made the most of the recent victories of Austria on the Rhine; he greatly magnified their importance, and the facilities which they were likely to afford for a treaty with France. According to his custom, he asserted that our republic was fast approaching the limit of its power; that an inevitable bankruptcy was about to plunge it into utter confusion and impotence; that by continuing the war a year longer, the allies had gained a great point, that of reducing the common enemy to extremity. He solemnly promised, that when the new French government should appear to stand on a firmer footing, and to assume a regular form, he would seize the first opportunity for negotiation. He then asked for a new loan of three millions sterling, and for enactments against the press and the political societies, to which he attributed the outrages committed upon the king and himself. The opposition replied that the alleged victories on the Rhine were victories to endure no longer than a few days; that defeats in Italy had in fact just destroyed the effect of the advantages obtained in Germany; that this republic always reduced to the last extremities, recovered itself more vigorously at the opening of each campaign; that the assignats had long been abandoned, that they had performed their office, that the resources of France were elsewhere, and besides, if France were exhausting herself, Great Britain was exhausting herself far more rapidly; that the debt, every day increasing, was overwhelming, and must soon crush the three kingdoms. So far as concerned the enactments against the press and the political societies, Fox, in a transport of indignation, declared that if they were adopted, the English people would have no resource left but resistance, and that he considered resistance no longer as a question of right, but rather as a prudential measure. This holding forth the right of insurrection excited a great tumult, which terminated by the demands of Pitt being voted; he got a new loan as well as his restrictive measures voted, and he promised to open a negotiation as soon as possible. The parliament was prorogued to the 2nd of February, 1796, (13 Pluviôse, year IV.)

Pitt never gave himself a single thought of peace. He merely meant to make a few outward manifestations, and as a sop to public opinion, and to facilitate the obtaining his loan. The possession of the Netherlands by France made the very idea of peace irreconcilable with his ideas. In point of fact, he made up his mind to seize an opportunity for opening a feigned negotiation, and offering conditions that he knew could not be assented to.

Austria, in order to satisfy the empire, which cried out for peace, had caused overtures to be made through Denmark. This power had proposed, on behalf of Austria, to the French government, the formation of an European congress; to which the French government made answer that a congress would render all negotiation impracticable, for there were too many conflicting interests to be reconciled; that if Austria was desirous of peace, she had but to make direct overtures for it: that France desired to treat individually with all her enemies, and to settle matters with them without any mediator. This was a proper answer to make; for a congress would only confound the peace that was made with Austria with the peace between England and the empire, and render it impracticable. Besides all this, Austria required no other answer, for she did not mean to negotiate. She had lost too much, and her recent successes had led her to hope too much, for her to consent to lay down her arms. She strove to infuse courage into the king of Piedmont, who was greatly alarmed at the victory of Loano; and promised him a numerous army and another general for the ensuing campaign. The honours of a triumph were decreed to general Clerfait, on his entry into Vienna; his carriage was drawn by the people; and court favour was added to the demonstrations of popular enthusiasm.

Thus ended for all Europe the fourth campaign of this memorable war.

CHAPTER II.

CONTINUATION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE OPERATIONS OF THE DIRECTORY.—MANIFESTATION OF PARTY FEELING IN THE LEGISLATIVE BODY.—INSTITUTION OF AN ANNIVERSARY FÊTE ON THE 21ST JANUARY.—RETURN OF BLUNNONVILLE THE EX-MINISTER OF WAR, AND THE REPRESENTATIVES GUINOTTE, CAMUS, BANCAL, LAMARQUE, AND DROUOT, BETRAYED TO THE ENEMY BY DUMOURIÈZ.—DISCONTENT OF THE JACOBINS. BARQUET'S NEWS-PAPER.—APPOINTMENT OF A MINISTER OF POLICE.—ALTERATION IN SOCIAL LIFE.—FINANCIAL EMBARRASMENTS; CREATION OF MANDATS.—BADGUEP'S CONSPIRACY.—OUR MILITARY POSITION. PLANS OF THE DIRECTORY.—PACIFICATION OF LA VENDEE; MILITARY EXECUTIONS UPON STOFFLET AND CHARLÉTTÉ.

The republican government was encouraged and strengthened by the events that had recently terminated the campaign. The convention, by uniting Belgium with France, and incorporating it with the constitutional territory, had imposed upon her successors the obligation not to treat with the enemy unless they gave up the line of the Rhine. It required renewed exertions and a new campaign, more decisive than the preceding, to compel the house of Austria and England to consent to our aggrandizement. To attain this end, the directory laboured with energy to put the armies in good condition, to put the finances on a better footing, and to suppress the factions.

The directory particularly directed its attention to the putting the laws relative to the young requisitionists in force, and compelled them under the severest penalties to rejoin the armies. No species of exemption was recognized, and in every district a commission of medical men sat to decide upon cases of physical disability. A great number of young men had thrust themselves into the administrations, where they plundered the republic, and showed the most vicious inclinations. The strictest orders were given that none were to be admitted into the public offices but those who belonged to the requisition. The finances, in particular, attracted the attention of the directory; it caused the forced loan of six hundred millions to be raised with extreme promptitude. But it was obliged to wait for the proceeds of that loan, for the alienation of the produce of the national forests, for the sale of the national properties of three hundred acres or more, and for the collection of the arrears of taxes; and in the mean time it was necessary to provide for expenses which unfortunately came all at once, because the installation of the new government was the time to which all payments were deferred, and because the winter was the season appointed for preparations for the next campaign. To anticipate the period of all these returns, the directory had been obliged to avail itself of the resource which the public had taken care it should retain, that of the assignats. But it had already issued in one month from twelve to fifteen thousand millions, in order to procure a few millions in money; and things had come to such a pitch that they could not pass them any where. The directory therefore conceived the idea of issuing a current paper at a short date, which should represent the revenue of the year, as is done in England with Exchequer-bills, and as we are now doing with royal bonds. It issued bills, termed *rescriptions, payable to bearer at the treasury, out of the money which was to come in immediately, either from the forced loan, which in Belgium was to be paid in money, or from the customs, or from the first engagements with the companies which should undertake the letting of the forests. At first it issued thirty millions of these "rescriptions," and soon raised them to sixty, by securing the assistance of bankers.

Financial companies were no longer prohibited. The directory was now considering how they could be made available in the creation of a bank, so useful to public credit at a time when it was imagined that all the money had gone out of France. The directory formed a company, and proposed to allow it a certain quantity of national property, to serve for the capital of a bank. This bank was to issue notes, which would have lands for their pledge, and would be payable at sight like all bank notes. It was to lend to the state these notes to an amount proportionate to the lands given in pledge. This was, as is plainly perceivable, another mode of drawing upon the value of the national property: it was, in fact, nothing more than the substitution of bank notes for the assignats.

This was by no means a sure scheme, but in its unfortunate situation the government tried every thing, and was right in doing so. Its most meritorious operation was abolishing the rations, and making articles of consumption saleable without restriction. We have seen what trouble it cost the government to bring corn to Paris; and what an expense was entailed upon the treasury, which paid for the corn in hard money, and sold it again to the people of the capital for nominal value. The government was scarcely repaid a two hundredth part of the expense, and thus the republic was not far short from having the entire population of Paris to maintain in food.

The new minister of the interior, Benezec, who had felt the inconvenience of this system, and who conceived that circumstances would allow its abandonment, advised the directory to have the courage so to do. Trade began to be brisk; corn began to be publicly sold; the people insisted on being paid their wages in cash, and thenceforward they could manage to buy bread, which was moderate enough for ready money. Benezec accordingly proposed to the directory that the distribution of rations should be discontinued, as they were only paid in assignats, and to continue them only to the indigent, or to the annuitants and the public functionaries, whose annual income was under a thousand crowns. With the exception of these three classes, every body else was to supply themselves at the bakers by buying bread without restriction.

This was a bold measure, and required real courage. The directory carried it into immediate execution, regardless of the rage which it might excite in the populace, and the means of disturbance it might afford the two factions conspiring against the tranquillity of the republic.

Besides these measures, the directory devised others which could not be less prejudicial to individuals, but which were quite as necessary. That which the armies particularly stood in need of, and which they always want at the end of a long war, was a supply of horses. The directory applied to the two councils for authority to levy all horses kept for pleasure, and to take every thirtieth horse employed in tillage and draught on paying for it. The receipt for the horse was to be taken in payment of taxes. This measure, though harsh, was indispensable, and was adopted.

The two councils seconded the directory, and manifested the same spirit, with the exception of the still moderate opposition of the minority. Some discussions had arisen relative to the verification of the powers upon the law of the 3rd Brumaire, the law of inheritance in respect to emigrants, the priests, and the occurrences in the south, and parties had begun to manifest themselves.

The verification of the powers had been referred to a commission, which had numerous inquiries to make relative to the members whose qualifications could be contested. Its report, therefore, could not be made for a long time, and after more than two months' business had been gone through; it gave rise to many alterations respecting the application of the law of the 3rd Brumaire. This law, we all know, created an oblivion of all offences committed during the revolution, excepting such as related to the 13th Vendémiaire; it excluded from public offices the relatives of emigrants and those persons who, in the electoral assemblies, had set themselves in rebellion against the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor. This law had been the last energetic act of the conventional party, and was singularly obnoxious to men of moderate sentiments, as well as the counter-revolutionists who concealed themselves behind them. It was necessary to enforce this law with respect to several deputies, and especially to one Job Aymé, deputy of the Drôme, who had raised the electoral assembly of his department, and who was accused of belonging to the companies of Jesus. A member of the five hundred ventured even to demand a repeal of that law. This motion caused all the parties to throw off the reserve they had hitherto maintained. A debate similar to those which had so frequently divided the convention arose in the five hundred. Louvet, always faithful to the revolutionary cause, rushed to the tribune to defend the law. Tallien, who had performed so conspicuous a part since the 9th Thermidor, and whose want of personal influence had prevented his attaining a seat in the directory,—Tallien on this occasion showed himself the unflinching advocate of the revolution, and delivered a speech which made a great impression. The circumstances under which the law of Brumaire had been passed were alluded to; there seemed an attempt to insinuate that it was an abuse of the victory of Vendémiaire in regard to the vanquished; and a great deal had been said concerning the Jacobins and their new audacity.

"Let them cease to alarm us," exclaimed Tallien, "by talking of terror, by reminding us of periods totally different from those of the present day, by causing us apprehensions of their return. Times are, indeed, greatly changed. At the periods of which some persons are so fond of reminding us, the royalists did not show their audacious heads; the fanatical priests and the returned emigrants were not protected; the leaders of the Chouans were not acquitted. Why then compare circumstances which have no relation to each other? It is too evident that an intention exists to sit in judgment on the 13th Vendémiaire, the measures which have followed that memorable day, and on the men who, amid these great perils, have saved the republic. Well then, let our enemies ascend this tribune; the friends of the republic will defend us there. The very men who in those disastrous circumstances have pushed before the cannon's mouth a misguided multitude, would now reproach us with the efforts we had to make to repel that multitude; they would vainly procure the repeal of the measures which the most imminent danger has forced you to take; but no, they will not succeed. The law of the 3rd Brumaire, the most important of those measures, will be upheld by you, for it is necessary to the constitution, and assuredly you are all of you desirous to maintain the constitution." "Yes, yes, we are," cried a multitude of voices. Tallien then moved the expulsion of Job Aymé. Several members of the new third were desirous of opposing this expulsion. The discussion became extremely warm; the law of the 3rd Brumaire was sanctioned anew; Job Aymé was expelled, and the inquiry was continued in respect of those members of the new third who came within the intent of the same enactments.

A discussion then took place in relation to the emigrants, and their right to future inheritances. A law of the convention had, in order to prevent the emigrants from receiving any assistance, seized their patrimony, and declared that the inheritances to which they had a right were already vested in them for the use of the republic. Consequently a sequestration had been laid upon the property belonging to the relatives of the emigrants. A resolution was proposed in the five hundred for authorizing the partition and the immediate seizure of the portion vested in the emigrants, in order that the sequestration might be taken off. A very warm opposition was demonstrated by the new third. A desire was evinced of impugning this measure, so completely revolutionary, by arguments deducible from the ordinary principles of law; it was alleged that it was committing a violation of the rights of property. Nevertheless this resolution was adopted. With the ancients it fared otherwise. This council, from the age of its members, and its office of supreme examiner, possessed more moderation than the five hundred. It was not so much identified with the conflicting passions of the day; it was less revolutionary than the majority, and much more so than the minority. Like every mediative body, it held the middle course; and it rejected the measure, because it would lead to the execution of a law which it regarded as unjust. The councils afterwards decreed that the directory should be supreme judge of the applications for erasure from the list of emigrants. They confirmed all the laws against the priests who had not taken the oath, or who had retracted it, and against those whom the authorities of the departments had sentenced to transportation. They decreed that those priests should be treated as returned emigrants, if they appeared again upon the soil of France. They merely consented to put into confinement such of them as were infirm, and could not expatriate themselves.

One subject greatly agitated the councils, and produced an explosion in them. Fréron was still prosecuting his mission in the south, and forming the administrations and the tribunals with fervid revolutionists. The members of the companies of Jesus, the counter-revolutionists of all kinds, who had been committing murders ever since the 9th Thermidor, found themselves in their turn exposed to new reprisals, and made loud outcries. The deputy Siméon had already made temperate remonstrances. The deputy Jourdan, of Aubagne, a man of an ardent mind, and the ex-Girondist Isnard, made great complaints to the five hundred, and occupied several sittings with their declamations. The two parties came to blows. Jourdan and Talot quarrelled in the assembly itself, and almost suffered themselves to commit acts of personal violence. Their colleagues interposed and separated them. A commission was appointed to make a report on the state of the south.

These different scenes caused the parties to declare themselves more than ever. The majority in the councils was great, and entirely devoted to the directory. The minority, although a mere nullity, grew daily bolder, and openly manifested its spirit of reaction. It was nothing else than the continuation of the same spirit which had displayed itself ever since the 9th Thermidor, and which had at first with great justice attacked the excesses of terror, but which, becoming from day to day more severe and more excited, concluded by utterly condemning the revolution. Some of the members of the conventionalist two-thirds voted with the minority, and some of the members of the new third with the majority.

The conventionalists seized the opportunity with which the anniversary of the 21st of January was about to afford them, to subject their colleagues suspected of royalism to a disagreeable test. They proposed a fête to celebrate, every 21st of January, the death of the late king; and they caused it to be settled that on this day every member of the two councils and of the directory should take an oath of hatred to royalty. This formality of an oath, so frequently employed by the parties, never could be considered as a guarantee; it has never been any thing else than an unjust infliction of the conquering party, who have wanted to force the conquered to a perjury. The proposal was adopted by the two councils. The conventionalists awaited with impatience the sitting of the 1st Pluviôse, year IV. (January 21st), to see their colleagues of the new third one by one appear before the tribune. Each council sat that day in solemn state. A fête was prepared in Paris, and the directory and all the authorities were to attend it. When the oath had to be taken, some of the newly-elected appeared embarrassed. The ex-constituent Dupont, of Nemours, who was a member of the ancients, and retained to an advanced age a great liveliness of temper, and showed the boldest opposition to the existing government,—Dupont, of Nemours, showed some spiteful feeling, and after pronouncing the words, I swear hatred to royalty, added, and to every kind of tyranny. This was one way of revenging himself, and of swearing hatred to the directory under evasive words. Great disapprobation was manifested, and Dupont was compelled to adhere to the official form. In the five hundred, one André would have had recourse to the same expression as Dupont, but he was in like manner obliged to confine himself to the formula. The president of the directory delivered an energetic speech, and the whole government thus made the most revolutionary confession of faith.

At this juncture the deputies who had been exchanged for the daughter of Louis XVI. arrived. These were Quinette, Bancal, Camus, Lamarque, Drouet, and Beurnonville, the ex-minister at war. They made a report of their captivity; it was listened to with profound indignation, and the directory bestowed on them proper marks of its regard; and they took amidst general satisfaction that place which the convention had reserved for them in the councils. It had been decreed, in fact, that they should be members of the legislative body as of right.

Thus did the government and the parties progress during the winter of the year IV. (1796 and 1796).

France, who longed for a government and the re-establishment of the laws, began to be satisfied with the new state of things, and would even have entirely approved it, but for the exertions that were required of her for the salvation of the republic. The rigorous execution of the laws concerning the requisitions, the forced loan, the levy of the thirtieth horse, and the wretched state of the annuitants paid in assignats, were great subjects of complaint: but for these causes, France would have found the new government excellent. It is only the select few of a nation who are affected by glory, liberty, and noble and generous ideas, and who consent to make sacrifices for them. The mass looks for tranquillity, and seeks how to make the fewest sacrifices possible. There are moments when this entire mass is roused, moved by deep and mighty passions: this had been plainly perceptible in 1789, when the mass had been obliged to restrain liberty, and in 1793, when the mass had been compelled to defend her. But exhausted by these efforts, the great majority of France was unwilling to make any more. It required an able and vigorous government to secure at her hands the resources requisite for the salvation of the republic. Fortunately the youth, ever ready for an adventurous life, offered great resources for recruiting the armies. At first they showed great unwillingness to leave their homes; but they yielded after some resistance. Transferred to the camps, they acquired a decided partiality for war, and there performed prodigies of valour. The tax-payers, from whom considerable sacrifices in money were required, were far more difficult to conform to and be reconciled with the government.

The enemies of the revolution took for their text the new sacrifices to which France was subjected, and declaimed in their newspapers against the requisition, the forced loan, the forced levy of horses, the state of the finances, the distress of the fundholders, and the strict execution of the laws relating to emigrants and priests. They affected to consider the government as being still a revolutionary government, and as retaining all its despotism and violence. According to them, no one could any longer place confidence in it, and be easy in their minds with regard to the future. They inveighed particularly against the intention of a new campaign; they alleged that the government was sacrificing the peace, the property, and the lives of the citizens to the follies of conquest, and appeared to be chagrined that the revolution should have the honour of giving Belgium to France. Besides all this, it was by no means to be wondered at, said they, that the government should entertain such ideas and such designs, since the directory and the councils were full of the members of an assembly that had sullied itself with every crime.

The patriots, who on the score of reproaches and recriminations were never behindhand, found, on the contrary, the government too weak, and showed themselves quite ready to accuse it of complaisance to the counter-revolutionists. According to them, emigrants and priests were suffered to return; they every day acquitted the conspirators of Vendémiaire; there was not sufficient rigour used in enforcing the return of the young men of the requisition to the armies; and the forced loan was not collected with sufficient firmness. They disapproved in particular of the financial system which they seemed inclined to adopt. We have already seen that the idea of abolishing the assignats had exasperated them, and that they had immediately called for the revolutionary means which in 1793 had raised paper to par. The intention of having recourse to the financial companies, and of establishing a bank, revived all their prejudices. The government, they said, was going to surrender itself once more into the hands of the stock-jobbers; it was going, by establishing a bank, to ruin the assignats and to destroy the paper money of the republic, for the purpose of substituting for it a private paper to be created by the jobbers, and the withholding of the rations made them indignant. To remove the restrictions upon the sale of articles of consumption, and no longer afford food to the city of Paris, was an attack upon the revolution: it showed a desire to starve the people, and to drive them to despair. On this point the journals of royalism seemed to agree with those of Jacobinism, and the minister Benezec was overwhelmed with abuse from all parties.

One measure raised the wrath of the patriots against the new government to the highest pitch. The law of the 3d Brumaire, while it pardoned all offences in respect of the revolution, nevertheless excepted particular crimes, such as robbery and murder, which were still subject to be dealt with according to law. Thus the prosecutions commenced during the latter end of the convention against the authors of the September massacres were continued just as ordinary prosecutions for murder would have been. At the same time, the conspirators of Vendémiaire were brought to trial, and almost all of them acquitted. The proceedings against the authors of September were, on the contrary, extremely rigorous. The patriots were choked with rage. One Babœuf, a furious Jacobin, who had been confined in Prairial, and who was now set at liberty by virtue of the act of indemnity and oblivion, had commenced a newspaper in imitation of that of Marat, intitled the Tribun du Peuple. It may easily be conceived what the imitation of such a model must have been. More violent [than Marat's newspaper], Babœuf's was not cynical but low. What extraordinary circumstances had called for was here reduced to a system, and supported with a stupidity and a frenzy hitherto unknown. When ideas which have entirely engrossed the public mind are verging to their termination, they retain their influence in the heads of some individuals, and there produce mania and idiocy. Babœuf was the head of a sect whose minds were diseased, who maintained that the September massacre had been incomplete, and that it ought to be renewed and rendered general, so that it might be conclusive. They publicly preached up the agrarian law, a thing that even the Hébertists had never ventured to do, and coined a new phrase, the happiness of all (bonheur commun), to express the object of their system. This phrase alone was sufficient to denote that they went to the utmost limit of popular absolutism. One shudders in reading Babœuf's pages. Well-conducted minds pitied them; the alarmists pretended to believe in the approach of a new terror, and it is but fair to say that the meetings of the society of the Pantheon afforded a specious pretext for their apprehensions. It was in the spacious church of Saint-Geneviève that the Jacobins had revived their club, as we have observed. More numerous than ever, they amounted to nearly four thousand, all of them carrying their clamour far into the night. They had gradually violated the constitution, and had taken to themselves every thing that the constitution had prohibited, namely, a secretary, a president, and tickets; in a word, they had resumed the character of a political assembly. There they declaimed against the emigrants and the priests, the stock-jobbers, the bloodsuckers of the people, against the idea of a bank, the discontinuance of the rations, the abolition of the assignats, and the proceedings instituted against the patriots.

The directory, who found itself every day more and more firmly established, began to seek for the approbation of moderate and well-conducted minds. It felt it to be its duty to visit with severity this outburst of the Jacobin faction. The constitution and the existing laws afforded them the means, and it resolved to put them in action for this purpose. In the first place, it caused several numbers of Babœuf's paper to be seized, as tending to the subversion of the constitution; it then caused the society of the Pantheon to be closed, as also many others formed by the jeunesse dorée, and appropriated for dancing and reading newspapers; these latter were situated in the Palais-Royal and the Boulevard des Italiens, and known as the Société des Echecs, Salon des Princes, and Salon des Arts. There was little to fear from them, and they were included in the measure for no other purpose than to show the impartiality of its application. The ordinance was published and executed on the 8th Ventôse (February 27, 1796). A resolution called for by the five hundred added another restriction to those which were already imposed by the constitution upon the popular societies : they were not to be composed of more than sixty members.

The minister Benezec, accused by both parties, tendered his resignation. The directory refused to accept it, and wrote him a letter complimenting him upon his services. The letter was published. The new system of maintaining the public was kept up ; the indigent, the fundholders, and the public functionaries, who had not a thousand crowns' income, were alone supplied with rations. Something was likewise done for the unfortunate annuitants, who were always paid in paper. The two councils decreed that they should receive ten for one in assignats ; a very insufficient increase, for the assignats were worth no more than the two hundredth part of their nominal value.

The directory added to those measures it had just then taken, that of at last recalling the conventionalist deputies on mission. They were replaced by government commissioners. These commissioners, when with armies or administrations, represented the directory, and superintended the execution of the laws. They no longer possessed, as formerly, unlimited powers in the armies, except in an emergency, or in cases to which the power of the general did not extend ; such as a requisition for provisions or troops, they could also adopt resolutions in matters which would not admit of delay, which were in that case carried into execution, subject to the future approbation of the directory. Complaints having been made against numerous functionaries appointed by the directory immediately upon its installation, it enjoined its civil commissioners to keep an eye upon them, to note the complaints that were made against them, and to point out those whom it would be proper to dismiss.

The police is a subject of importance in troublous times. The three preceding assemblies had appropriated a numerous committee to this office ; the directory did not consider that it ought to be left among the subordinate duties of the ministry of the interior, and proposed to the two councils to erect it into a separate branch of the ministry. The opposition urged that it was an inquisitorial institution, which might be very truly said, as also that it was an institution unfortunately inseparable from factious times, and especially where those factions were pertinacious, and obliged to plot in secret. The plan was approved. The deputy Cochon was called upon to fill this new ministry. The directory also would have desired some new laws to regulate the liberty of the press. The constitution declared it to be unlimited, with the exception of those regulations which might become necessary for repressing its excesses. The two councils, after a solemn discussion, rejected every bill for restraining this liberty. In this discussion the scene was reversed. The advocates of the revolution, who should have advocated unlimited liberty, demanded the means of restriction ; and the opposition, whose secret sentiments inclined rather to monarchy than to the republic, voted for unlimited liberty ; so much are parties governed by their interest ! Notwithstanding all this, the decision was a wise one. The press may be unrestricted without danger ; truth alone is formidable ; falsehood is impotent ; the greater it magnifies, the more it exhausts itself. There never yet was a government that was overturned by a lie. What could it matter if a Babœuf did extol the agrarian law, if a Quotidienne did vilify the grandeur of the revolution, slander its heroes, and seek to restore banished princes ! All the government had to do, was only to let them declaim ; eight days' exaggeration and lies wear out all the pens of pamphleteers and libellers. But a government must have time and philosophy before it can recognize these truths. The time perhaps had not arrived for the convention to understand them. It was true that the directory, now more tranquil and more settled, ought to have begun to comprehend and practise these truths.

The last measures of the directory, such as the closing of the society of the Pantheon, the refusal to accept the resignation of Benezec, the recall of the conventionalists on mission, and the change of certain placemen, produced the best effect ; they imparted confidence to those who really dreaded the terror ; they condemned to silence those who affected to dread it, and they satisfied well-disposed minds who wished the government to make itself independent of all parties. The regularity and activity of the operations of the directory contributed more than any thing else to gain its esteem. People began to look for peace, and to assume the idea of stability from the existing system. The five directors were surrounded by a certain degree of state. Barras, a fashionable man, did the honours of the Luxembourg. He may be said, in some measure, to have acted herein for his colleagues. Social life presented much the same appearance as in the preceding year ; it exhibited a singular medley of conditions, great freedom of manners, an unrestrained taste for amusements, and extraordinary luxury. The withdrawing-rooms of the director were frequented by generals, whose education and fortune had been completed in two years ; contractors and men of business, who had enriched themselves by speculations and thievery ; exiles who had returned and were seeking to connect themselves with the government ; men of superior talents, who began to have confidence in the republic, and wished to have a situation under it ; and lastly, of intriguers, who were running after favour. Women, of whatever extraction they might be, came to these withdrawing-rooms to display their charms, and exert their influence at a moment when any thing might be demanded and obtained. If sometimes social life was deficient in that decorum and self-control, which is now so strongly insisted upon in France, and which are the fruit of a polished, tranquil, and exclusive society, there prevailed an extreme freedom of mind, and that profusion of correct ideas which the sight and the practice of great things suggests. The men who composed that society were entirely free from antiquated rules ; they did not repeat insipid sayings by rote ; what they knew, they had learned by their own experience. They had witnessed the greatest events in history. They had taken a part, they were still taking part, in them ; and it is easy to figure to oneself what such objects of attention must have excited in youthful, ambitious, and sanguine minds. There shone in the first rank young Hoche, who from a private in the French guards had become in one campaign general-in-chief, and had bestowed on himself in two years the most finished education. Handsome, of polished manners, renowned as one of the first captains of his time, and scarcely twenty-seven years of age, he was the hope of the republicans, and the idol of those females smitten with beauty, talent, and glory. By his side was already remarked young Bonaparte, who had not yet acquired fame, but whose services at Toulon and on the 13th Vendémiaire were well known, whose character and person excited astonishment by their singularity, and whose understanding made a great impression by its originality and vigour. In this society, where Madame Tallien displayed her charms, and Madame Beaulharnais her grace, Madame de Stael exhibited all the brilliancy of her intellect, elevated as it was by the associations of the time and of liberty.

Those young men called to bear rule in the state, chose their wives, some from among the ladies formerly of rank, who deemed themselves honoured by the selection, others out of the families enriched by the times, who were desirous of ennobling wealth by honourable alliances. Bonaparte had just married the widow of the unfortunate general Beaulharnais. Every body looked forward to making his fortune, and thought it would be great. Numerous were the openings now presented. The war upon the continent, the war at sea, the tribune, the magistracy, in short a great republic to defend and govern—these were grand objects of ambition, worthy to inflame every mind! The government had recently made a valuable acquisition; it was that of an ingenious and profound writer, who had devoted his youthful talents to reconcile opinion with the new republic. M. Benjamin Constant had recently published a pamphlet, intitled, De la Force du Gouvernement, which had produced a great sensation. He therein demonstrated the necessity of rallying round a government which was the only hope of France and of all the parties.

The regulation of finances was still occupying the attention of government more than any thing else. The measures recently adopted were no more than putting off the evil day. There had been transferred to the present government a certain quantity of national property for sale, the power of letting the great forests, the forced loan, and the copper-plate from which the assignats had been worked off, had been left with it as a last resource. To anticipate the produce of these different resources, it had, as we have seen, created sixty millions of treasury orders, something like Exchequer bills or royal bonds, payable out of the first money that should come into the public coffers. But these orders it was extremely difficult to make current. The bankers, who met to settle a plan for a national bank, secured on the national property, hung back when they heard the outcries yelled forth by the patriots against jobbers and contractors. The forced loan was levied much more slowly than could have been believed. The assessment rested on extremely arbitrary principles, since the loan was to be raised from the wealthiest classes; every one appealed against the assessment, and each indi-dual portion of the loan occasioned an altercation with the collectors. In two months, scarcely a third of it had been got in. Some millions in money, and some thousand millions in paper had been collected. On the partial failure of this resource, recourse was had once more to the last appliance left to the government for making up for the deficiency of all the others, the copper-plate of the assignats. The issues had amounted during the last two months to the unheard-of sum of forty-five thousand millions. Twenty thousand millions had scarcely provided one hundred millions, for the assignats were not worth more than the two hundredth part of their nominal value. The public absolutely would have nothing to do with them, for they were good for nothing. They could not be made available for the payment of debts which were unsettled; they could not operate as a discharge for more than half the farm rents and taxes, for the other half was payable in kind; they were refused in the markets, or else taken at their reduced value; lastly, they were taken in the sale of the national property for no more than the price they bore in the markets, the sales by auction always causing the offer to rise in proportion to the depreciation of the paper. It was therefore out of the question to use them in any manner that could make them valuable. An issue, of which the extent was not known, made every body look forward to some extraordinary numerical characters which would make the amounts more moderate. Thousands of millions signified at most millions. This fall, which we have already alluded to, when the government refused to prohibit the sale of the national property by auction, was now realized.
